START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-004

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 4

Volumes 5-6

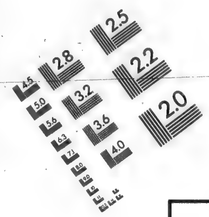
BSO, Kneisel

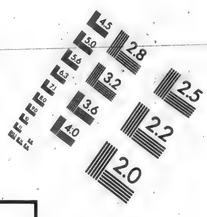
1892-1894

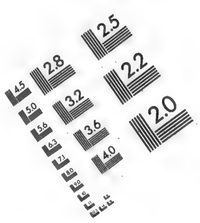
2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

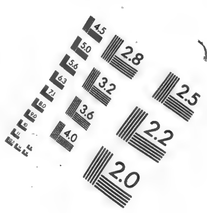
1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



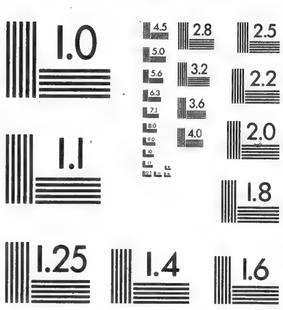






150 mm

100 mm

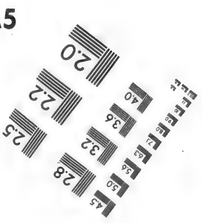


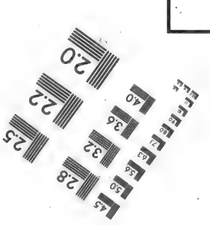
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

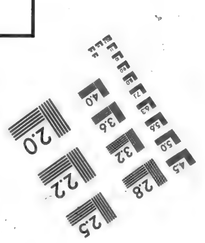
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5

A4







PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.0 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 5

BSO
KNEISEL QUARTET

1892 - 1893

POSTAL CARD.

ONE CENT.

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

MUSIC HALL,

BOSTON, MASS.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Voice, ...

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

I desire to acknowledge your kind acceptance of my invitation to become a member of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHORUS. You will receive due notice of the first rehearsal.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

POSTAL CARD ONE CENT.

United States of America

THIS SIDE IS FOR ADDRESS ONLY 200

- - - BOSTON
SYMPHONY
- - - ORCHESTRA

1892-93

Chorus Member's Ticket

BUMSTEAD HALL
Tuesday Evenings at 7.30

PERSONNEL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twelfth Season, 1892-93

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M.	Fiedler, E.	Eichheim, H.	Hannemann, D.
Adamowski, T.	Moldauer, A.	Hoffmann, J.	Krafft, W.
Roth, O.	Kuntz, D.	Strube, G.	Hahn, F. E.
Schnitzler, I.	Kaestl, M.	Mahn, F.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Akeroyd, J.	Schuchmann, F. E.	Kurth, R.	Eichler, Jul. E.
Fiumara, P.	Kneisel, Jo.	Zahn, F.	Eichler, J. Edw.
Swornsbourne, W. W.		Goldstein, S.	Michael, J.
Marble, E. B.	Tischer-Zeitz, H.	Berger, H.	Gordon, Th.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L.	Rietzel, W.	Knecht, J.	Kluge, M.
Zach, M.	Kolster, A.	Hoyer, H.	Taubert, O.
Heindl, H.			Post, L.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A.	Adamowski, J.	Rosé, E.	Reibl, C.
Schulz, L.	Campanari, G.	Loeffler, E.	Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Goldstein, A.	Bareither, G.	Jennewein, L.	Butler, H. J.
Greene, H. A.	Boernig, H.	Gerhardt, G.	Barth, C.

FLUTES.		OBOE.
Molé, C.	Heindl, E. M.	Fox, Paul.	Sautet, A.	Demuth, L.

ENGL. HORN.	CLARINETS.		BASS CLARINET.
Müller, F.	Goldschmidt, G.	Metzger, P.	Strasser, E.

BASSOONS.

Gütter, A.	Gunzel, F. H.	Dietsch, C.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A.	Schneider, J.	Hein, Fr.	Lorbeer, H.	Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.		TROMBONES.
Muller, P.	Mann, Jos.	Hampe, C.	Abloescher, J.
Lafricain, E. N.,		Rigg, A.

HARP.	TUBA.	TYMPANI.	DRUMS.
Schuecker, H.	Golde, E.	Ludwig, C. R.	Simpson, H. D.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.	TAMBOUR AND CASTANETS.	LIBRARIAN.
Field, W. A.	Senia, T. B.	Sauerquell, J.

A. W. Brooks

POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT.

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

MUSIC HALL,

BOSTON, MASS.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Voice, ...

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

I desire to acknowledge your kind acceptance of my invitation to become a member of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHORUS. You will receive due notice of the first rehearsal.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

POSTAL CARD ONE CENT.

United States of America

THIS SIDE IS FOR ADDRESS ONLY

200

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA 1892-93

Chorus Member's Ticket

BUMSTEAD HALL

Tuesday Evenings at 7.30

PERSONNEL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twelfth Season, 1892-93

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M.	Fiedler, E.	Eichheim, H.	Hannemann, D.
Adamowski, T.	Moldauer, A.	Hoffmann, J.	Krafft, W.
Roth, O.	Kuntz, D.	Strube, G.	Hahn, F. E.
Schnitzler, I.	Kaestl, M.	Mahn, F.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Akeroyd, J.	Schuchmann, F. E.	Kurth, R.	Eichler, Jul. E.
Fiumara, P.	Kneisel, Jo.	Zahn, F.	Eichler, J. Edw.
Swornsbourne, W. W.		Goldstein, S.	Michael, J.
Marble, E. B.	Tischer-Zeitz, H.	Berger, H.	Gordon, Th.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L.	Rietzel, W.	Knecht, J.	Kluge, M.
Zach, M.	Kolster, A.	Hoyer, H.	Taubert, O.
Heindl, H.			Post, L.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A.	Adamowski, J.	Rosé, E.	Reibl, C.
Schulz, L.	Campanari, G.	Loeffler, E.	Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Goldstein, A.	Bareither, G.	Jennewein, L.	Butler, H. J.
Greene, H. A.	Boernig, H.	Gerhardt, G.	Barth, C.

FLUTES.			OBOE.
Molé, C.	Heindl, E. M.	Fox, Paul.	Sautet, A.	Demuth, L.

ENGL. HORN.	CLARINETS.		BASS CLARINET.
Müller, F.	Goldschmidt, G.	Metzger, P.	Strasser, E.

BASSOONS.

Gütter, A.	Gunzel, F. H.	Dietsch, C.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A.	Schneider, J.	Hein, Fr.	Lorbeer, H.	Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.		TROMBONES.
Muller, P.	Mann, Jos.	Hampe, C.	Abloescher, J.
Lafricain, E. N.,		Rigg, A.

HARP.	TUBA.	TYMPANI.	DRUMS.
Schuecker, H.	Golde, E.	Ludwig, C. R.	Simpson, H. D.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.	TAMBOUR AND CASTANETS.	LIBRARIAN.
Field, W. A.	Senia, T. B.	Sauerquell, J.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1892

Manager Charles A. Ellis has returned from his vacation trip to Europe, and is rapidly maturing his plans for the Symphony Orchestra's concert season. The auction sale of seats will be as follows: Monday September 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, September 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, September 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, September 23, low-priced concert seats.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 66.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts, Plans for the Season.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have, quite naturally, come to be looked upon as the central attraction of the local musical season, and the preliminary announcements of each year's series are accepted as the signal for the opening up of all sorts of musical enterprises for the fall and winter months.

After 11 years of uninterrupted development this feature of the local world of music has gained such great prominence, both at home and abroad, that its influence can hardly be overestimated.

It may be well to again call attention to the fact that these concerts occupy a unique place in the musical history of the day, as they all supported by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who in establishing them sought to give to the citizens of Boston a permanent orchestra, devoted to the performance of the best music of all times.

How successfully this purpose has been accomplished is best shown by the position these concerts now hold, and it is gratifying to know that every evidence points to a continuance of the remarkable success of the past in the series of the coming season.

In general, the scheme of the Symphony concerts for '92-93 will be identical with that of last season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch entering upon his fourth year in the position of its conductor, and having very largely the same musicians in the orchestra.

The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during the season in a number of unfamiliar compositions for chorus and orchestra, as well as, possibly, in some large works in which the orchestr takes a subordinate part.

Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and, from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season, and many which the Boston orchestra will give a first performance.

In the line of soloists it is promised that the coming season's scheme shall be especially strong, and the list of engagements already completed indicates that much well directed enterprise has been shown in this department.

The season's work for the orchestra, as now planned, embraces 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals in Boston, six concerts in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and single concerts in various western cities during the month of May.

The public rehearsals begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14, and the concerts on Saturday evening, Oct. 15, continuing weekly, save during the five stated visits of the orchestra to other cities of one week each.

The prices for tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be the same as in former seasons, the hall being divided into three grades for the rehearsals and two for the concerts. The usual 25 cent admission tickets for the upper balcony at the rehearsals will continue to be sold, and the balance of the seats for the rehearsals will be put at $7.50 and $12, as usual, for the season. The concert tickets, as formerly, will be reserved for the whole house, prices being $7.50 and $12, as for many years past.

Promptly at 10 o'clock on Monday morning, Sept. 19, Auctioneer Jackson will mount to the Music Hall stage and begin the sale of the $12 rehearsal tickets, following on Tuesday with the sale of the $7.50 rehearsal tickets. Thursday morning the 22d inst., he will sell the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7.50 concert seats. The usual rules will govern these sales, no more than four seats being sold on a single bid and all sales being made in regular order.

From the inquiries already received from travellers abroad, from residents now in distant summer homes all over this country, and from the perpetual members of the "can't get away" clubs there is good cause to anticipate a maintenance of the interest and the same liberal patronage that has characterized recent seasons, and, as every seat has been sold for the season of late years, it is impossible to look for any increased support of the coming series.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 4, 1892.

The dates of the auction sales of the public rehearsal and concert tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in the Music hall, are as follows: Munday, Sept. 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, Sept. 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, Sept. 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, Sept. 23, low-priced concert seats. Mr. Charles A. Ellis is back from his European vacation trip and is rapidly completing the scheme for the season. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, op. 55; [illegible] Symphony in F, by D'Al-

SUNDAY, SEPT. 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Plans for Next Season's Symphony Concerts.

The number of inquiries daily received at Music Hall indicates the usual interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The season will open on Saturday, Oct. 15, and will consist as heretofore of 24 concerts on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

The orchestra will number 90 performers, and, with the exception of half a dozen unimportant changes, the membership will be the same as last year. Mr. Nikisch, who will again be the conductor, has already arranged many of his programmes.

They contain a number of interesting novelties chosen from the many scores submitted to the conductor for examination during the summer.

The soloists will be the best available artists and worthy to appear in these concerts, and these facts give assurance that the season will be fully up to the traditions established by this superb organization.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

——The Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished the music at the great Belmont-Vanderbilt picnic on Friday at "Gray Crags," Newport, the W. K. Vanderbilt farm. It was one of the biggest affairs of the month.

——The sale of the symphony seats for the season begins Sept. 19 at the Music Hall. Orders for tickets for rehearsals and concerts are being sent in fast. The sale promises to be greater than in any former year.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 4, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The earliest musical event of the coming season, and the first in importance, will be the opening of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Oct. 15. The usual number of performances will be given, viz., twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The orchestra will number ninety performers under direction of Mr. Nikisch, the membership being practically the same as last year. The programmes already arranged and the engagements made with soloists, which will be announced later, show that no efforts are being spared to offer to patrons the most attractive and interesting series of concerts yet given in this city. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

Spy, Worcester, Mass.

Date 9-5

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In general, the scheme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for '92-93 will be identical with that of last season, Arthur Nikisch entering upon his fourth year as conductor, and having very large'y the same musicians in the orchestra.

The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during the season in a number of concerts with the orchestra.

Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music for performance. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season.

The season's work for the orchestra as now planned, embraces 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals in Boston, six concerts in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and single concerts in various western cities during the month of May.

The public rehearsals begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14, and the concerts on Saturday evening, Oct. 15. The auction sale of tickets begins Monday, Sept. 19, at 9 A. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 75.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 13, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

NEW YORK HERALD

FOURTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1892.

NEW YORK MUSICIANS ANGRY WITH THOMAS.

They Do Not Propose to Allow Him to Keep Them from Taking Part in the Columbian World's Fair.

WHAT SEIDL AND GILMORE SAY.

The Philharmonic Society and Other Organizations Will Probably Go to Chicago Irrespective of Any Invitation.

Musicians in New York and Brooklyn were hopping mad yesterday over Mr. Theodore Thomas' action in entirely overlooking the conductors here in regard to the music at the Columbian World's Fair. Many of them were in hearty accord with Mr. Walter Damrosch's sentiments which were printed in yesterday's HERALD, and they didn't hesitate about handling Mr. Thomas in an uncomplimentary way. The Musical Mutual Protective Union, which includes in its membership thousands of musicians, is particularly incensed at Mr. Thomas' action and many of its members openly denounce it.

From what I could learn last night it is not unlikely that the musicians in this city will arise and protest against their being barred out. As it is several societies will probably visit Chicago during the World's Fair whether Mr. Thomas invites them or not.

As is already known, when Mr. Thomas was made director of all musical enterprises at the fair, the sum of $120,000 was voted to carry out his work properly. It was expected that he would invite the co-operation of New York's able conductors, but he has utterly ignored them.

WHAT MR. SEIDL SAYS.

Mr. Anton Seidl, the conductor of the Philharmonic Society, was preparing for his concert at the Madison Square Garden last night when I saw him. "I cannot believe," said he, "that Mr. Thomas will do such a thing as ignore the New York conductors. I will tell you why. This is not a Chicago fair; it is a world's fair, and to my way of thinking New York occupies a very big place in the world. Mr. Thomas' secretary sent me an invitation to judge of the American compositions to be played at the fair, but I declined it. The work attached to it was too great, and I am a busy man without it.

"Under any circumstances I think that the Philharmonic Society will go to Chicago during the fair and give two or three concerts irrespective of any invitation Mr. Thomas may send."

Mr. Victor Herbert, who was the Assistant Conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House during the reign of German opera there, did not care to say much for publication. He acknowledged that he did not approve of what Mr. Thomas had done in regard to the fair. "It is very selfish of Mr. Thomas," said he, "to keep the thing all to himself. It is also very unfair to the New York conductors."

Mr. Clifford Schmidt was much more outspoken. "The entire thing is explainable," said he. "Mr. Thomas does not like anybody here and would not have them if he could possibly get along without them. I don't approve of Mr. Damrosch rushing into this matter as he has done. Thomas wouldn't invite Damrosch, and if the fair was in charge of Damrosch he would not invite Thomas."

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH GILMORE.

Bandmaster P. S. Gilmore was seen during the afternoon at Manhattan Beach. He thought Mr. Damrosch made some good points regarding the disappointment felt by New York conductors at being ignored.

"There had to be a chief musical director chosen," said Mr. Gilmore, "and without Mr. Thomas' knowledge I urged his being placed in the position. It is perfectly natural that Thomas would, first of all, look after his own orchestra. If he did not it would scatter.

"Yet, when one hears of the many millions of dollars which must be expended to make the World's Fair what it ought to be, a liberal appropriation should have been given the Music Committee, enough to enable it to give the other three great American orchestras—Seidl's, Damrosch's and Nikisch's—a chance to be heard, as it would have added greatly to the artistic variety and to the musical interests and attractions of the fair.

"As to my band appearing at the fair, that rests with Mr. Thomas and the Music Committee. In February last I received a letter asking me for my terms for the entire six months of the fair. I replied that owing to other engagements it would be impossible to make any offer for the whole time, but if the committee would inform me of the opening and closing dates I would see how much time I could place at its disposal. In answer I received the following:—

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION.
BUREAU OF MUSIC.

THEODORE THOMAS, MUSICAL DIRECTOR; WILLIAM L. TOMLINS, CHORAL DIRECTOR; GEORGE H. WILSON, SECRETARY.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 29, 1892.

P. S. GILMORE, Esq.:—

DEAR SIR—Referring to your letter of the 23d inst., permit me to express the regrets of the Bureau of Music that it will be impossible for you to propose estimates for the services of your band for the six months of the Exposition. I do not think you need take the trouble to make any estimate for the services of your band for a portion of that time, as we think it is essential to contract for the entire period. Yours very truly,

G. W. WILSON, Secretary.

"This was a clean knockout. Since then the committee has again written to me and I have given them my open dates."

At the Arion and Liederkranz clubs Mr. Thomas' action was severely criticised yesterday, and the leaders of all the big choral clubs in and around New York feel very much hurt at being ignored.

DISPLEASED WITH DAMROSCH.

[BY TELEGRAPH TO THE HERALD.]

CHICAGO, Ill., Sept. 4, 1892.—"Jealousy" is what the Chicago musicians said to-day regarding the utterances of Walter Damrosch, printed in this morning's HERALD, in reference to Mr. Theodore Thomas' neglect of Gotham musical directors in connection with the World's Fair. Mr. Thomas is not in the city and there is no one here authorized to speak for him. Professor W. L. Tomlins, choral master under Mr. Thomas, who is here drilling a chorus of five thousand voices, is also out of town. An official of the World's Fair, however, who is closely connected with the musical department, said to-night, after stipulating that his name should not be used:—

"It is the same old fight on Mr. Thomas on the part of the New Yorkers, who are still very sore because he has left them. As for young Mr. Damrosch, his coming forward shows the worst of bad taste. Had Herr Seidl or Herr Nikisch said what Damrosch did it would have carried more weight. He is still young and not possessing one-tenth of the ability of Mr. Thomas. His presuming to criticize the great master is, to say the least, the height of impudence.

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas has given his attention to his World's Fair duties for months, and the result will be most gratifying. There will be something else at the fair besides concerts by the Thomas orchestra. The people of New York and elsewhere can depend upon that. The musical department will hold its own in comparison with the other departments.

"Criticism at the present time is based upon a lack of information as to what Mr. Thomas is doing and intends to do. The music loving people of the community will be offered a great treat when they come here next year. The World's Fair directors are satisfied with what Mr. Thomas is doing, and that is all he cares for. Music will be represented here at the fair by many of its great masters, and it will also follow that many of the little devotees will be left out."

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 9/3

Anton Seidl's Concert.

If anything were needed to convince one of the tremendous popularity which Anton Seidl and his orchestra enjoy here, it was amply provided last evening by the great audience which thronged into the amphitheatre of the Madison Square Garden and listened with loud manifestations of approval to a programme whose interpretation occupied more than three hours. In view of the very small audiences which attended the Damrosch concerts, which have just come to a close, one is forced to seek the cause for this difference, because these concerts were admirable in many ways and worthy of all praise.

There are two styles of conductors precisely as there are two sorts of players. Each has its virtues and its shortcomings, and we would have to go far to find the good qualities of both united in one single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate interpreters, and again the refined, delicate and highly finished. The one is Damrosch and the other is Seidl. Nikisch comes nearer to combining the excellences of both than any conductor we have ever heard. It is seldom you find the impeccable finish of Damrosch united with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of Seidl—it is the same difference as exists between the playing of Rubinstein and Paderewski—if Seidl's orchestra lacks something of technical perfection, there is much compensation in its force and largeness of style and in its overwhelming emotional elements—and this after all is what people want when they hear music. This it is which differentiates it from all other arts. These qualities were illustrated strikingly last evening in the performance of Liszt's second polonaise and the Parisian version of the "Tannhauser" overture and bacchanale, but the entire programme was interesting and admirably rendered.

These concerts will be continued nightly for two weeks.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 4.

Music Notes.

The preparations now in progress at Music Hall presage a lively and interesting musical season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as usual, will be the first of our musical organizations in the field. Its concerts will open on Saturday, Oct. 15, and the plans made for the series promise to justify the most agreeable anticipations of patrons. The auction sale of season tickets will be held at Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22, and 23.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 10, 1892

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON BEGINNING OCT. 15.

Auction Sale of Season Tickets at Music Hall Sept 19, 20, 22 and 23.

THE SYMPHONY SALES.

To copy from the Farmer's Almanac, we should say: "About this time expect Symphony concert advices." And behold they come! In another column will be found the particulars of the preliminary sale of seats, which will take place in Music Hall on September 19, 20, 22 and 23. The usual regulations will govern the sale, viz.: Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The first concert will be given on Saturday, October 15, and the series will consist of twenty-four, as heretofore, an occasional skip of a week, allowing for the absence of the orchestra in other cities. Mr. Nikisch's plans provide for a good deal of new music, and it is promised that, besides the solo numbers there will be occasional contributions from a select chorus. The "up set" prices remain as usual and no seats will be withheld from the auction except those in the second balcony for the rehearsals.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1892

Manager Charles A. Ellis has returned from his vacation trip to Europe, and is rapidly maturing his plans for the Symphony Orchestra's concert season. The auction sale of seats will be as follows: Monday September 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, September 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, September 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, September 23, low-priced concert seats.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 66.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts, Plans for the Season.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have, quite naturally, come to be looked upon as the central attraction of the local musical season, and the preliminary announcements of each year's series are accepted as the signal for the opening up of all sorts of musical enterprises for the fall and winter months.

After 11 years of uninterrupted development this feature of the local world of music has gained such great prominence, both at home and abroad, that its influence can hardly be overestimated.

It may be well to again call attention to the fact that these concerts occupy a unique place in the musical history of the day, as they all supported by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who in establishing them sought to give to the citizens of Boston a permanent orches-

How successfully this purpose has been accomplished is best shown by the position these concerts now hold, and it is gratifying to know that every evidence points to a continuance of the remarkable success of the past in the series of the coming season.

In general, the scheme of the Symphony concerts for '92-93 will be identical with that of last season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch entering upon his fourth year in the position of its conductor, and having very largely the same musicians in the orchestra, tra, devoted to the performance of the best music of all times.

The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during the season in a number of unfamiliar compositions for chorus and orchestra, as well as, possibly, in some large works in which the orchestr takes a subordinate part.

Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation time ito the preparatory work of the coming season, and, from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by Americ n composers has chosen a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season, and many which the Boston orchestra willgive a first performance.

In the line of soloists it is promised that the coming season's scheme shall be especially strong, and the list of engagements already completed indicates that much well directed enterprise has been shown in this department.

The season's work for the orchestra, as now planned, embraces 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals in Boston, six concerts in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and single concerts in various western cities during the month of May.

The public rehearsals begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14, and the concerts on Saturday evening, Oct. 15, continuing weekly, save during the five stated visits of the orchestra to other cities of one week each.

The prices for tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be the same as in former seasons, the hall being divided into three grades for the rehearsals and two for the concerts. The usual 25 cent admission tickets for the upper balcony at the rehearsals will continue to be sold, and the balance of the seats for the rehearsals will be put at $7.50 and $12, as usual, for the season. The concert tickets, as formerly, will be reserved for the whole house, prices being $7.50 and $12, as for many years past.

Promptly at 10 o'clock on Monday morning, Sept. 19, Auctioneer Jackson will mount to the Music Hall stage and begin the sale of the $12 rehearsals tickets, following on Tuesday with the sale of the $7.50 rehearsal tickets. Thursday morning the 22d inst., he will sell the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7.50 concert seats. The usual rules will govern these sales, no more than four seats being sold on a single bid and all sales being made in regular order.

From the inquiries already received from travellers abroad, from residents now in distant summer homes all over this country, and from the perpetual members of the "can't get away" clubs there is good cause to anticipate a maintenance of the interest and the same liberal patronage that has characterized recent seasons, and, as every seat has been sold for the season of late years, it is impossible to look for any increased support of the coming series.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 4, 1892.

The dates of the auction sales of the public rehearsal and concert tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in the Music hall, are as follows: Munday, Sept. 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, Sept. 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, Sept. 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, Sept. 23, low-priced concert seats. Mr. Charles A. Ellis is back from his European vacation trip and is rapidly completing the scheme for the season. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, No. 2; Saint-Säens Symphony, op. 55; Thierot's Symphony; Symphony in F, by D'Albert, and "Petite Suite," by César Cui.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Plans for Next Season's Symphony Concerts.

The number of inquiries daily received at Music Hall indicates the usual interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The season will open on Saturday, Oct. 15, and will consist as heretofore of 24 concerts on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

The orchestra will number 90 performers, and, with the exception of half a dozen unimportant changes, the membership will be the same as last year. Mr. Nikisch, who will again be the conductor, has already arranged many of his programmes.

They contain a number of interesting novelties chosen from the many scores submitted to the conductor for examination during the summer.

The soloists will be the best available artists and worthy to appear in these concerts, and these facts give assurance that the season will be fully up to the traditions established by this superb organization.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished the music at the great Belmont-Vanderbilt picnic on Friday at "Gray Crags," Newport, the W. K. Vanderbilt farm. It was one of the biggest affairs of the month.

—The sale of the symphony seats for the season begins Sept. 19 at the Music Hall. Orders for tickets for rehearsals and concerts are being sent in fast. The sale promises to be greater than in any former year.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 4, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The earliest musical event of the coming season, and the first in importance, will be the opening of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Oct. 15. The usual number of performances will be given, viz., twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The orchestra will number ninety performers under direction of Mr. Nikisch, the membership being practically the same as last year. The programmes already arranged and the engagements made with soloists, which will be announced later, show that no efforts are being spared to offer to patrons the most attractive and interesting series of concerts yet given in this city. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

Spy, [illegible]

Date ... 9 3

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In general, the scheme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for '92-93 will be identical with that of last season, Arthur Nikisch entering upon his fourth year as conductor, and having very largely the same musicians in the orchestra.

The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during the season in a number of concerts with the orchestra.

Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation to the preparatory work of the coming season, and from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music for performance. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season.

The season's work for the orchestra as now planned, embraces 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals in Boston, six concerts in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and single concerts in various western cities during the month of May.

The public rehearsals begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14, and the concerts on Saturday evening, Oct. 15. The auction sale of tickets begins Monday, Sept. 19, at 9 A. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 75.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 13, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

NEW YORK HERALD

FOURTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1892.

NEW YORK MUSICIANS ANGRY WITH THOMAS.

They Do Not Propose to Allow Him to Keep Them from Taking Part in the Columbian World's Fair.

WHAT SEIDL AND GILMORE SAY.

The Philharmonic Society and Other Organizations Will Probably Go to Chicago Irrespective of Any Invitation.

Musicians in New York and Brooklyn were hopping mad yesterday over Mr. Theodore Thomas' action in entirely overlooking the conductors here in regard to the music at the Columbian World's Fair. Many of them were in hearty accord with Mr. Walter Damrosch's sentiments which were printed in yesterday's HERALD, and they didn't hesitate about handling Mr. Thomas in an uncomplimentary way. The Musical Mutual Protective Union, which includes in its membership thousands of musicians, is particularly incensed at Mr. Thomas' action and many of its members openly denounce it.

From what I could learn last night it is not unlikely that the musicians in this city will arise and protest against their being barred out. As it is several societies will probably visit Chicago during the World's Fair whether Mr. Thomas invites them or not.

As is already known, when Mr. Thomas was made director of all musical enterprises at the fair, the sum of $120,000 was voted to carry out his work properly. It was expected that he would invite the co-operation of New York's able conductors, but he has utterly ignored them.

WHAT MR. SEIDL SAYS.

Mr. Anton Seidl, the conductor of the Philharmonic Society, was preparing for his concert at the Madison Square Garden last night when I saw him. "I cannot believe," said he, "that Mr. Thomas will do such a thing as ignore the New York conductors. I will tell you why. This is not a Chicago fair; it is a world's fair, and to my way of thinking New York occupies a very big place in the world. Mr. Thomas' secretary sent me an invitation to judge of the American compositions to be played at the fair, but I declined it. The work attached to it was too great, and I am a busy man without it.

"Under any circumstances I think that the Philharmonic Society will go to Chicago during the fair and give two or three concerts irrespective of any invitation Mr. Thomas may send."

Mr. Victor Herbert, who was the Assistant Conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House during the reign of German opera there, did not care to say much for publication. He acknowledged that he did not approve of what Mr. Thomas had done in regard to the fair. "It is very selfish of Mr. Thomas," said he, "to keep the thing all to himself. It is also very unfair to the New York conductors."

Mr. Clifford Schmidt was much more outspoken. "The entire thing is explainable," said he. "Mr. Thomas does not like anybody here and would not have them if he could possibly get along without them. I don't approve of Mr. Damrosch rushing into this matter as he has done. Thomas wouldn't invite Damrosch, and if the fair was in charge of Damrosch he would not invite Thomas."

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH GILMORE.

Bandmaster P. S. Gilmore was seen during the afternoon at Manhattan Beach. He thought Mr. Damrosch made some good points regarding the disappointment felt by New York conductors at being ignored.

"There had to be a chief musical director chosen," said Mr. Gilmore, "and without Mr. Thomas' knowledge I urged his being placed in the position. It is perfectly natural that Thomas would, first of all, look after his own orchestra. If he did not it would scatter.

"Yet, when one hears of the many millions of dollars which must be expended to make the World's Fair what it ought to be, a liberal appropriation should have been given the Music Committee, enough to enable it to give the other three great American orchestras—Seidl's, Damrosch's and Nikisch's—a chance to be heard, as it would have added greatly to the artistic variety and to the musical interests and attractions of the fair.

"As to my band appearing at the fair, that rests with Mr. Thomas and the Music Committee. In February last I received a letter asking me for my terms for the entire six months of the fair. I replied that owing to other engagements it would be impossible to make any offer for the whole time, but if the committee would inform me of the opening and closing dates I would see how much time I could place at its disposal. In answer I received the following:—

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION.
BUREAU OF MUSIC.

THEODORE THOMAS, MUSICAL DIRECTOR; WILLIAM L. TOMLINS, CHORAL DIRECTOR; GEORGE H. WILSON, SECRETARY.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 29, 1892.

P. S. GILMORE, Esq.:—

DEAR SIR—Referring to your letter of the 23d inst., permit me to express the regrets of the Bureau of Music that it will be impossible for you to propose estimates for the services of your band for the six months of the Exposition. I do not think you need take the trouble to make any estimate for the services of your band for a portion of that time, as we think it is essential to contract for the entire period. Yours very truly,

G. W. WILSON, Secretary.

"This was a clean knockout. Since then the committee has again written to me and I have given them my open dates."

At the Arion and Liederkranz clubs Mr. Thomas' action was severely criticised yesterday, and the leaders of all the big choral clubs in and around New York feel very much hurt at being ignored.

DISPLEASED WITH DAMROSCH.

[BY TELEGRAPH TO THE HERALD.]

CHICAGO, Ill., Sept. 4, 1892.—"Jealousy" is what the Chicago musicians said to-day regarding the utterances of Walter Damrosch, printed in this morning's HERALD, in reference to Mr. Theodore Thomas' neglect of Gotham musical directors in connection with the World's Fair. Mr. Thomas is not in the city and there is no one here authorized to speak for him. Professor W. L. Tomlins, choral master under Mr. Thomas, who is here drilling a chorus of five thousand voices, is also out of town. An official of the World's Fair, however, who is closely connected with the musical department, said to-night, after stipulating that his name should not be used:—

"It is the same old fight on Mr. Thomas on the part of the New Yorkers, who are still very sore because he has left them. As for young Mr. Damrosch, his coming forward shows the worst of bad taste. Had Herr Seidl or Herr Nikisch said what Damrosch did it would have carried more weight. He is still young and not possessing one-tenth of the ability of Mr. Thomas. His presuming to criticize the great master is, to say the least, the height of impudence.

Damrosch has never been particularly successful here, and he does not like the city. Chicago does not miss his absence, because the music loving people here never thought very highly of his musical abilities. How does he know Mr. Thomas will not seek the co-operation of his musical brethren in New York and invite some of them to assist him at the fair? Mr. Thomas has given his attention to his World's Fair duties for months, and the result will be most gratifying. There will be something else at the fair besides concerts by the Thomas orchestra. The people of New York and elsewhere can depend upon that. The musical department will hold its own in comparison with the other departments.

"Criticism at the present time is based upon a lack of information as to what Mr. Thomas is doing and intends to do. The music loving people of the community will be offered a great treat when they come here next year. The World's Fair directors are satisfied with what Mr. Thomas is doing, and that is all he cares for. Music will be represented here at the fair by many of its great masters, and it will also follow that many of the little devotees will be left out."

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 9/3

Anton Seidl's Concert.

If anything were needed to convince one of the tremendous popularity which Anton Seidl and his orchestra enjoy here, it was amply provided last evening by the great audience which thronged into the amphitheatre of the Madison Square Garden and listened with loud manifestations of approval to a programme whose interpretation occupied more than three hours. In view of the very small audiences which attended the Damrosch concerts, which have just come to a close, one is forced to seek the cause for this difference, because these concerts were admirable in many ways and worthy of all praise.

There are two styles of conductors precisely as there are two sorts of players. Each has its virtues and its shortcomings, and we would have to go far to find the good qualities of both united in one single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate interpreters, and again the refined, delicate and highly finished. The one is Damrosch and the other is Seidl. Nikisch comes nearer to combining the excellences of both than any conductor we have ever heard. It is seldom you find the impeccable finish of Damrosch united with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of Seidl—it is the same difference as exists between the playing of Rubinstein and Paderewski—if Seidl's orchestra lacks something of technical perfection, there is much compensation in its force and largeness of style and in its overwhelming emotional elements—and this after all is what people want when they hear music. This it is which differentiates it from all other arts. These qualities were illustrated strikingly last evening in the performance of Liszt's second polonaise and the Parisian version of the "Tannhauser" overture and bacchanale, but the entire programme was interesting and admirably rendered.

These concerts will be continued nightly for two weeks.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 4.

Music Notes.

The preparations now in progress at Music Hall presage a lively and interesting musical season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as usual, will be the first of our musical organizations in the field. Its concerts will open on Saturday, Oct. 15, and the plans made for the series promise to justify the most agreeable anticipations of patrons. The auction sale of season tickets will be held at Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22, and 23.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 10, 1892

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON BEGINNING OCT. 15.

Auction Sale of Season Tickets at Music Hall Sept 19, 20, 22 and 23.

THE SYMPHONY SALES.

To copy from the Farmer's Almanac, we should say: "About this time expect Symphony concert advices." And behold they come! In another column will be found the particulars of the preliminary sale of seats, which will take place in Music Hall on September 19, 20, 22 and 23. The usual regulations will govern the sale, viz.: Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The first concert will be given on Saturday, October 15, and the series will consist of twenty-four, as heretofore, an occasional skip of a week, allowing for the absence of the orchestra in other cities. Mr. Nikisch's plans provide for a good deal of new music, and it is promised that, besides the solo numbers there will be occasional contributions from a select chorus. The "up set" prices remain as usual, and no seats will be withheld from the auction except those in the second balcony for the rehearsals.

[2]

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TWELFTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

—90 PERFORMERS,—

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 15, 1892, TO APRIL 29, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 5, DEC. 10, 1892, JAN. 14, FEB. 11, AND MARCH 18, 1893, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1892, TO APRIL 28, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 4, DEC. 9, 1892, JAN. 13, FEB. 10, AND MARCH 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, September 19th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall Tuesday, September 20th, at 10, A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21st.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 22d, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, September 23d, at 10, A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24th.

THE MAHOGANY TREE

THE SYMPHONIES. One week more, and Bostonians will be back in town. They must come; for do not the sales of the Symphony tickets come week after next? and no good Bostonian would miss that. I am told—I cannot vouch for the fact—that the lovers of German music will get their fill this winter. More than that, there is a rumor that Herr Nikisch is to appear as a soloist. It is said, or it was, when he was engaged for his present post, that he played the violin and piano equally well. I fancy, however, that it is at the key-board, and not on the strings, that he is to disport himself. This will be a great novelty. It will be the first time that the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has ever appeared as a soloist; and Boston, which always does the handsome thing by the man who wields the bâton in Music Hall, will bottle up enthusiasm for the occasion as soon as the rumor becomes an announcement.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1892.

A new arrangement of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been made as follows: A series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat will form an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left, respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre and the basses at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs. The season of the orchestra will include about one hundred entertainments aside from those of the western tour, half being the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn.

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 11, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Twelfth Season Beginning Oct. 15.

Auction Sales of Season Tickets

AT MUSIC HALL, SEPT. 19, 20, 22 AND 23.

The 12th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Music Hall on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 15. The auction sales of season tickets are announced for Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23 at Music Hall, and will be governed by the same rules, as prevailed at last year's sale.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1892.

The Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that the twelfth season of concerts in the Music Hall will begin on Saturday night, Oct. 15, with the customary public rehearsal on the Friday afternoon before. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals will also number twenty-four, to be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be the conductor, his fourth season. The following are the arrangements for the sale of season tickets:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats unsold at the auctions will be for sale at the office Sept. 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seat, at auction, Sept. 23; seats unsold at the auctions will be for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The auctions will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The important place held in the musical life of the city by the Symphony Concerts is too well understood to make reference to it necessary at this moment. But it is well to call attention to the determination of all concerned, the proprietor, the managers and the conductor, to maintain the high standard already achieved. The orchestra will count ninety players and in each choir will be found, as before, players of the highest order. It is Mr. Nikisch's purpose to include in the programmes worthy music of every school, ancient and modern, and by composers of every nationality. The novelties, about which there always has been and there always will be, much talk, some of it without thought, will include works that will be new abroad as well as at home. A feature of great and peculiar interest will be a choral detachment which will be heard in important works with the orchestra.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor ARTHUR NIKISCH.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-1893.

BOSTON MUSICAL HERALD. September, 1892.

For Terms, Dates, &c., Address

C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24. 1t[A] s10

BOSTON POST

SEPTEMBER 12

THE TWELFTH SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give a Winter's Programme of Genuine Excellence.

PADEREWSKI AND EMMA JUCH WILL APPEAR.

Conductor Nikisch Has Brought Many Novelties From Abroad—a Feature Will Be a Chorus of 200 Voices.

announcement for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of much interest, and seems even more attractive than those of previous years.

addition of a mixed chorus to be heard occasionally in the concerts gives a wider scope to the enterprise, and will add a welcome variety to the performances.

orchestra will number ninety performers, about two hundred. The programmes will consist, as usual, of symphonies, given at Music Hall on Saturday afternoons, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

Among the soloists will appear, who have already been heard here, Emma Juch, Mme. Modjeska, Paderewski and Mr. Nikisch has arranged for some summer prelude to the season. He has been successful in securing a number of interesting novelties, and has accepted the following chorus: Eugen No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest"; Wagner, scene 1 from "Das Rheingold," (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, Op. 43 (In modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen"; Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus"; Brahms, Schicksalslie for chorus and orchestra.

Among the standard works to be given are:

Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music; Wagner, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Goldmark, spring overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7 50 according to location. The following arrangements for the sale of tickets have been made:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 a. m.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 11, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON Beginning OCT. 15.

Auction Sales of Season Tickets

At Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

The twelfth season of Symphony concerts will begin in Music hall on Oct. 15, and there is no reason to believe they will be less popular and "the thing" than before. The auction sales of the public rehearsal and concert tickets are anticipated by many, and they will occur as follows: Monday, Sept. 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, Sept. 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, Sept. 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, Sept. 23, low-priced concert seats. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, No. 2; Saint-Säens Symphony, op. 55; Thierot's Symphony in F, by D'Albert, and "Petite Suite," by César Cui.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1892.

CHICKERING HALL (152 Tremont St.).

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Eight Concerts on Monday Evenings—Oct. 17, Nov. 7, Nov. 21, Dec. 5, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, Feb. 27 and March 27. Mr. CARL ROSA, Mr. WM. H. SHERWOOD, Mr. [illegible] and other artists will assist in the [illegible] season tickets, with [illegible] at the Box Office, Music Hall, [illegible] 5t A 6 4 [3]

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TWELFTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

—90 PERFORMERS,—

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 15, 1892, TO APRIL 29, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 5, DEC 10, 1892, JAN. 14, FEB. 11, AND MARCH 18, 1893, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1892, TO APRIL 28, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 4. DEC. 9, 1892, JAN. 13, FEB. 10, AND MARCH 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, September 19th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall Tuesday, September 20th, at 10, A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21st.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 22d, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, September 23d, at 10. A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24th.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor ARTHUR NIKISCH.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-1893.

BOSTON MUSICAL HERALD. September, 1892.

For Terms, Dates, &c., Address

C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

BOSTON POST SEPTEMBER 12.

THE TWELFTH SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give a Winter's Programme of Genuine Excellence.

PADEREWSKI AND EMMA JUCH WILL APPEAR.

Conductor Nikisch Has Brought Many Novelties From Abroad—a Feature Will Be a Chorus of 200 Voices.

The announcement for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be read with interest, and seems even more attractive than those of previous years.

The organization of a mixed chorus to take part occasionally in the concerts gives a wider scope to the enterprise, and will add a welcome variety to the performances.

The orchestra will number ninety performers and the chorus about two hundred. The home season will consist, as usual, of twenty-four concerts at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

The best available soloists will appear. Engagements have already been made with Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin, M. Paderewski and others of distinction. Mr. Nikisch has been busy during the entire summer preparing his programmes. He has been successful in securing a number of interesting novelties and has accepted the following for performance:

Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugen d'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, No. 5; Saint-Saens, symphony, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest"; Wagner, scene 1 from "Das Rheingold," (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, Op. 43 (In modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen"; Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus"; Brahms, Schicksalslie for chorus and orchestra.

Among the standard works to be given are:

Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music; Wagner, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Goldmark, spring overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7 50 according to location. The following arrangements for the sale of tickets have been made:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 a. m.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 11, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON Beginning OCT. 15.

Auction Sales of Season Tickets

At Music Hall, Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23.

The twelfth season of Symphony concerts will begin in Music hall on Oct. 15, and there is no reason to believe they will be less popular and "the thing" than before. The auction sales of the public rehearsal and concert tickets are anticipated by many, and they will occur as follows: Monday, Sept. 19, the high-priced rehearsal seats; Tuesday, Sept. 20, the low-priced rehearsal seats; Thursday, Sept. 22, high-priced concert seats; Friday, Sept. 23, low-priced concert seats. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, No. 2; Saint-Säens Symphony, op. 55; Thierot's Symphony in F, by D'Albert, and "Petite Suite," by César Cui.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1892.

CHICKERING HALL (152 Tremont St.).

KNEISEL QUARTET.

Eight Concerts on Monday Evenings—Oct. 17, Nov. 7, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, Feb. 27 and March 27. Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. Wm. H. SHERWOOD, Mr. CLAYTON JOHNS and other artists will appear with the Quartet. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.

Sale opens at the Box Office, Music Hall, MONDAY, Oct. 10, at 9 A. M. [5t[A] 04

THE MAHOGANY TREE

THE SYMPHONIES. One week more, and Bostonians will be back in town. They must come; for do not the sales of the Symphony tickets come week after next? and no good Bostonian would miss that. I am told—I cannot vouch for the fact—that the lovers of German music will get their fill this winter. More than that, there is a rumor that Herr Nikisch is to appear as a soloist. It is said, or it was, when he was engaged for his present post, that he played the violin and piano equally well. I fancy, however, that it is at the key-board, and not on the strings, that he is to disport himself. This will be a great novelty. It will be the first time that the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has ever appeared as a soloist; and Boston, which always does the handsome thing by the man who wields the bâton in Music Hall, will bottle up enthusiasm for the occasion as soon as the rumor becomes an announcement.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1892.

A new arrangement of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been made as follows: A series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat will form an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left, respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre and the basses at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs. The season of the orchestra will include about one hundred entertainments aside from those of the western tour, half being the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn.

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 11, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Twelfth Season Beginning Oct. 15.

Auction Sales of Season Tickets

AT MUSIC HALL, SEPT. 19, 20, 22 AND 23.

The 12th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Music Hall on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 15. The auction sales of season tickets are announced for Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23 at Music Hall, and will be governed by the same rules, as prevailed at last year's sale.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1892.

The Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that the twelfth season of concerts in the Music Hall will begin on Saturday night, Oct. 15, with the customary public rehearsal on the Friday afternoon before. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals will also number twenty-four, to be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be the conductor, his fourth season. The following are the arrangements for the sale of season tickets:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats unsold at the auctions will be for sale at the office Sept. 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seat, at auction, Sept. 23; seats unsold at the auctions will be for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The auctions will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The important place held in the musical life of the city by the Symphony Concerts is too well understood to make reference to it necessary at this moment. But it is well to call attention to the determination of all concerned, the proprietor, the managers and the conductor, to maintain the high standard already achieved. The orchestra will count ninety players and in each choir will be found, as before, players of the highest order. It is Mr. Nikisch's purpose to include in the programmes worthy music of every school, ancient and modern, and by composers of every nationality. The novelties, about which there always has been and there always will be, much talk, some of it without thought, will include works that will be new abroad as well as at home. A feature of great and peculiar interest will be a choral detachment which will be heard in important works with the orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24. 1t[A] $10

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93. SEPTEMBER 11, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

90 PERFORMERS,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS FROM OCT. 15, 1892, to APRIL 29, 1893, OMITTING NOV 5, DEC. 10, 1892, JAN. 14, FEB. 11 AND MARCH 18, 1893, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 14, 1892, TO APRIL 28, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 4, DEC. 9, 1892, JAN. 13, FEB. 10 AND MARCH 17, 1893.

A SELECT CHORUS WILL PARTICIPATE OCCASIONALLY IN THE CONCERTS, AND THE BEST AVAILABLE SOLOISTS WILL APPEAR.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept 22, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.
All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept 24.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 9-12

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that the twelfth season of concerts in the Music Hall will begin on Saturday night, Oct. 15, with the customary public rehearsals on the Friday afternoon before. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals will also number twenty-four, to be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will again be the conductor, his fourth season.

Clipping from Telegram Providence R. I.

Date 9/11

The Boston Symphony orchestra will doubtless figure in a series of Infantry hall performances, which, in the light of bygone records, will be patronized generously.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Conductor Nikisch's P'ans for the Symphony Season.

Interest in These Concerts Fully Maintained—Worcester Festival Ticket Sales—The Operatic Outlook—Current Events at Home and Abroad—News Notes, Gossip and Comment.

Many indications justify a belief that the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be one of unusual importance in its history, and it is extremely gratifying to know that the interest in the concerts of this organization, both in this city and in those visited at stated periods, was never more pronounced.

The maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra for such an extended period is in itself the most convincing evidence of its value as an organization, and the position it has gained throughout the country is a just cause for local pride. At no time since its formation has the orchestra been in better shape for its season's work than at present, and the admirable management of its affairs will unquestionably again give the most satisfactory results to the patrons of its concerts.

The membership of the organization remains essentially the same as last season, Conductor Arthur Nikisch having retained practically all of 90 musicians who took part in last year's concerts, and the general scheme for the season remains largely the same as that of earlier years.

One important addition has been arranged for the home concerts of the orchestra at Music Hall, this consisting of the organization of a chorus of mixed voices, numbering about 200, to take part in certain works which are to be given as a part of the regular series of programmes, as well as, possibly, to assist in other concerts. This chorus will be drilled by Mr. Arthur Foote, who will without doubt prove a valuable assistant to Conductor Nikisch.

A change contemplated in placing the orchestra will interest those familiar with the arrangement of the various divisions in former years. The men will be seated upon a platform rising in the shape of an amphitheatre from the conductor's desk, with the first and second violins upon the immediate left and right of the conductor, then the violas and 'celli, with the wind and tympani in the centre, the double basses being divided at the back of either of the two wings, and separated by the wind players.

The summer leisure has been well improved by Mr. Nikisch in the examination of new compositions, and he has secured so many attractive novelties that the concerts will afford a constant succession of interesting features which will be duly analyzed and explained to the patrons by Mr. William F. Apthorp, the accomplished musical writer, who is to have charge of the programme books of the season. Among the works to be given a first hearing in these concerts are the following:

Liszt	Faust symphony (with chorus)
Eugene D'Albert	Symphony (new)
Tschaikowsky	Symphony, E minor No. 5
Saint-Saens	Symphony, A minor, Op. 55
Rudorff	Symphony, G minor, No. 2
Dvorak	Dramatic overture, "Hussitska"
Richard Strauss,	Symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"
Tschaikowsky	Symphonic poem, "Tempest"
Wagner	Scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters.)
Thierot	Symphonietta, Op. 55
Cesar Cui	Petite suite, Op. 43 (In modo popolari)
Bazzini	Overture, "King Lear"
Riemenschneider	Symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"
Cherubini	Overture, "Ali Baba"
Reinecke	Overture, "King Manfred"
Raff	Symphonietta for wind instruments
Charpentier	Impressions d'Italie
Philip Scharwenka,	Symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen"
Heuberger	Nachtmusik for string orchestra
Brahms	Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus
Liszt	Vintage chorus from "Prometheus"
Brahms	Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra

The season's scheme will also include performances of the following standard compositions:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	"Italian"
Berlioz	"Romeo and Juliette"
Berlioz	Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorak	Symphony, D major
Dvorak	Serenade for strings
Wagner	"Tristan and Isolde," music
Wagner	Kaisermarsch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring Overture
Macdowell	Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell	Piano concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B-flat major
Gade	Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana	Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"
Saint-Saens	Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"
Grieg	Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The engagements already made with soloists indicate that this portion of the season's scheme will be arranged with a view to the enjoyment of patrons. Among the vocalists now named are Miss Emma Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell.

The orchestra's season, as at present arranged, includes about 100 public appearances, aside from those incidental to its annual western tour, half of these being given to the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and 10 public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn. The Boston series begins at Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

Despite the fact that the plans for the sale of tickets for the home rehearsals and concerts have become traditional, inquiries are received from all sorts of sources daily by Manager Charles A. Ellis asking for information concerning the disposition of tickets. This indicates a steady increase in the public interest in this enterprise, which is essential to the continuance of the influence sought to be maintained by its public spirited founder and patron, Henry L. Higginson.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Intending purchasers should note the dates omitted in the weekly home appearances of the orchestra, these being Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892; Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 17, 1893, in the public rehearsal series: and Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892; Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, in that of the concerts.

—TWENTY-I

Boston Sunday Globe. SUNDAY, SEPT. 11, 1892. 11

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

90 PERFORMERS,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS FROM OCT. 15, 1892, to APRIL 29, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 5, DEC. 10, 1892, JAN. 14, FEB. 11 AND MARCH 18, 1893, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 14, 1892, TO APRIL 28, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 4, DEC. 9, 1892, JAN. 13, FEB. 10 AND MARCH 17, 1893.

A SELECT CHORUS WILL PARTICIPATE OCCASIONALLY IN THE CONCERTS, AND THE BEST AVAILABLE SOLOISTS WILL APPEAR.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.
All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next week will be largely taken up with the auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts. The orchestra will enter upon its twelfth season in better form than ever before for the maintenance of the high standard of excellence which is expected.

A select chorus will participate occasionally in the concerts and the best available soloists will appear.

On Monday morning, Sept. 19, at 10 o'clock, in Music Hall, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction; on Tuesday morning, Sept. 20, at 10 o'clock, the $7 50 seats for the public rehearsals. The same rule will apply as in former years—not more than four seats being offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line.

On Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7 50 seats for the concerts, under the same rules as those governing the public rehearsals.

Circulars giving full particulars may be had at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thousands of patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are reminded that the auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 19, 20, 22 and 23. Mr. Nikisch has spent a great deal of his time this summer in examining new works, many of which will be produced with a fair proportion of standard works by the old masters. The best available soloists will appear; also a select chorus will participate occasionally. Circulars, giving full particulars, at Music Hall.

MUSICAL PROMISES.

Treats in Store for Patrons of Symphony Concerts.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra long ago became the leading feature of each musical year, and the countless admirers of this superb organization will read with interest the plans made for its twelfth season, which are more comprehensive than ever before.

The orchestra will number 90 performers. No changes of importance will be made in its membership, improvement in this respect being considered hardly possible.

A feature will be introduced this season that cannot fail to add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts. This is the organization of a select chorus to appear occasionally with the orchestra.

The chorus will be in charge of Mr. Arthur Foote, whose well-known ability in this work will doubtless attract to its ranks many of the best resident singers.

Great care will be taken in the selection of the voices, and it is expected in a short time to reach the high artistic standard of the orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch, as is well known, had extraordinary success in directing choral performances during his conductorship in Leipzic.

With the co-operation of this choir he will have facilities for the production of works for chorus and orchestra not before enjoyed by a conductor in this city. Some memorable performances may be expected of works seldom or never before heard here, and a welcome variety not before possible will be given to the concerts.

Mr. Nikisch has already arranged most of the programmes for the strictly orchestral concerts. They contain a fair proportion of standard works of the old masters and of compositions of the modern school, as well as a goodly number of interesting novelties.

Among the novelties to have a hearing are the following:

Liszt	Faust symphony (with chorus)
Eugen D'Albert	Symphony (new)
Tschaikowsky	Symphony, E minor, No. 5
Saint-Saens	Symphony, A minor, Op. 55
Rudorff	Symphony, G minor, No. 2
Dvorak	Dramatic overture, Hussitska
Richard Strauss,	Symphonic poem, Death and Apotheosis
Tschaikowsky	Symphonic poem, Tempest
Wagner	Scene I. from Das Rheingold (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters.)
Thierot	Symphonietta, Op. 55
Cesar Cui	Petite Suite, Op. 43 (In modo popolari)
Bazinni	Overture, King Lear
Riemenschneider	Symphonic poem, Todtentanz
Cherubini	Overture, Ali Baba
Reinecke	Overture, King Manfred
Raff	Symphonietta for wind instruments
Charpentier	Impressions d'Italie
Philip
Heuberger	Symphonic poem, Fruhlingswagen
Brahms	Nachtmusik for string orchestra
Liszt	Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus
Brahms	Vintage chorus from Prometheus
	Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra

Several novelties by American composers will also be included. Some of the standard works to be played are:

Beet oven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	Italian
Berlioz	Romeo and Juliette
Berlioz	Overture, King Lear
Dvorak	Symphony, D major
Dvorak	Serenade for strings
Wagner	Tristan and Isolde music
Wagner	Kaisermarsch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring overture
Macdowell	Symphonic poem, Launcelot and Elaine
Macdowell	Piano concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B flat major
Gade	Symphony, B flat major
Smetana	Overture, Verkaufte Braut
Saint-Saens	Symphonic poem, Phaeton
Grieg	Suite, from Holberg's Time

The soloists engaged are the best available artists. Some who may be expected are Paderewski, Joseffy, Macdowell, Stasny, Nowell, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin and probably Mme. Emma Eames.

The great German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen of Berlin, will make his debut in this city at one of the concerts.

It will be seen from these facts that the season promises to be one of exceptional brilliancy.

The series will consist of the usual 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 15, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The following arrangements have been made for the ticket sales, to begin Monday, Sept. 19:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 a. m. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

—Mr. Adamowski planned to sail for home Sept. 20, unless the cholera scare should send him back earlier.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch are at home in Brookline again after a round of pleasant summer visits.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1892.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The swift circuit of the year is marked again by the annual symphony season of 24 public rehearsals and the same number of concerts. Patrons are reminded that the auction sale of tickets for these concerts takes place next week, beginning on Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 o'clock, and continues on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday in Music Hall. Circulars giving full information mailed on application.

—Mr. Arthur Foote is busy organizing a chorus for the use of the Symphony orchestra on such occasions as Mr. Nikisch will desire to introduce vocal music. It will be a very welcome feature.

[4]

...Y ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

...NING, SEPT. 12, 1892.

...AL SYMPHONIES.

...Attractive Programme Announced for ... Coming Season—A Chorus of 200 ... to Assist.

...e date approaches for the opening of ... th season of the symphony concerts, ...gins point to a series of entertainments ...sual interest and importance, and ... may well be trusted to maintain her ...blished prestige as a musical centre by ...enerous and intelligent support of our ...most American orchestra.

The orchestra's season, as at present ar...ged, includes about 100 public appear...es, aside from those incidental to its ...nual Western tour, half of these being ...en to the concerts and public rehearsals ... this city, six in Providence, four in ...orcester, 10 in Cambridge, five each in ...New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, ...d 10 public rehearsals and concerts in ...Brooklyn. The Boston series begins at ...usic Hall on Friday afternoon and Satur... evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

The membership of the organization re...ains essentially the same as last season. ...Conductor Arthur Nikisch having retained ...ractically all of 90 musicians who took ...art in last year's concerts, and the general ...cheme for the season remains largely the ...ame as that of earlier years. One impor...ant addition has been arranged for the ...ome concerts of the orchestra at Music ...all, this consisting of the organization of ...chorus of mixed voices, numbering about ...00, to take part in certain works which are ...to be given as a part of the regular series of ...programmes, as well as, possibly, to assist ...in other concerts. This chorus will be ...rilled by Arthur Foote.

A change contemplated in placing the or...hestra will interest those familiar with ...the arrangement of the various divisions in ...former years. The men will be seated upon ...a platform rising in the shape of an amphi...theatre from the conductor's desk, with the ...first and second violins upon the immediate ...left and right of the conductor, then the ...violas and 'celli, with the wind and tym...pani in the centre, the double bases being ...divided at the back of either of the two ...wings, and separated by the wind players.

Mr. Nikisch announces numerous attrac...tive novelties for the season's programme. ...Among the works to be given a first hear...ing in these concerts are: Liszt, Faust Sym...phony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, ...Symphony (new); Tschaikowsky Symphony, ...E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, ...A minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, G ...minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic overture, ..."Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, Symphonic ...poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschai...kowsky, Symphonic poem, "Tempest;" ...Wagner, scene 1, from "Das Rhein...gold;" (Alberch and the Rhine ...Daughters;) Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; ...Cesar Cui, petite suite, Op. 43 (in modo ...populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" ...Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Tod...tentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" ...Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, ...symphonietta for wind instruments; Char...pentier, Impressions d'Italie: Philip Schar...wenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswa...gen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string ...orchestra: Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo ...and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus ...from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schickalslied ...for chorus and orchestra.

The season's scheme will also include ...performances of the following standard ...compositions: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. ...2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. ...2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Men...delssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and ...Juliette;" Berlioz, overture, "King ...Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; ...Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wag...ner, "Tristan and Isolde," music; ...Wagner, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, Sym...phony No. 2; Goldmark, Spring Overture; ...Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot ...and Elaine"; Macdowell, Piano concerto; ...Mozart, Symphony, D major, Haydn, Sym...phony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, ...B-flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Ver...kaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic ...poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, Suite, from "Hol...berg's Time."

A brilliant array of soloists is promised, ...among the vocalists being Miss Emma ...Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy ...Sherwin, who has not sung in America for ...several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma ...Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond ...von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. ...The pianists of the season will include ...Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl ...Stasny and George M. Nowell.

The omitted dates in the Boston season ...are Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan 13 and ...14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18.

The scale of prices for season tickets will ...be the same as last year—$12 and $7 50, ac...cording to location. The $12 seats for the ...rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music ...Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A.M. The $7 50 ...seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auc...tion at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 ...A.M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auc...tion will be on sale at the box office, Music ...Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats ...for the concerts will be sold at auction at ...Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, ...at 10 A.M. The $7 50 seats for the con...certs will be sold in like manner at the same ...place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A.M. Bids ...will be accepted for seats in their regular ...order only, and not for the choice; and no ...more than four seats will be sold on one ...bid. The seats open to competition will ...be shown on a diagram, and will be marked ...off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in ...the hall, and must be paid for as soon as ...bought, or they will be resold. All seats ...remaining unsold after the auction will be ...on sale at the box office on and after Satur...day, Sept. 24.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Twelfth Series of Concerts—The Novelties Which Are Promised.

The scheme for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the most attractive ever put forward by that organization. It includes several new features, the most important being the organization of a chorus of mixed voices to take part with the orchestra in occasional concerts. This gives a wider scope to the enterprise, and adds a welcome variety to the concerts. The orchestra will number 90 performers and the chorus about 200.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, as customary. The best available soloists will appear, one notable engagement being with M. Paderewski.

Mr. Nikisch, recognizing the responsibility that rests upon him in the selection of programmes, has been engaged during the entire summer in arranging them. He has read the scores of all new works that gave promise of being worthy a place in these concerts, and from a great number has chosen the following novelties for performance:

Liszt	Faust Symphony (with chorus)
Eugen D'Albert	Symphony (new)
Tschaikowsky	Symphony, E minor, No. 5
Saint-Saens	Symphony, A minor, Op. 55
Rudorff	Symphony, G minor, No. 2
Dvorak	Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska"
Richard Strauss,	Symphonic Poem, "Death and Apotheosis"
Tschaikowsky	Symphonic Poem, "Tempest"
Wagner	Scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters.)
Thierot	Symphonietta, Op. 55
Cesar Cui	Petite Suite, Op. 43 (in modo popolari)
Bazzini	Overture, "King Lear"
Riemenschneider	Symphonic Poem, "Todtentanz"
Cherubini	Overture, "Ali Baba"
Reinecke	Overture, "King Manfred"
Raff	Symphonietta for wind instruments
Charpentier	Impressions d'Italie
Philip Scharwenka	Symphonic Poem, "Fruhlingswagen"
Heuberger	Nachtmusik for string orchestra
Brahms	Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus
Liszt	Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus"
Brahms	Schickalslied for chorus and orchestra

Among the standard works to be given are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	"Italian"
Berlioz	"Romeo and Juliette"
Berlioz	Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorak	Symphony, D major
Dvorak	Serenade for strings
Wagner	"Tristan and Isolde" music
Wagner	Kaisermarch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring Overture
Macdowell	Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell	Piano Concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B-flat major
Gade	Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana	Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"
Saint-Saens	Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"
Grieg	Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7 50, according to location. The sale of season tickets will take place next week, the arrangements being as follows:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct 15, 1892, to April 8, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24.

sep13

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 11, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very attractive and it is gratifying to know that there is every indication that the coming year will be the most successful in its history.

The Orchestra will number ninety performers, the membership being practically the same as last year. As usual twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. A new feature that will add much to the attractiveness of the concerts will be the occasional performance of works for chorus and orchestra. To enable Mr. Nikisch to give such works, a permanent chorus will be organized, which will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote.

An unusual number of interesting novelties have been accepted for performance including the following:

Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold;" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cesar Cui, petite suite, op. 43 (in modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen; Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schickalslied for chorus and orchestra; also several new compositions by American composers. Among the standard works to be given are: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies No. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music; Wagner, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Goldmark, spring overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time"; M. Paderewski, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin and other distinguished soloists have already been engaged.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales are as follows: The $12 seats for rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 11.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before, and will be read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization.

The orchestra, this year, will number ninety performers, and will again be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. There will be no changes of importance in the membership. As in former years, twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and Friday afternoons. A scheme, long under consideration, will be carried out this fall, that cannot fail to add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts. This is the organization of a select chorus to appear occasionally with the Orchestra. The utmost care will be taken in forming this chorus, and it is expected in a short time to reach the high artistic standard of the Orchestra. With the co-operation of this choir Mr. Nikisch will have facilities for the production of works for chorus and orchestra never before enjoyed by a conductor in this city, and subscribers may reasonably look for performances of works seldom or never before heard here. The programmes for the strictly orchestral concerts are already arranged. They contain a fair proportion of standard works of the old masters and of the modern school, as well as a goodly number of interesting novelties, among them the following: Liszt, Faust Symphony (with chorus); Eugen (D'Albert, Symphony (new); Tschaikowski, Symphony, E-minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, A-minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, G-minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska," Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, Symphonic Poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, Scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, Op. 43 (in modo Populari), Bazzini, Overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, Symphonic Poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, Overture, "Ali Baba;" Reineke, Overture, "King Manfred;" Charpentier, "Impressions d'Italie;" Philip Scharwenka, Symphonic Poem," Frühlingswagen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra;" Brahms, Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schickalslied for chorus and orchestra; Raff, Symphonietta for wind instruments; also several new compositions by American composers. Some of the standard works to be played are: Beethoven, Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, Symphony No. 2; Brahms, Symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, Symphony, D-major; Serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, Symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Piano Concerto; Mozart, Symphony, D major; Haydn, Symphony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, B flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saëns, Symphonic Poem, "Phaëton"; Grieg, Suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski, and others to be expected are Joseffy, Macdowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin, and probably Mme. Emma Eames. The great German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Mühlen, of Berlin, will make his debut in this city at one of the concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales will remain as heretofore. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 19 and 20. The seats for the concerts are to be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 22 and 23. Fuller particulars will be found in the advertisements.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1892.

The Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will begin on Saturday night, Oct. 15. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor, his fourth season. The following are the arrangements for the sale of season tickets:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office Sept. 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 23; seats not taken for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The scheme for the season so far as made up includes many works that are entirely new to Boston, besides those that have not before been heard in these concerts. Counting as novelties all those that have not been played by the orchestra, the following list shows a remarkable array of new things:

D'Albert, symphony; Tschaikowsky, fifth symphony: Saint-Saens, symphony, op. 55; Rudorff, second symphony; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "The Tempest"; Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold"; Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cui, suite, op 43 (in popular style); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Dance of Death"; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta, wind instruments; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy"; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Awakening of Spring"; Heuberger, serenade, strings.

Other new things are these in which the chorus to be organized for the season will take part:

Liszt, "Faust" symphony and vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, rhapsody for alto solo and male chorus and "Song of Destiny."

The familiar works selected are these:

Beethoven, symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9, the chorus assisting in the last; Schumann, second symphony; Brahms, third and fourth symphonies; Mendelssohn, "Italian" symphony; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major, and serenade, strings; Wagner, selections from "Tristan and Isolde" and Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, second symphony and "Spring" overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and pianoforte concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B-flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Married for Money;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Der Boston Telegraph

Mittwoch den, 14. September. 1892

—Symphonie-Konzerte. Das Interesse an den Symphonie-Konzerten ist für die bevorstehende Saison noch reger als je zuvor. Die 12. Saison dieser berühmten Konzerte wird mit der öffentlichen Probe am Freitag, den 14. Oktober, und mit dem ersten großen Konzert am Sonnabend Abend, den 15. Oktober, ihren Anfang nehmen. Allem Anscheine nach verspricht die kommende Saison die wichtigste in der Geschichte der Symphonie-Konzerte zu werden. Die Zusammensetzung der Organisation wird im Wesentlichen so sein wie im Vorjahre. Der Dirigent, Herr Arthur Nikisch, hat fast alle seine 100 Musiker wieder engagirt. Eine wichtige Neuerung wird die Einführung eines großen gemischten Chors, bestehend aus 100 Stimmen, sein. Dieser Chor wird bei der Aufführung großer Werke mitwirken. Herr Arthur Foote, der bekannte Pianist, wird den Chor einüben. Herr Foote wird eine gute Stütze für den Direktor Nikisch sein. Das Orchester wird nach dem gegenwärtigen Plane eine Serie von 100 öffentlichen Konzerten geben, wobei die westliche Tour nicht mit eingerechnet ist. Die Hälfte hiervon wird in dieser Stadt stattfinden, die anderen finden wie folgt statt: 6 in Providence, 4 in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, 5 je in New-York, Philadelphia und Baltimore, und 10 öffentliche Proben und Konzerte in Brooklyn. Die Bostoner Serie beginnt in Music-Hall am Freitag Nachmittag, den 14. Oktober und Sonnabend Abend, den 15. Oktober. Die Billets werden genau so wie in früheren Jahren verabfolgt. Die $12-Sitze für die Proben werden am Montag, den 19. September, um 10 Uhr Vormittags in Music-Hall versteigert. Die $7.50-Sitze werden am folgenden Tage zur selben Stunde versteigert. Die von der Versteigerung übrig gebliebenen Billets werden am Mittwoch, den 21. September, am Billet-Schalter verkauft. Die $12-Sitze für die Konzerte werden am Donnerstag, den 22. September, um 10 Uhr Vormittags in Music-Hall versteigert. Die $7.50-Sitze für die Konzerte werden am darauffolgenden Freitag in gleicher Weise verkauft. Die Nachfrage nach Billets scheint reger als je zuvor zu sein, und eine erfolgreiche Saison ist gesichert, eine Thatsache, welche für den Gründer der Konzerte, Herrn Henry L. Higginson, eine große Genugthuung ist. Herr Charles Ellis ist auch in diesem Jahre der Geschäftsführer der Konzerte.

[5]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

An Attractive Programme Announced for the Coming Season—A Chorus of 200 Voices to Assist.

As the date approaches for the opening of the 12th season of the symphony concerts, all signs point to a series of entertainments of unusual interest and importance, and Boston may well be trusted to maintain her established prestige as a musical centre by a generous and intelligent support of our foremost American orchestra.

The orchestra's season, as at present arranged, includes about 100 public appearances, aside from those incidental to its annual Western tour, half of these being given to the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and 10 public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn. The Boston series begins at Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

The membership of the organization remains essentially the same as last season. Conductor Arthur Nikisch having retained practically all of 90 musicians who took part in last year's concerts, and the general scheme for the season remains largely the same as that of earlier years. One important addition has been arranged for the home concerts of the orchestra at Music Hall, this consisting of the organization of a chorus of mixed voices, numbering about 200, to take part in certain works which are to be given as a part of the regular series of programmes, as well as, possibly, to assist in other concerts. This chorus will be drilled by Arthur Foote.

A change contemplated in placing the orchestra will interest those familiar with the arrangement of the various divisions in former years. The men will be seated upon a platform rising in the shape of an amphitheatre from the conductor's desk, with the first and second violins upon the immediate left and right of the conductor, then the violas and 'celli, with the wind and tympani in the centre, the double bases being divided at the back of either of the two wings, and separated by the wind players.

Mr. Nikisch announces numerous attractive novelties for the season's programme. Among the works to be given a first hearing in these concerts are: Liszt, Faust Symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, Symphony (new); Tschaikowsky Symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, A minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, Symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene 1, from "Das Rheingold;" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters;) Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, petite suite, Op. 43 (in modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Rimenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra: Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra.

The season's scheme will also include performances of the following standard compositions: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette;" Berlioz, overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde," music; Wagner, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, Symphony No. 2; Goldmark, Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, Piano concerto; Mozart, Symphony, D major, Haydn, Symphony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, Suite, from "Holberg's Time."

A brilliant array of soloists is promised, among the vocalists being Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell.

The omitted dates in the Boston season are Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan 13 and 14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year—$12 and $7 50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A.M. The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A.M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A.M. The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A.M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Twelfth Series of Concerts—The Novelties Which Are Promised.

The scheme for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the most attractive ever put forward by that organization. It includes several new features, the most important being the organization of a chorus of mixed voices to take part with the orchestra in occasional concerts. This gives a wider scope to the enterprise, and adds a welcome variety to the concerts. The orchestra will number 90 performers and the chorus about 200.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, as customary. The best available soloists will appear, one notable engagement being with M. Paderewski.

Mr. Nikisch, recognizing the responsibility that rests upon him in the selection of programmes, has been engaged during the entire summer in arranging them. He has read the scores of all new works that gave promise of being worthy a place in these concerts, and from a great number has chosen the following novelties for performance:

Liszt	Faust Symphony (with chorus)
Eugen D'Albert	Symphony (new)
Tschaikowsky	Symphony, E minor, No. 5
Saint-Saens	Symphony, A minor, Op. 55
Rudorff	Symphony, G minor, No. 2
Dvorak	Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska"
Richard Strauss,	Symphonic Poem, "Death and Apotheosis"
Tschaikowsky	Symphonic Poem, "Tempest"
Wagner	Scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters.)
Thierot	Symphonietta, Op. 55
Cesar Cui	Petite Suite, Op. 43 (In modo populari)
Bazzini	Overture, "King Lear"
Riemenschneider	Symphonic Poem, "Todtentanz"
Cherubini	Overture, "Ali Baba"
Reinecke	Overture, "King Manfred"
Raff	Symphonietta for wind instruments
Charpentier	Impressions d'Italie
Philip Scharwenka	Symphonic Poem, "Fruhlingswagen"
Heuberger	Nachtmusik for string orchestra
Brahms	Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus
Liszt	Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus"
Brahms	Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra

Among the standard works to be given are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	"Italian"
Berlioz	"Romeo and Juliette"
Berlioz	Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorak	Symphony, D major
Dvorak	Serenade for strings
Wagner	"Tristan and Isolde" music
Wagner	Kaisermarch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring Overture
Macdowell	Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell	Piano Concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B-flat major
Gade	Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana	Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"
Saint-Saens	Symphonic Poem, "Phaeton"
Grieg	Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7 50, according to location. The sale of season tickets will take place next week, the arrangements being as follows:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24. 1t sep13

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 11, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement for the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very attractive and it is gratifying to know that there is every indication that the coming year will be the most successful in its history.

The Orchestra will number ninety performers, the membership being practically the same as last year. As usual twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. A new feature that will add much to the attractiveness of the concerts will be the occasional performance of works for chorus and orchestra. To enable Mr. Nikisch to give such works, a permanent chorus will be organized, which will be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote.

An unusual number of interesting novelties have been accepted for performance including the following:

Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Ppotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold;" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cesar Cui, petite suite, op. 43 (in modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta, wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen; Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra; also several new compositions by American composers. Among the standard works to be given are: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies No. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Davorak, symphony, D major; Davorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music; Wagner, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Goldmark, spring overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time"; M. Paderewski, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin and other distinguished soloists have already been engaged.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales are as follows: The $12 seats for rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 11.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before, and will be read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization.

The orchestra, this year, will number ninety performers, and will again be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. There will be no changes of importance in the membership. As in former years, twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and Friday afternoons. A scheme, long under consideration, will be carried out this fall, that cannot fail to add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts. This is the organization of a select chorus to appear occasionally with the Orchestra. The utmost care will be taken in forming this chorus, and it is expected in a short time to reach the high artistic standard of the Orchestra. With the co-operation of this choir Mr. Nikisch will have facilities for the production of works for chorus and orchestra never before enjoyed by a conductor in this city, and subscribers may reasonably look for performances of works seldom or never before heard here. The programmes for the strictly orchestral concerts are already arranged. They contain a fair proportion of standard works of the old masters and of the modern school, as well as a goodly number of interesting novelties, among them the following: Liszt, Faust Symphony (with chorus); Eugen (D'Albert, Symphony (new); Tschaikowski, Symphony, E-minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, A-minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, G-minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska," Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, Symphonic Poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, Scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, Op. 43 (in modo Populari), Bazzini, Overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, Symphonic Poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, Overture, "Ali Baba;" Reineke, Overture, "King Manfred;" Charpentier, "Impressions d'Italie;" Philip Scharwenka, Symphonic Poem, "Frühlingswagen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra;" Brahms, Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra; Raff, Symphonietta for wind instruments; also several new compositions by American composers. Some of the standard works to be played are: Beethoven, Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, Symphony No. 2; Brahms, Symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, Symphony, D-major; Serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, Symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, Symphonic Poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," Piano Concerto; Mozart, Symphony, D major; Haydn, Symphony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, B flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"; Saint-Saëns, Symphonic Poem, "Phaëton"; Greig, Suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski, and others to be expected are Joseffy, Macdowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Amy Sherwin, and probably Mme. Emma Eames. The great German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Mühlen, of Berlin, will make his debut in this city at one of the concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales will remain as heretofore. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 19 and 20. The seats for the concerts are to be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 22 and 23. Fuller particulars will be found in the advertisements.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1892.

The Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall will begin on Saturday night, Oct. 15. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor, his fourth season. The following are the arrangements for the sale of season tickets:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 19; $7,50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office Sept. 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 23; seats not taken for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The scheme for the season so far as made up includes many works that are entirely new to Boston, besides those that have not before been heard in these concerts. Counting as novelties all those that have not been played by the orchestra, the following list shows a remarkable array of new things:

D'Albert, symphony; Tschaikowsky, fifth symphony: Saint-Saens, symphony, op. 55; Rudorff, second symphony; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "The Tempest"; Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold"; Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cui, suite, op 43 (in popular style); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Dance of Death"; Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta, wind instruments; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy"; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Awakening of Spring"; Heuberger, serenade, strings.

Other new things are these in which the chorus to be organized for the season will take part:

Liszt, "Faust" symphony and vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, rhapsody for alto solo and male chorus and "Song of Destiny."

The familiar works selected are these:

Beethoven, symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9, the chorus assisting in the last; Schumann, second symphony; Brahms, third and fourth symphonies; Mendelssohn, "Italian" symphony; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major, and serenade, strings; Wagner, selections from "Tristan and Isolde" and Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, second symphony and "Spring" overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and pianoforte concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B-flat major; Gade, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Married for Money;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Der Boston Telegraph

Mittwoch den, 14. September. 1892

— Symphonie-Konzerte. Das Interesse an den Symphonie-Konzerten ist für die bevorstehende Saison noch reger als je zuvor. Die 12. Saison dieser berühmten Konzerte wird mit der öffentlichen Probe am Freitag, den 14. Oktober, und mit dem ersten großen Konzert am Sonnabend Abend, den 15. Oktober, ihren Anfang nehmen. Allem Anscheine nach verspricht die kommende Saison die wichtigste in der Geschichte der Symphonie-Konzerte zu werden. Die Zusammensetzung der Organisation wird im Wesentlichen so sein wie im Vorjahre. Der Dirigent, Herr Arthur Nikisch, hat fast alle seine 100 Musiker wieder engagirt. Eine wichtige Neuerung wird die Einführung eines großen gemischten Chors, bestehend aus 100 Stimmen, sein. Dieser Chor wird bei der Aufführung großer Werke mitwirken. Herr Arthur Foote, der bekannte Pianist, wird den Chor einüben. Herr Foote wird eine gute Stütze für den Direktor Nikisch sein. Das Orchester wird nach dem gegenwärtigen Plane eine Serie von 100 öffentlichen Konzerten geben, wobei die westliche Tour nicht mit eingerechnet ist. Die Hälfte hiervon wird in dieser Stadt stattfinden, die anderen finden wie folgt statt: 6 in Providence, 4 in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, 5 je in New-York, Philadelphia und Baltimore, und 10 öffentliche Proben und Konzerte in Brooklyn. Die Bostoner Serie beginnt in Music-Hall am Freitag Nachmittag, den 14. Oktober und Sonnabend Abend, den 15. Oktober. Die Billets werden genau so wie in früheren Jahren verabfolgt. Die $12-Sitze für die Proben werden am Montag, den 19. September, um 10 Uhr Vormittags in Music-Hall versteigert. Die $7.50-Sitze werden am folgenden Tage zur selben Stunde versteigert. Die von der Versteigerung übrig gebliebenen Billets werden am Mittwoch, den 21. September, am Billet-Schalter verkauft. Die $12-Sitze für die Konzerte werden am Donnerstag, den 22. September, um 10 Uhr Vormittags in Music-Hall versteigert. Die $7.50-Sitze für die Konzerte werden am darauffolgenden Freitag in gleicher Weise verkauft. Die Nachfrage nach Billets scheint reger als je zuvor zu sein, und eine erfolgreiche Saison ist gesichert, eine Thatsache, welche für den Gründer der Konzerte, Herrn Henry L. Higginson, eine große Genugthuung ist. Herr Charles Ellis ist auch in diesem Jahre der Geschäftsführer der Konzerte.

[5]

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

IF NOT DELIVERED IN 5 DAYS,
RETURN TO
SCHUBERTH & CO.
23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 19th, 1892.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall this (Monday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before and will be read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization.

The orchestra this year will number ninety performers, and will again be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. There will be no changes of importance in the membership. As in former years, twenty four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and Friday afternoons. A scheme, long under consideration, will be carried out this fall that cannot fail to add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts. This is the organization of a select chorus to appear occasionally with the orchestra. The utmost care will be taken in forming this chorus and it is expected in a short time to reach the high artistic standard of the orchestra.

With the co-operation of this choir Mr. Nikisch will have facilities for the production of works for chorus and orchestra never before enjoyed by a conductor in this city, and subscribers may reasonably look for performances of works seldom or never before heard here. The programs for the strictly orchestral concerts are already arranged. They contain a fair proportion of standard works of the old masters and of the modern school, as well as a goodly number of interesting novelties, among them the following: Liszt, "Faust" symphony (with chorus); Eugen d'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint Saëns, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, op. 43 (in modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reineke, overture, "King Manfred;" Charpentier, "Impressions d'Italie;" Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswagen;" Heuberger, "Nachtmusik" for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, "Schickalslied" for chorus and orchestra; Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; also several new compositions by American composers. Some of the standard works to be played are Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette;" overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski, and others to be expected are Joseffy, MacDowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin and probably Mrs. Emma Eames. The great German tenor Raimond von Zur Mühlen, of Berlin, will make his début in this city at one of the concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales will remain as heretofore. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Monday and Tuesday, September 19 and 20. The seats for the concerts are to be sold on Thursday and Friday, September 22 and 23.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Five Concerts

. . IN . .

CHICKERING HALL, NEW YORK.

Special Notice to Subscribers.

Subscribers for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chickering Hall can secure the seats reserved for them at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, on and after Monday, September 19. Subscribers are requested to call for their tickets before Monday, September 26, when the public sale will open.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

THURSDAY EVENING, November 3.
THURSDAY EVENING, December 8.
THURSDAY EVENING, January 12.
THURSDAY EVENING, February 9.
THURSDAY EVENING, March 16.

Subscription Tickets for the Series of Five Concerts, . . . $6.50.

Entire Ocean Chicago 9/11.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twelfth annual season Oct. 14. The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during this season in a number of unfamiliar compositions for chorus and orchestra, as well as, possibly, in some large works in which the orchestra takes a subordinate part. Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and, from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season, and many which the Boston orchestra will give a first performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday. The announcements already made have created a great interest in the coming season, which promises to be the most successful in the career of the organization.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1892

On Monday morning the sale of the Symphony seats begins. This will be the twelfth season, and while the orchestra itself will remain as last season, with Mr. Nikisch as conductor, new features are to be introduced; a select chorus will participate occasionally, and the best available soloists will appear. For the benefit of our readers who may wish to attend the auction sales the following dates will be useful. The sale of $12 season tickets for public rehearsals at Music Hall, Monday, September 19, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $7.50 season tickets for public rehearsals, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 20, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $12 season tickets for concerts, at Music Hall, Thursday, September 22, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $7.50 season tickets for concerts, at Music Hall, Friday, September 23, at 10 A. M. All seats that may remain unsold will be on sale at the box-office on and after Saturday, the 24th.

[6]

UNITED STATES POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

IF NOT DELIVERED IN 5 DAYS,
RETURN TO
SCHUBERTH & CO.
23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

UNITED STATES POSTAGE TWO 2 CENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 19th, 1892.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall this (Monday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE plans made for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more comprehensive than ever before and will be read with interest by the many patrons of this fine organization.

The orchestra this year will number ninety performers, and will again be under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. There will be no changes of importance in the membership. As in former years, twenty four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings and Friday afternoons. A scheme, long under consideration, will be carried out this fall that cannot fail to add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts. This is the organization of a select chorus to appear occasionally with the orchestra. The utmost care will be taken in forming this chorus and it is expected in a short time to reach the high artistic standard of the orchestra.

With the co-operation of this choir Mr. Nikisch will have facilities for the production of works for chorus and orchestra never before enjoyed by a conductor in this city, and subscribers may reasonably look for performances of works seldom or never before heard here. The programs for the strictly orchestral concerts are already arranged. They contain a fair proportion of standard works of the old masters and of the modern school, as well as a goodly number of interesting novelties, among them the following: Liszt, "Faust" symphony (with chorus); Eugen d'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint Saëns, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberich and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cesar Cui, Petite Suite, op. 43 (in modo populari); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reineke, overture, "King Manfred;" Charpentier, "Impressions d'Italie;" Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswagen;" Heuberger, "Nachtmusik" for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage Chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, "Schickalslied" for chorus and orchestra; Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; also several new compositions by American composers. Some of the standard works to be played are Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette;" overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski, and others to be expected are Joseffy, MacDowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin and probably Mrs. Emma Eames. The great German tenor Raimond von Zur Mühlen, of Berlin, will make his début in this city at one of the concerts. The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year, $12 and $7.50, according to location. The arrangements for the ticket sales will remain as heretofore. The seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Monday and Tuesday, September 19 and 20. The seats for the concerts are to be sold on Thursday and Friday, September 22 and 23.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Five Concerts

IN

CHICKERING HALL, NEW YORK.

Special Notice to Subscribers.

Subscribers for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chickering Hall can secure the seats reserved for them at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, on and after Monday, September 19. Subscribers are requested to call for their tickets before Monday, September 26, when the public sale will open.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

THURSDAY EVENING, November 3.
THURSDAY EVENING, December 8.
THURSDAY EVENING, January 12.
THURSDAY EVENING, February 9.
THURSDAY EVENING, March 16.

Subscription Tickets for the Series of Five Concerts, . . . $6.50.

Eng. Corn. Chicago 9th

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twelfth annual season Oct. 14. The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during this season in a number of unfamiliar compositions for chorus and orchestra, as well as, possibly, in some large works in which the orchestra takes a subordinate part. Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and, from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season, and many which the Boston orchestra will give a first performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Music Hall next week, beginning on Monday. The announcements already made have created a great interest in the coming season, which promises to be the most successful in the career of the organization.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1892

On Monday morning the sale of the Symphony seats begins. This will be the twelfth season, and while the orchestra itself will remain as last season, with Mr. Nikisch as conductor, new features are to be introduced; a select chorus will participate occasionally, and the best available soloists will appear. For the benefit of our readers who may wish to attend the auction sales the following dates will be useful. The sale of $12 season tickets for public rehearsals at Music Hall, Monday, September 19, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $7.50 season tickets for public rehearsals, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 20, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $12 season tickets for concerts, at Music Hall, Thursday, September 22, at 10 A. M.; the sale of $7.50 season tickets for concerts, at Music Hall, Friday, September 23, at 10 A. M. All seats that may remain unsold will be on sale at the box-office on and after Saturday, the 24th.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
9-13

MUSICAL WORLD.

The Boston Symphony season includes about 100 appearances, aside from those accidental to its annual Western tour, half of these being given o the concerts and public rehearsals in Boston, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn. Ninety musicians will take part. One important addition has been arranged for the home concerts of the orchestra at Music Hall, this consisting of the organization of a chorus of mixed voices, numbering about 200, to take part in certain works which are to be given as a part of the regular series of programs, as well as, possibly, to assist in other concerts. The chorus will be drilled by Arthur Foote.

As already stated in the Journal the Boston Symphony concerts will open in Boston, Oct. 14th. The following details are of interest:

Mr. Nikisch announces numerous attractive novelties for the season's program. Among the works to be given a first hearing in these concerts are: Liszt, Faust Symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, Symphony (new); Tschaikowsky Symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, A minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, C minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, Symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene 1, from "Das Rheingold;" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters;) Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, petits suite, Op. 43 (in modo popular); Bazzini overture, "King Lear;" Rimenschneider, Symphonic poem, "Todtentauz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, Vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schickalslied for chorus and orchestra.

The season's scheme will also include performances of the following standard compositions: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. [illegible] D; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde," music; Wagner, Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, Symphony No. 2; Goldmark, Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, Symphony, D major; Haydn, Symphony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Verkaufte, Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, Suite, from "Holberg's Time."

A brilliant array of soloists is promised among the vocalists being Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell. The omitted dates in the Boston season are Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan. 13 and 14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year—$12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The sales of tickets for the twelfth Symphony season—which are to take place in Music Hall next week according to the plan advertised elsewhere—will very probably attract greater attention than those of any previous year. If they do, it will be because a better prospect of the winter's plans has been vouchsafed, and definite promises made as to what the principal works for the orchestra will be. Mr. Nikisch has showed in his second and third season a disposition to introduce a good number of novelties, and these were as fresh to Boston as if some of them had not been previously heard in New York. His list for 1892-3 contains symphonies by Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky, Rudorf, and D'Albert; symphonic poems by Richard Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Riemenschneider and Scharwenka; overtures, suites, etc., by Dvorák, Thiérot, Cesare Cui, Bazzini, Cherubini, Reinecke, Raff, Charpentier and Henberger, besides choral music by Brahms and Liszt. The selections thus far made from standard music and known compositions are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	"Italian"
Berlioz	"Romeo and Juliet"
Berlioz	Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorák	Symphony, D major
Dvorák	Serenade for strings
Wagner	"Tristan und Isolde," music
Wagner	Kaisermarsch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring Overture
Macdowell	Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell	Piano concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B-flat major
Gade	Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana	Overture, "Verkaufte Brunt"
Saint-Saëns	Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"
Grieg	Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The solo roster cannot be made up very far in advance, but the names already recorded are satisfactory. Among the vocalists will be Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell. Reference has been made to vocal music, and this department has been provided for by the organization of a special choir of about two hundred voices, which Mr. Arthur Foote will prepare for its public duties. Altogether, the prospectus is notable and encouraging.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER, 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The chorus that is being organized by Arthur Foote will add a potent attraction to the scheme and make possible the performance of a class of music that it has long been the desire of the management to include in the programmes. The partial list of music to be played already published, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is fully alive to his opportunities, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find places on his programmes. It is impossible to present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, but the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where but few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. It is in one sense a compliment to its chief when the interpretation of a piece is criticised and the conductor alone is held responsible, since it is in effect an admission that he has impressed his individuality on the entire host under him; that he has made, as Berlioz says, the orchestra into one instrument upon which he plays at will. Nor need the members of the band feel that this result is an indication of a surrender of their personal importance; rather is it a proof of the development among them of artist natures, which thus consent to be moulded into an artistic whole.

The arrangements for the sale of season tickets for the season in the Music Hall, the twelfth, are again repeated below. Public opinion has long ago accepted the auction as the fairest method of disposing of these tickets. Even with the premiums—excepting, of course, the enormous ones which are paid for a very few tickets only—the prices are very much lower than will buy the opportunities to hear concerts of equal merit in any city of the United States or Europe. They who purpose to buy are advised to attend the sales in person. Ladies will have no difficulty in making bids. These are the established terms and conditions:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats at auction next Monday; $7.50 seats at auction Tuesday; seats not taken, for sale at the office Wednesday.

Concerts—$12 seats at auction, Thursday; $7.50 seats at auction Friday; seats not taken for sale at the office Saturday.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and for premiums in addition to the price of the ticket; not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, A. M.

The season will begin on Oct. 15 and will include twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 18, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(80 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held at Music Hall, the coming week, beginning tomorrow, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The scheme for the coming season possesses more attractive features than ever before, and there is every indication that the demand for tickets will be unprecedented.

The chorus now being organized by Mr. Arthur Foote will enable Mr. Nikisch to introduce in some of the concerts works for chorus and orchestra, adding a feature that cannot fail to be of great interest.

The partial list of works selected for performance, which has already appeared in this column, indicates that Mr. Nikisch has given much attention to the preparation of his programme, and that he is disposed to find a place in them for worthy compositions of all schools.

It is impossible to give a complete list of soloists, but many notable engagements have already been named, the most important, perhaps, being that of M. Paderewski, the celebrated pianist.

Other eminent artists to be expected are Messrs. Joseffy, Macdowell, Nowell, Stasny, Herr von der Muhlen, the great German tenor; Miss Emma Juch and Mme. Amy Sherwin.

The rules governing the auction sales are the same as last year.

The cheaper seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday and the tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday.

A new arrangement of the players of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been made as follows: A series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat will form an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre and the basses at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1892.

BEST SYMPHONY TICKET BRINGS $392.

Extraordinary Premium Paid for a Season Ticket to the Rehearsals.

It was an exciting scene that took place in Music Hall this morning in the course of the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The sale had been of only ordinary interest up to the point when the seats in Row 1 were being disposed of. The bidding had ranged about a third higher than that of last year, but the highest premium that had been paid was $69, while the average price had been a trifle less than $40. When the first of the seats ordinarily occupied by Mrs. John L. Gardner was offered for sale, every one began to look around. The first bid was $20, and as fast as the auctioneer could speak the price was raised by steps of $1 each to $60. From that point the jumps were of $5 each, until at last the seat was obtained for $150. Stewart, the ticket agent, was the successful bidder, and after a moment's hesitation he took three seats, leaving one on the aisle untaken.

"How much am I offered for the next seat?" asked the auctioneer.

"Seventy dollars," was the reply.

This was a most unusual starting bid, and there was a chorus of whispers of "Oh!" and "Ah!" By quick jumps the price went up, up, until it seemed as if the bids would never stop. At length $380 was offered, and at this the bidding stopped. Mr. Stewart was the successful purchaser, and he took the single seat that was left.

All the other sales made at the auction seemed tame when compared with this one transaction, but otherwise they would have been considered unusually good. There was a large attendance at the sale, but, as is usual, the ticket agents had most of the bidding to do. Each of them had a long list of patrons to secure places for and they did it, but at higher prices than have been known before.

The comparatively undesirable seats on the short front rows found ready purchasers at premiums ranging from $8 to $10, and the seats in the rows back brought much higher prices, those on the centre aisles commanding premiums of $58, $52, $61, $69 and $75 in the fifth, sixth, eighth and tenth rows respectively.

Only the $12 seats for the rehearsals were sold this morning. At 10 A. M. tomorrow the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, and any rehearsal seats not taken at the auction will be placed on sale at the Music Hall box office on Wednesday. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall on Thursday, beginning at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats Friday. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1892-93.

REHEARSALS. 297

No. .....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1892-93.

REHEARSALS. 513

No. .....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1892.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

TWELFTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL, THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 22. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 23.

[7]

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 9-13

MUSICAL WORLD.

The Boston Symphony season includes about 100 appearances, aside from those incidental to its annual Western tour, half of these being give- o the concerts and public rehearsals in Boston, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn. Ninety musicians will take part. One important addition has been arranged for the home concerts of the orchestra at Music Hall, this consisting of the organization of a chorus of mixed voices, numbering about 200, to take part in certain works which are to be given as a part of the regular series of programs, as well as, possibly, to assist in other concerts. The chorus will be drilled by Arthur Foote.

As already stated in the Journal the Boston Symphony concerts will open in Boston, Oct. 14th. The following details are of interest:

Mr. Nikisch announces numerous attractive novelties for the season's program. Among the works to be given a first hearing in these concerts are: Liszt, Faust Symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, Symphony (new); Tschaikowsky Symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, Symphony, A minor, Op. 55; Rudorff, Symphony, C minor, No. 2; Dvorak, Dramatic overture, "Hussitska; "Richard Strauss, Symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, Symphonic peem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene 1, from "Das Rheingold;" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters;) Thierot, Symphonietta, Op. 55; Cesar Cui, petite suite, Op. 43 (in modo popolari); Bazzini overture, "King Lear;" Rimenschneider, Symphonic poem, "Todtentauz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen;" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra.

The season's scheme will also include performances of the following standard compositions: Beethoven, symphonies Nos. [illegible]; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies Nos. 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian"; Berloiz, "Romeo and Juliette"; Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Dvorak, symphony, D major; Dvorak, serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde," music; Wagner. Kaisermarch; Goldmark, Symphony No. 2; Goldmark, Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Macdowell, piano concerto; Mozart, Symphony, D major; Haydn, Symphony, B-flat major; Gade, Symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, Overture, "Verkaufte, Braut"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem, "Phaeton"; Grieg, Suite, from "Holberg's Time."

A brilliant array of soloists is promised among the vocalists being Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell.

The omitted dates in the Boston season are Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan. 13 and 14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same as last year—$12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The sales of tickets for the twelfth Symphony season—which are to take place in Music Hall next week according to the plan advertised elsewhere—will very probably attract greater attention than those of any previous year. If they do, it will be because a better prospect of the winter's plans has been vouchsafed, and definite promises made as to what the principal works for the orchestra will be. Mr. Nikisch has showed in his second and third season a disposition to introduce a good number of novelties, and these were as fresh to Boston as if some of them had not been previously heard in New York. His list for 1892-3 contains symphonies by Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky, Rudorf, and D'Albert; symphonic poems by Richard Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Riemenschneider and Scharwenka; overtures, suites, etc., by Dvorák, Thierot, Cesare Cui, Bazzini, Cherubini, Reinecke, Raff, Charpentier and Henberger, besides choral music by Brahms and Liszt. The selections thus far made from standard music and known compositions are:

Beethoven	Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann	Symphony No. 2
Brahms	Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn	"Italian"
Berlioz	"Romeo and Juliet"
Berlioz	Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorák	Symphony, D major
Dvorák	Serenade for strings
Wagner	"Tristan und Isolde," music
Wagner	Kaisermarsch
Goldmark	Symphony No. 2
Goldmark	Spring Overture
Macdowell	Symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell	Piano concerto
Mozart	Symphony, D major
Haydn	Symphony, B-flat major
Gade	Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana	Overture, "Verkaufte Brunt"
Saint-Saëns	Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"
Grieg	Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The solo roster cannot be made up very far in advance, but the names already recorded are satisfactory. Among the vocalists will be Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell. Reference has been made to vocal music, and this department has been provided for by the organization of a special choir of about two hundred voices, which Mr. Arthur Foote will prepare for its public duties. Altogether, the prospect is notable and encouraging.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER, 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The chorus that is being organized by Arthur Foote will add a potent attraction to the scheme and make possible the performance of a class of music that it has long been the desire of the management to include in the programmes. The partial list of music to be played already published, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is fully alive to his opportunities, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find places on his programmes. It is impossible to present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, but the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where but few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. It is in one sense a compliment to its chief when the interpretation of a piece is criticised and the conductor alone is held responsible, since it is in effect an admission that he has impressed his individuality on the entire host under him; that he has made, as Berlioz says, the orchestra into one instrument upon which he plays at will. Nor need the members of the band feel that this result is an indication of a surrender of their personal importance; rather is it a proof of the development among them of artist natures, which thus consent to be moulded into an artistic whole.

The arrangements for the sale of season tickets for the season in the Music Hall, the twelfth, are again repeated below. Public opinion has long ago accepted the auction as the fairest method of disposing of these tickets. Even with the premiums—excepting, of course, the enormous ones which are paid for a very few tickets only—the prices are very much lower than will buy the opportunities to hear concerts of equal merit in any city of the United States or Europe. They who purpose to buy are advised to attend the sales in person. Ladies will have no difficulty in making bids. These are the established terms and conditions:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats at auction next Monday; $7.50 seats at auction Tuesday; seats not taken, for sale at the office Wednesday.

Concerts—$12 seats at auction, Thursday; $7.50 seats at auction Friday; seats not taken for sale at the office Saturday.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and for premiums in addition to the price of the ticket; not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, A. M.

The season will begin on Oct. 15 and will include twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1892-93.

REHEARSALS.

No. .....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1892-93.

REHEARSALS.

No. .....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

[7]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 18, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held at Music Hall, the coming week, beginning tomorrow, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The scheme for the coming season possesses more attractive features than ever before, and there is every indication that the demand for tickets will be unprecedented.

The chorus now being organized by Mr. Arthur Foote will enable Mr. Nikisch to introduce in some of the concerts works for chorus and orchestra, adding a feature that cannot fail to be of great interest.

The partial list of works selected for performance, which has already appeared in this column, indicates that Mr. Nikisch has given much attention to the preparation of his programme, and that he is disposed to find a place in them for worthy compositions of all schools.

It is impossible to give a complete list of soloists, but many notable engagements have already been named, the most important, perhaps, being that of M. Paderewski, the celebrated pianist.

Other eminent artists to be expected are Messrs. Joseffy, Macdowell, Nowell, Stasny, Herr von der Muhlen, the great German tenor; Miss Emma Juch and Mme. Amy Sherwin.

The rules governing the auction sales are the same as last year.

The cheaper seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday and the tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday.

A new arrangement of the players of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been made as follows: A series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat will form an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre and the basses at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1892.

BEST SYMPHONY TICKET BRINGS $392.

Extraordinary Premium Paid for a Season Ticket to the Rehearsals.

It was an exciting scene that took place in Music Hall this morning in the course of the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The sale had been of only ordinary interest up to the point when the seats in Row 1 were being disposed of. The bidding had ranged about a third higher than that of last year, but the highest premium that had been paid was $69, while the average price had been a trifle less than $40. When the first of the seats ordinarily occupied by Mrs. John L. Gardner was offered for sale, every one began to look around. The first bid was $20, and as fast as the auctioneer could speak the price was raised by steps of $1 each to $60. From that point the jumps were of $5 each, until at last the seat was obtained for $150. Stewart, the ticket agent, was the successful bidder, and after a moment's hesitation he took three seats, leaving one on the aisle untaken.

"How much am I offered for the next seat?" asked the auctioneer.

"Seventy dollars," was the reply.

This was a most unusual starting bid, and there was a chorus of whispers of "Oh!" and "Ah!". By quick jumps the price went up, up, until it seemed as if the bids would never stop. At length $380 was offered, and at this the bidding stopped. Mr. Stewart was the successful purchaser, and he took the single seat that was left.

All the other sales made at the auction seemed tame when compared with this one transaction, but otherwise they would have been considered unusually good. There was a large attendance at the sale, but, as is usual, the ticket agents had most of the bidding to do. Each of them had a long list of patrons to secure places for and they did it, but at higher prices than have been known before.

The comparatively undesirable seats on the short front rows found ready purchasers at premiums ranging from $8 to $10, and the seats in the rows back brought much higher prices, those on the centre aisles commanding premiums of $58, $52, $61, $69 and $75 in the fifth, sixth, eighth and tenth rows respectively.

Only the $12 seats for the rehearsals were sold this morning. At 10 A. M. tomorrow the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, and any rehearsal seats not taken at the auction will be placed on sale at the Music Hall box office on Wednesday. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall on Thursday, beginning at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats Friday. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1892.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

TWELFTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL, THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $12 seats for concerts, THURSDAY, Sept. 22. Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 23.

VOL. XCII., NO. 80.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

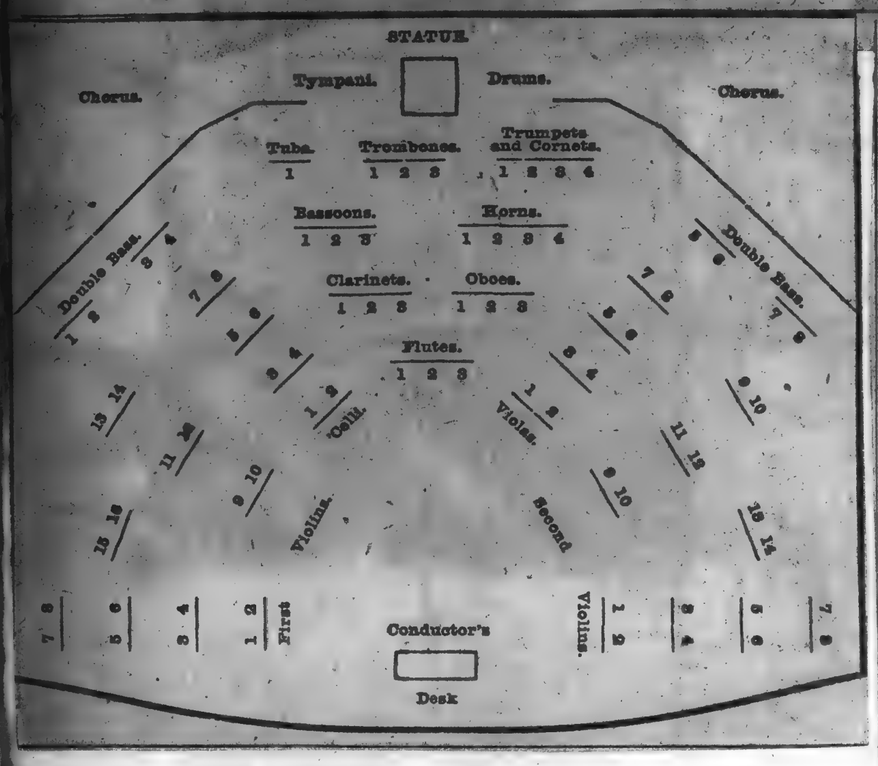
(90 PERFORMERS).

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.



Remarkable Interest in the Symphony Concerts.

The Coming Ticket Sales — That "Music Hall" Scheme—The Henry Mapleson Opera Company — Marie Tempest's New Opera, "The Fencing Master"—Faces and Rumors.

The rare good judgment jointly of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Conductor Arthur Nikisch in making public the very complete outline of the season's plans for the Symphony concerts has had its legitimate result, and the box office people at Music Hall have been kept busy for the last week giving information as to the ticket sales of the coming week.

The average American wants to know what he or she is paying for in his or her purchases, and the ready way in which Conductor Nikisch has adapted his plans to this national characteristic "is greatly to his credit." Few of the earlier seasons of the Boston orchestra have been more fruitful in novelties than that shortly to be begun gives promise of being and the public has ample reason to anticipate a full realization of all the promises made.

As it has become a custom to announce the sale of every seat in the hall for the entire season of both rehearsals and concerts at the close of the week, an increase in the public patronage cannot be had, but there is every reason to anticipate a repetition of the results of recent years in the sales of the coming week.

The rearrangement of the orchestra is a matter of such general interest that a plan of the new seating of the men is presented herewith.

The announcements regarding the sale of seats, at auction, from the Music Hall stage, no more than four being offered on a single bid, are as follows:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 22d, 1892.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS at Music Hall, this (Thursday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

[8]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

TWELFTH SEASON. 1892 93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Auction Sales of Seats for the Twelfth Season Will Take Place in Music Hall This Week — Novelties to Be Presented by Conductor Nikisch during His Fourth Year—A New Arrangement of the Orchestra.

The fact that the auction sales of the seats for the Symphony concerts and rehearsals will take place this week is evidence that summer frivolities are over and that the winter campaign in social, musical and other circles is near at hand. The twelfth Symphony concert season in Music hall will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 15, with the usual rehearsal Friday afternoon preceding, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, his fourth season. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons beginning Oct. 14, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28.

Almost of equal importance with the concerts themselves are the auction sales of seats, at which money wins, and the disposition of the social cohorts about Music hall during the concerts is decided. The arrangements for the season ticket sales at Music hall are as follows:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, 10 a. m., Sept. 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office Sept 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 23; seats not taken for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will begin each day at 10 o'clock.

From a musical standpoint, the coming season will be very interesting. It goes without saying that from the social standpoint it will be the usual dress parade. Many works entirely new to Boston will be given. Counting as novelties all those that have not been played by the orchestra, the following list shows a remarkable array of new things:

D'Albert, symphony; Tschaikowsky, fifth symphony; Saint-Saëns, symphony, op. 55; Rudorff, second symphony; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "The Tempest"; Wagner, scene I, from "Das Rheingold"; Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cui, suite, op. 43 (In popular style); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Dance of Death"; Cherubini, overture, "Ah Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta, wind instruments; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy"; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Awakening of Spring"; Heuberger, serenade, strings.

Other new things are these in which the chorus to be organized for the season will take part: Liszt, "Faust" symphony and vintage chorus from "Prometheus"; Brahms, rhapsody for alto solo and male chorus and "Song of Destiny."

Mendelssohn, "Italian" symphony; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major, and serenade, strings; Wagner, selections from Tristan and Isolde" and Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, second symphony and "Spring" overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and pianoforte concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Married for Money;" Saint Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

It is interesting to note that a new arrangement of the players of the orchestra will be made by means of a series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat, in the form of an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left, respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre, and the bases at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs.

The season of the orchestra will include about one hundred entertainments aside from those of the western tour, half being the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(80 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season, 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The coming Symphony season bids fair to be the most brilliant in the history of that magnificent organization. The addition of the chorus under Mr. Foote has excited unusual interest in the coming concerts, and as for Mr. Nikisch, it is safe to say that he will spare no effort to get the best results from his superb body of musicians. While it is impossible to give at present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

The arrangements for the sale of season tickets for the comingseason in the Music Hall, are given again. Public opinion has long ago accepted the auction as the fairest method of disposing of these tickets. Even with the premiums the prices are very much lower than those at concerts of equal merit in any city of the United States or Europe. Those who propose to buy are advised to attend the sales in person. Ladies will have no difficulty in making bids. The terms are as follows: Public rehearsals, $12 seats at auction tomorrow at 10 A. M. at Music Hall; $7.50 seats at auction Tuesday; seats not taken for sale at the office Wednesday. Concerts, $12 seats at auction Thursday; $7.50 seats at auction Friday; seats not taken for sale at the office Saturday. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and for premiums in addition to the price of the ticket; not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The season will begin on Oct. 15 and will include twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting Nov. 4, Dec 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending April 28.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 80.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

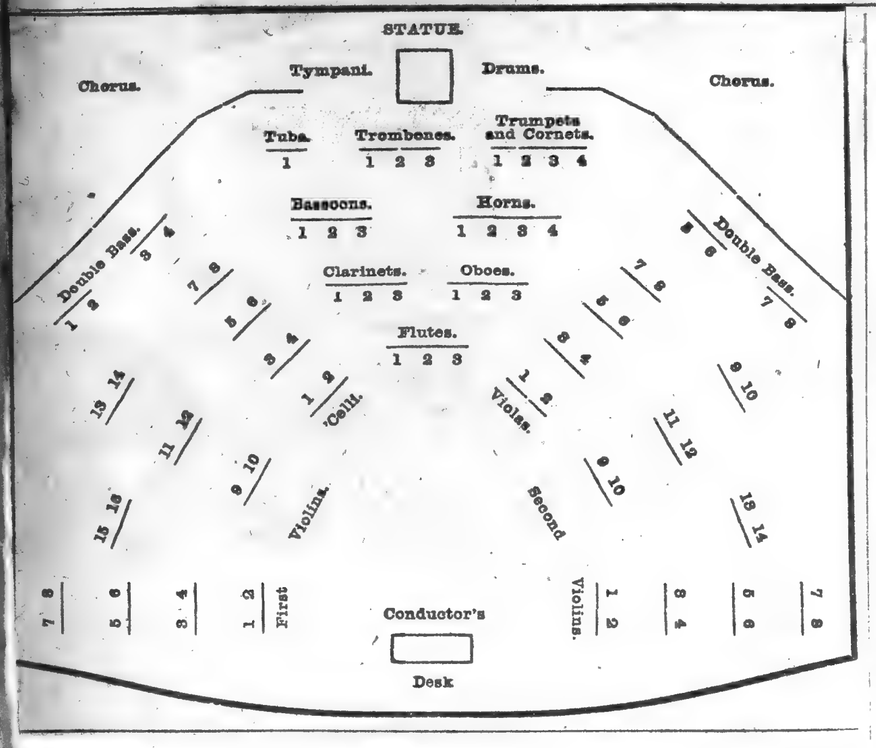
(90 PERFORMERS).

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.



Remarkable Interest in the Symphony Concerts.

The Coming Ticket Sales — That "Music Hall" Scheme—The Henry Mapleson Opera Company — Marie Tempest's New Opera, "The Fencing Master"—Facts and Rumors.

The rare good judgment jointly of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Conductor Arthur Nikisch in making public the very complete outline of the season's plans for the Symphony concerts has had its legitimate result, and the box office people at Music Hall have been kept busy for the last week giving information as to the ticket sales of the coming week.

The average American wants to know what he or she is paying for in his or her purchases, and the ready way in which Conductor Nikisch has adapted his plans to this national characteristic "is greatly to his credit." Few of the earlier seasons of the Boston orchestra have been more fruitful in novelties than that shortly to be begun gives promise of being and the public has ample reason to anticipate a full realization of all the promises made.

As it has become a custom to announce the sale of every seat in the hall for the entire season of both rehearsals and concerts at the close of the week, an increase in the public patronage cannot be had, but there is every reason to anticipate a repetition of the results of recent years in the sales of the coming week.

The rearrangement of the orchestra is a matter of such general interest that a plan of the new seating of the men is presented herewith.

The announcements regarding the sale of seats, at auction, from the Music Hall stage, no more than four being offered on a single bid, are as follows:

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 22d, 1892.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS at Music Hall, this (Thursday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

[8]

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

TWELFTH SEASON. 1892 93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Auction Sales of Seats for the Twelfth Season Will Take Place in Music Hall This Week — Novelties to Be Presented by Conductor Nikisch during His Fourth Year—A New Arrangement of the Orchestra.

The fact that the auction sales of the seats for the Symphony concerts and rehearsals will take place this week is evidence that summer frivolities are over and that the winter campaign in social, musical and other circles is near at hand. The twelfth Symphony concert season in Music hall will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 15, with the usual rehearsal Friday afternoon preceding, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, his fourth season. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons beginning Oct. 14, omitting those of Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28.

Almost of equal importance with the concerts themselves are the auction sales of seats, at which money wins, and the disposition of the social cohorts about Music hall during the concerts is decided. The arrangements for the season ticket sales at Music hall are as follows:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, 10 a. m., Sept. 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office Sept 21.

Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, Sept. 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, Sept. 23; seats not taken for sale at the office Sept. 24.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will begin each day at 10 o'clock.

From a musical standpoint, the coming season will be very interesting. It goes without saying that from the social standpoint it will be the usual dress parade. Many works entirely new to Boston will be given. Counting as novelties all those that have not been played by the orchestra, the following list shows a remarkable array of new things:

D'Albert, symphony; Tschaikowsky, fifth symphony; Saint-Saëns, symphony, op. 55; Rudorff, second symphony; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska"; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "The Tempest"; Wagner, scene I, from "Das Rheingold"; Thierot, symphonietta, op. 55; Cui, suite, op. 43 (In popular style); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear"; Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Dance of Death"; Cherubini, overture, "Ah Baba"; Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred"; Raff, symphonietta, wind instruments; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy"; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Awakening of Spring"; Heuberger, serenade, strings.

Other new things are these in which the chorus to be organized for the season will take part: Liszt, "Faust" symphony and vintage chorus from "Prometheus"; Brahms, rhapsody for alto solo and male chorus and "Song of Destiny."

The [illegible] works [illegible] these: Beethoven, symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9, the chorus assisting in the last; Schumann, second symphony; Brahms, third and fourth symphonies; Mendelssohn, "Italian" symphony; Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major, and serenade, strings; Wagner, selections from Tristan and Isolde" and Kaisermarsch; Goldmark, second symphony and "Spring" overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," and pianoforte concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B-flat major; Smetana, overture, "Married for Money;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

It is interesting to note that a new arrangement of the players of the orchestra will be made by means of a series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat, in the form of an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left, respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre, and the bases at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs.

The season of the orchestra will include about one hundred entertainments aside from those of the western tour, half being the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(80 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Twelfth Season, 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall on TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The coming Symphony season bids fair to be the most brilliant in the history of that magnificent organization. The addition of the chorus under Mr. Foote has excited unusal interest in the coming concerts, and as for Mr. Nikisch, it is safe to say that he will spare no effort to get the best results from his superb body of musicians. While it is impossible to give at present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

The arrangements for the sale of season tickets for the comingseason in the Music Hall, are given again. Public opinion has long ago accepted the auction as the fairest method of disposing of these tickets. Even with the premiums the prices are very much lower than those at concerts of equal merit in any city of the United States or Europe. Those who propose to buy are advised to attend the sales in person. Ladies will have no difficulty in making bids. The terms are as follows: Public rehearsals, $12 seats at auction tomorrow at 10 A. M. at Music Hall; $7.50 seats at auction Tuesday; seats not taken for sale at the office Wednesday. Concerts, $12 seats at auction Thursday; $7.50 seats at auction Friday; seats not taken for sale at the office Saturday. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and for premiums in addition to the price of the ticket; not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

The season will begin on Oct. 15 and will include twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 14, omitting Nov. 4, Dec 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, and ending April 28.

...on Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 20.

PAID $392 FOR A SEAT.

Mrs. Jack Gardner's Agent a High Bidder.

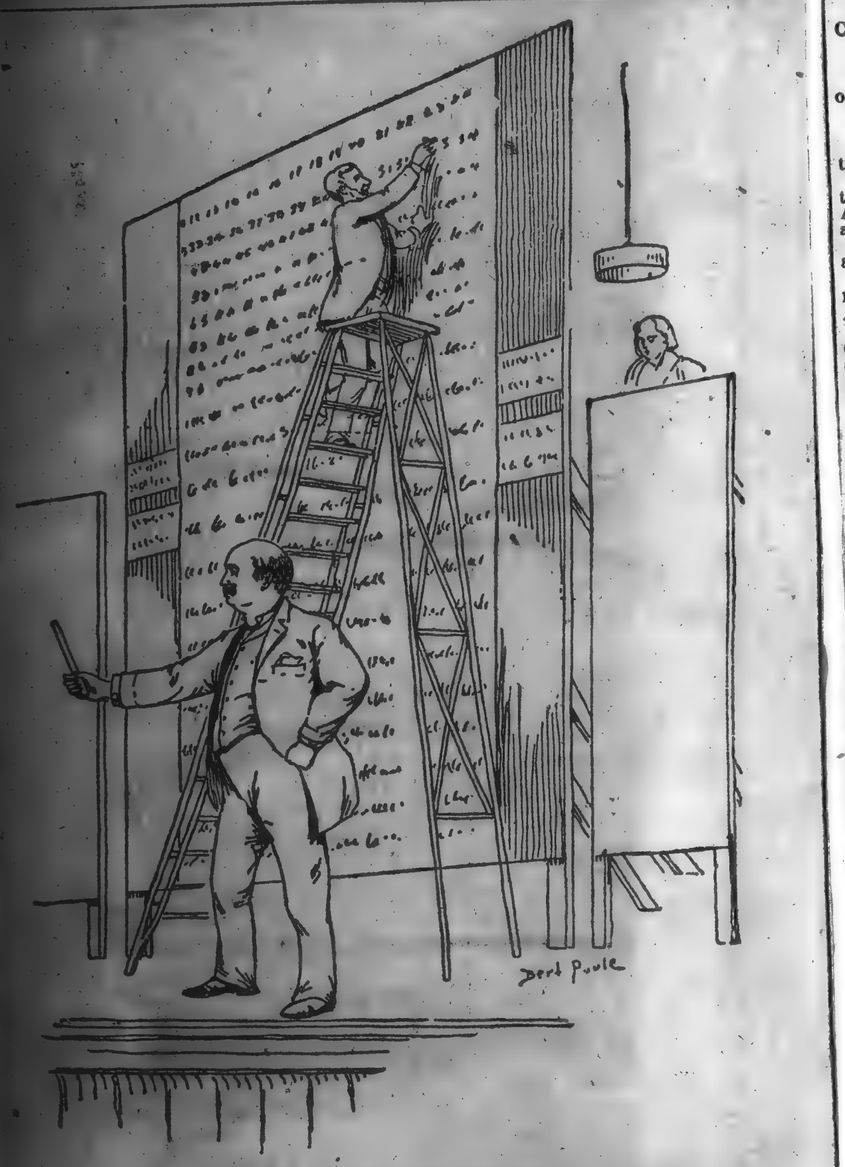
Four Premiums on Four Seats Will Pay the Symphony Fiddler.

Bought Three at $162 Each and Fourth One Was Raised.

OST people would not pay $392 for a single seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the BostonSymphony orchestra. Yet that is what a man did yesterday. A true Bostonian, however, will pay more money for the pleasure of indulging in the symphony fad than for any other thing under the sun, unless it is a glass of ice cream soda.

Yesterday morning the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals began in Music Hall at 10 o'clock.

G. W. STEWART BIDS $380 FOR A SEAT FOR MRS. JACK GARDNER.



THE BIDDING IN PROGRESS.

The hall was comfortably filled with people.

Most of them were buying for themselves.

Many of them were speculators.

Some of them were buying for friends.

Not a few came in just out of curiosity.

Mr. Fred Jackson was again on hand to use out his voice in the endeavor to make people bid, but they did not need any urging.

The seats went like hot cakes.

The $12 seats include all of the floor, with the exception of the last six rows and part of the first balcony.

This is the way you do if you want a seat. You enter from Hamilton pl., and if you have never been there before while the sale of seats is in progress, 10 to 1 you attempt to walk into the office where the assistants are counting out great wads of bills and piles of silver. Another man is giving out the precious pasteboards.

borrow or steal with you, and shout till you are hoarse and black in the face; or, if you prefer, shake your hand at the auctioneer. Keep it up till he says "Going for the third time." Then gracefully walk down to the office, give your name, pay your money, turn and give the people a chance to see what you look like, for they will want to know, and then leave the hall.

Nothing simpler, unless you don't happen to have quite money enough.

And as one of the fat, jolly policemen said yesterday morning, "God help the man without money in that crowd."

As a rule the prices paid were much higher than last year.

There was one rather peculiar incident during the morning, which served to help along the monotony of the buying.

Row "I" had been reached, and in this are some of the best seats in the house.

The bidding began and was run steadily up by jumps of five till the hundred mark was passed. The biggest thing paid before had been $69. People began to get up in their seats to see who was so flush as to pay that amount for a seat. It was Mr. George W. Stewart, the manager of the Germania band, who was buying for a friend.

Finally the price reached $150, and when the auctioneer asked the bidder how many he wanted he said, after some hesitation, that he wanted three. They were for Mrs. Jack Gardner.

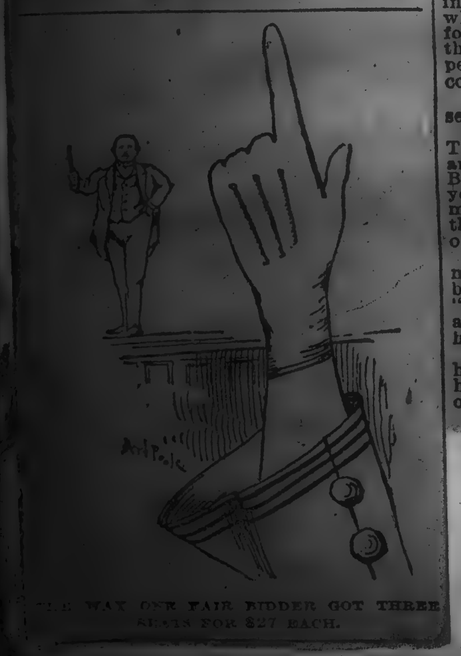
Then the very next seat was put up, and here is the funny thing about the whole matter. The same man bid the next seat in for $380, when he might have had the whole four, which is the limit of one bid, for the $150 premium each that he paid for three. But he probably reasoned that few people would want but one seat, and he could get it cheap.

It was the highest price ever paid for a seat in Music Hall.

See those two giggling girls over there. They do not know whether to bid or not, and this is evidently their first experience. But when they have been buying a few years they will be as unconcerned as the maiden of uncertain summers and about the same winters, who says with a pert toss of her head, "Four, please."

The girl from the Back Bay, with all the money she needed, was out in great numbers. That is her, the one that just said "$20," and then got her two seats with the assurance that papa would not feel it out of his pocket in the least.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will take place today at the same hour, and there you may see the long hair of the artiste in leonine luxuriousness.



THE WAY ONE FAIR BIDDER GOT THREE SEATS FOR $27 EACH.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(9) PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

TWELFTH SEASON. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

In consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the serie of Rehearsals $12 and $7 50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

The recent announcements regarding the Boston Symphony Orchestra have awakened great interest, and there is every indication that its coming season will be the most successful in its career. The chorus, now being organized by Mr. Arthur Foote, will add a potent attraction to the scheme, and will make possible the performance of a class of music that the management have long desired to include in the programmes. The partial list of works selected for performance, which has already appeared in this column, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is alive to his opportunities, and is disposed to find a place in the concerts for worthy compositions of all schools. While the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction, a liberal policy will be pursued in regard to soloists. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall the current week. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold to-morrow. Full particulars may be found in the advertisement.

Theodore Thomas has requested these musical conductors to unite with him in a committee to judge of American compositions to be offered for performance at the World's Fair: Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Asger Hamerik, of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore; Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, of the London Philharmonic Society, and Camille Saint-Saens, of Paris. Mr. Anton Seidl and Mr. Arthur Nikisch declined invitations to serve in this capacity.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 19,

$392 FOR ONE SEAT.

Mrs. Jack Gardner's Agent at the Symphony Sale.

Auctioneer Jackson was "knocking down" chairs in Music Hall this morning for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale was dull this morning for some time, the bidding at its highest reaching only a $69 premium. Taken as a whole, however, the bidding is running higher than last season.

The real excitement came this morning when row I was reached, and the favorite old seats of Mrs. "Jack" Gardner came into question. The bidding was brisk and stopped finally at $150. The bidder gave his name as G. W. Stewart and took three seats. There was a buzz of excitement all over the hall, which was only quieted by a fierce contest for the next seat. The bidding passed over the $150 figure in disdain, and never stopped or its mad career until stopped at $380.

"How many seats?" "One." "What name?" "Stewart."

Then there was more excitement. If Stewart wanted four seats, why did he not take them all at once on the $150 premium? That was the universal query. The natural supposition that Mrs. Gardner was bound to have her old seats at any price was enough to elicit the confession from the bidder that he bought them for her.

But that fourth seat remains unexplained.

Adams House Connelly was on hand as usual to buy for his patrons. He has just returned with some orders he received in Europe. One was from George Coleman, whom he met at the top of the Cathedral in Milan; another was from G. S. Walker, taken at the base of Mt. Vesuvius, and still another was from C. Fitz in Venice. Among Bostonians that he was buying for were: Mrs. R. L. Dexter, R. C. Winthrop, jr., Eben Jordan, jr., Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mrs. Sargent, Mrs. J. C. Phillips.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 82.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 20, 1892.

BIG PREMIUMS PAID.

The Symphony Rehearsal Tickets Fetch High Prices.

The unexpected happened again at the auction sale of tickets for the public rehearsals of the symphony concerts of the coming season, which occurred at Music Hall yesterday.

Last year's figures were looked upon as the very top possible to attain in this enterprise, but in yesterday's sale of the $12 seats there was an advance roughly estimated as giving an increase of 25 per cent. over last season's sale of this class of tickets.

Auctioneer Jackson conducted the sale, under the usual conditions, and was put to his utmost to meet the demands of the buyers, who frequently entered into very sharp competition for choice seats.

The first sale made, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 in slip A, at $8 premium each, proved to be the keynote of the morning's operations, and the prices were rapidly advanced, with results which gave the best possible evidence of the interest felt in this enterprise.

The 14 seats in slip A were sold at $8, $12, $13.50, $14 and $15, and the bids for seats in slip B began at nearly the highest figure had for slip A. In slip B the lowest premium was $14 per seat and the highest $28.50; in slip C the range was from $16 to $31; in slip D from $22 to $34.50, and in slip E from $25.50 to $58, the latter price being the result of a sharp competition by two opposing patrons.

The sensation of the sale was apparently caused by an error of judgment or slip of some sort on the part of one of the professional buyers. He advanced the price in slip J to $150 each seat, and at that figure took Nos. 14, 15 and 16, omitting to ask for No. 17, which is the end seat.

This was quickly noted by his associates and competitors, and, acting with a common purpose upon the instant, they each and all determined that No. 17 should go high.

It resulted in raising the premium on J 17 to $380, or just $16.33 for each rehearsal.

The advance in the prices in the front rows was steadily maintained, the average premium in H being about $70; I, $100; J, $75; K, $70; L, $65; O, P, Q, R and S, about $60. In R the seats 18 and 19 sold up to $105 each.

The demand continued steady to the end of the floor seats front of the balcony, and even the second and third rows under the balcony sold well up to $20 and $25.

The front row of the right balcony ranged from $26 to $52, and the second row from $25 to $40. On the left balcony side facing the stage the front row fetched from $22 to $44, and the second row from $20 to $30.

The centre balcony sold at $25 to $32 for the first, $30 to $23 for the second, $19 to $23 for the third, and at an average of $16 for the fourth and fifth rows.

The $7.50 rehearsal seats will be sold today, beginning at 10 A. M.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

One Seat Brings $392—Ladies Predominate at the Auction Sale Monday.

The sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra began on Monday at Music Hall. There was a very large attendance, the feminine element predominating. The highest price brought within the first hour or two was paid for a selection in the front rows, for which $82 and the premium—$12—was bid, or $296 for the four seats taken. The name was not known, the seats probably being bought on order.

Before noon the auctioneer had only got to row G in his progress from A to Z. At that stage another bid of nearly as high as the first was made, this time $61 being the premium—$73 for the choice.

The sale yesterday was mostly by single seats. When a bidder took more than one seat it elicited some remarks of surprise. There was, though, quite the customary number of speculators on hand, many of them buying on order.

The opinion was expressed that the sale was a very fair one, and from the attendance it was also probable that there would be plenty of takers until the last seat was disposed of.

The sale continued with an increased attendance in the afternoon, and at 3 o'clock the $12 floor seats had all been sold with the exception of the two last rows, in the rear.

J. M. Stewart of the Germania Orchestra paid $392 for one seat in row J shortly after noon, and this was the highest price received, but the general average must have been between $30 and $40 premium, the last seats bringing a premium of about $20.

The sales of balcony choices will no doubt be very satisfactory, especially if the individual buyers continue in force and defeat the plans of the speculators. Thus far this has been the case, but although selections have been made by individuals largely who only took one or two seats at a time, even at the close of the floor sale it had not seemed to so very materially delay the progress of the auction.

The bids at the middle of the afternoon were so quickly accepted—owing to their number decreasing as the result of cheaper offerings—that the purchasers at times besieged the ticket room in great numbers and had to be subject to delay.

As might well be expected, the sale of a seat for $392 was the event of the day. It happened in this wise: The short row of which this was one of four is very well known as the Mrs. John L. Gardner row, and it appeared that Mr. Stewart was acting under orders when he made the first bid for a choice. There was a great competition, partly unexplainable one would think, and not until Mr. Stewart had bid $150 did his rivals subside. He hesitated, then, curiously enough it seemed to the interested spectators, said he would take three, leaving one seat out of the four. But when this was put up, Mr. Stewart "bobbed up serenely," and the resulting competition put the price up to $392, with the result that Mr. Stewart took the seat after all.

On the other side of a low door are the faces of some of the prettiest girls in Boston—and that means the world—who are getting their tickets. All this you see through the glass of the door, and then the policeman tells you that you must walk along further and go in at another door.

Ah! Here you are!

See the man on the step ladder. No, he is not trying to make his mark, except on the charts of the seats which are pasted on to the board.

He has flowing side whiskers, and all the concert world know him as the head usher of the hall.

BOTH BID AT ONCE.

But observe the actions of the man in front of the upright board flourishing a short, fat baton, and pacing the platform like an actor doing heavy tragedy.

You might think that he had lost some money on Sullivan and was bemoaning his fate.

But he is only the auctioneer.

Listen! "Remember, ladies and gentlemen, that the amount you bid is the premium on the price of the seat which is $12. Don't blame me if you make a mistake in this matter. It won't be my fault. Now what do I get for this one. Right in the centre of the house—$10, $15, $18."

And so he goes up the scale until he cannot seem to vamp up the price any higher.

Then he does something with that fat baton which is more than artistic.

He lifts it up about three feet above his head and brings it down into his left hand with a reckless and sublime disregard of the consequences, exclaiming, "Going once."

This little ceremony he repeats three times, and at the third time the seat is declared sold.

Your part in the transaction?

Why, the simplest thing in the world.

Just take lots of money, all you can beg,

[9]

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 20.

PAID $392 FOR A SEAT.

Mrs. Jack Gardner's Agent a High Bidder.

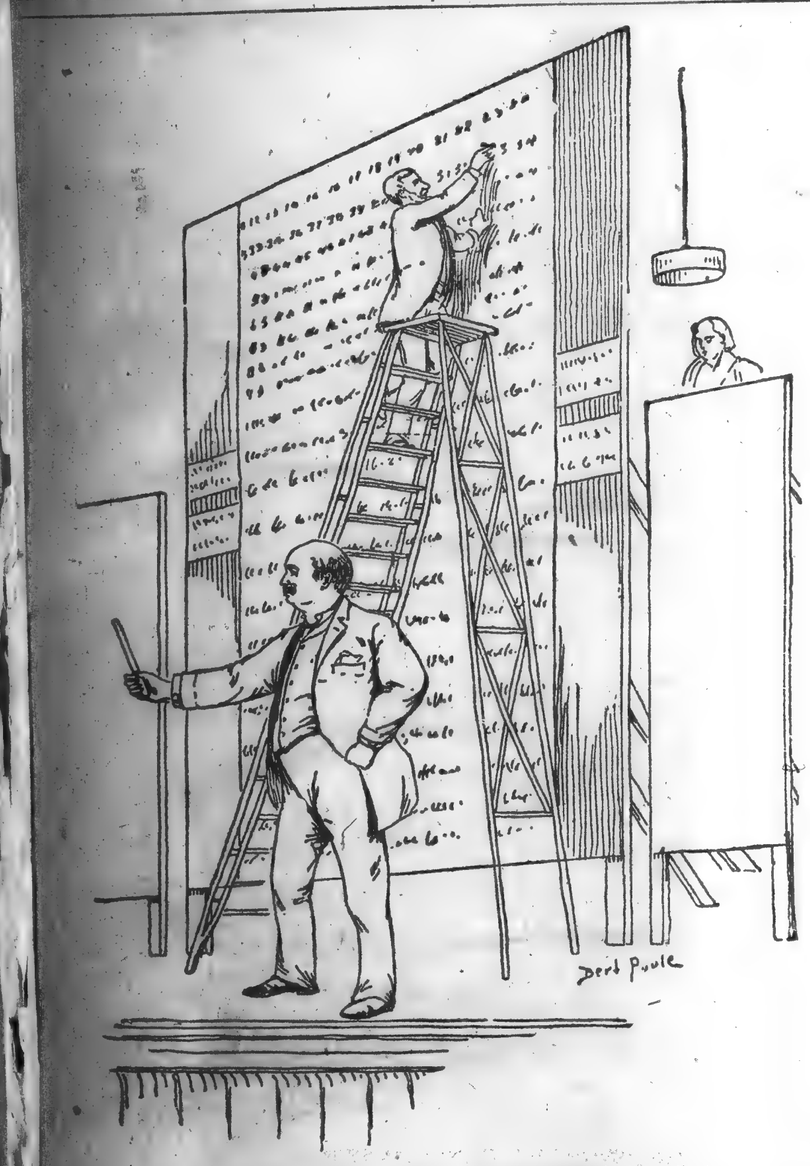
Her Premiums on Four Seats Will Pay the Symphony Fiddler.

Bought Three at $162 Each and Fourth One Was Raised.

MOST people would not pay $392 for a single seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the BostonSymphony orchestra. Yet that is what a man did yesterday. A true Bostonian, however, will pay more money for the pleasure of indulging in the symphony fad than for any other thing under the sun, unless it is a glass of ice cream soda.

Yesterday morning the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals began in Music Hall at 10 o'clock.

G. W. STEWART BIDS $380 FOR A SEAT FOR MRS. JACK GARDNER.



THE BIDDING IN PROGRESS.

The hall was comfortably filled with people.

Most of them were buying for themselves.

Many of them were speculators.

Some of them were buying for friends.

Not a few came in just out of curiosity.

Mr. Fred Jackson was again on hand to use out his voice in the endeavor to make people bid, but they did not need any urging.

The seats went like hot cakes.

The $12 seats include all of the floor, with the exception of the last six rows and part of the first balcony.

This is the way you do if you want a seat.

You enter from Hamilton pl., and if you have never been there before while the sale of seats is in progress, 10 to 1 you attempt to walk into the office where the assistants are counting out great wads of bills and piles of silver. Another man is giving out the precious pasteboards.

THE WAY ONE FAIR BIDDER GOT THREE SEATS FOR $27 EACH.

borrow or steal with you, and shout till you are hoarse and black in the face; or, if you prefer, shake your hand at the auctioneer. Keep it up till he says "Going for the third time." Then gracefully walk down to the office, give your name, pay your money, turn and give the people a chance to see what you look like, for they will want to know, and then leave the hall.

Nothing simpler, unless you don't happen to have quite money enough.

And as one of the fat, jolly policemen said yesterday morning, "God help the man without money in that crowd."

As a rule the prices paid were much higher than last year.

There was one rather peculiar incident during the morning, which served to help along the monotony of the buying.

Row "I" had been reached, and in this are some of the best seats in the house.

The bidding began and was run steadily up by jumps of five till the hundred mark was passed. The biggest thing paid before had been $69. People began to get up in their seats to see who was so flush as to pay that amount for a seat. It was Mr. George W. Stewart, the manager of the Germania band, who was buying for a friend.

Finally the price reached $150, and when the auctioneer asked the bidder how many he wanted he said, after some hesitation, that he wanted three. They were for Mrs. Jack Gardner.

Then the very next seat was put up, and here is the funny thing about the whole matter. The same man bid the next seat in for $380, when he might have had the whole four, which is the limit of one bid, for the $150 premium each that he paid for three. But he probably reasoned that few people would want but one seat, and he could get it cheap.

It was the highest price ever paid for a seat in Music Hall.

See those two giggling girls over there. They do not know whether to bid or not, and this is evidently their first experience. But when they have been buying a few years they will be as unconcerned as the maiden of uncertain summers and about the same winters, who says with a pert toss of her head, "Four, please."

The girl from the Back Bay, with all the money she needed, was out in great numbers. That is her, the one that just said "$20," and then got her two seats with the assurance that papa would not feel it out of his pocket in the least.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will take place today at the same hour, and there you may see the long hair of the artiste in leonine luxuriousness.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(9) PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

TWELFTH SEASON. 1892-93.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

In consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 15, 1892, to April 29, 1893, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 14, 1892, to April 28, 1893, omitting Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available soloists will appear.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the serie of Rehearsals $12 and $7 50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

The $7 50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

The recent announcements regarding the Boston Symphony Orchestra have awakened great interest, and there is every indication that its coming season will be the most successful in its career. The chorus, now being organized by Mr. Arthur Foote, will add a potent attraction to the scheme, and will make possible the performance of a class of music that the management have long desired to include in the programmes. The partial list of works selected for performance, which has already appeared in this column, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is alive to his opportunities, and is disposed to find a place in the concerts for worthy compositions of all schools. While the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction, a liberal policy will be pursued in regard to soloists. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall the current week. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold to-morrow. Full particulars may be found in the advertisement.

Theodore Thomas has requested these musical conductors to unite with him in a committee to judge of American compositions to be offered for performance at the World's Fair: Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Asger Hamerik, of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore; Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, of the London Philharmonic Society, and Camille Saint-Saens, of Paris. Mr. Arton Seidl and Mr. Arthur Nikisch declined invitations to serve in this capacity.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 19,

$392 FOR ONE SEAT.

Mrs. Jack Gardner's Agent at the Symphony Sale.

Auctioneer Jackson was "knocking down" chairs in Music Hall this morning for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale was dull this morning for some time, the bidding at its highest reaching only a $69 premium. Taken as a whole, however, the bidding is running higher than last season.

The real excitement came this morning when row I was reached, and the favorite old seats of Mrs. "Jack" Gardner came into question. The bidding was brisk and stopped finally at $150. The bidder gave his name as G. W. Stewart and took three seats. There was a buzz of excitement all over the hall, which was only quieted by a fierce contest for the next seat. The bidding passed over the $150 figure in disdain, and never stopped or its mad career until stopped at $380.

"How many seats?" "One." "What name?" "Stewart."

Then there was more excitement. If Stewart wanted four seats, why did he not take them all at once on the $150 premium? That was the universal query. The natural supposition that Mrs. Gardner was bound to have her old seats at any price was enough to elicit the confession from the bidder that he bought them for her.

But that fourth seat remains unexplained.

Adams House Connelly was on hand as usual to buy for his patrons. He has just returned with some orders he received in Europe. One was from George Coleman, whom he met at the top of the Cathedral in Milan; another was from G. S. Walker, taken at the base of Mt. Vesuvius, and still another was from C. Fitz in Venice. Among Bostonians that he was buying for were: Mrs. R. L. Dexter, R. C. Winthrop, jr., Eben Jordan, jr., Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mrs. Sargent, Mrs. J. C. Phillips.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 82.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 20, 1892.

BIG PREMIUMS PAID.

The Symphony Rehearsal Tickets Fetch High Prices.

The unexpected happened again at the auction sale of tickets for the public rehearsals of the symphony concerts of the coming season, which occurred at Music Hall yesterday.

Last year's figures were looked upon as the very top possible to attain in this enterprise, but in yesterday's sale of the $12 seats there was an advance roughly estimated as giving an increase of 25 per cent. over last season's sale of this class of tickets.

Auctioneer Jackson conducted the sale, under the usual conditions, and was put to his utmost to meet the demands of the buyers, who frequently entered into very sharp competition for choice seats.

The first sale made, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 in slip A, at $8 premium each, proved to be the keynote of the morning's operations, and the prices were rapidly advanced, with results which gave the best possible evidence of the interest felt in this enterprise.

The 14 seats in slip A were sold at $8, $12, $13.50, $14 and $15, and the bids for seats in slip B began at nearly the highest figure had for slip A. In slip B the lowest premium was $14 per seat and the highest $28.50; in slip C the range was from $16 to $31; in slip D from $22 to $34.50, and in slip E from $25.50 to $58, the latter price being the result of a sharp competition by two opposing patrons.

The sensation of the sale was apparently caused by an error of judgment or slip of some sort on the part of one of the professional buyers. He advanced the price in slip J to $150 each seat, and at that figure took Nos. 14, 15 and 16, omitting to ask for No. 17, which is the end seat.

This was quickly noted by his associates and competitors, and, acting with a common purpose upon the instant, they each and all determined that No. 17 should go high.

It resulted in raising the premium on J 17 to $380, or just $16.33 for each rehearsal.

The advance in the prices in the front rows was steadily maintained, the average premium in H being about $70; I, $100; J, $75; K, $70; L, $65; O, P, Q, R and S, about $60. In R the seats 18 and 19 sold up to $105 each.

The demand continued steady to the end of the floor seats front of the balcony, and even the second and third rows under the balcony sold well up to $20 and $25.

The front row of the right balcony ranged from $26 to $52, and the second row from $25 to $40. On the left balcony side facing the stage the front row fetched from $22 to $44, and the second row from $20 to $30.

The centre balcony sold at $25 to $32 for the first, $20 to $23 for the second, $19 to $23 for the third, and at an average of $16 for the fourth and fifth rows.

The $7.50 rehearsal seats will be sold today, beginning at 10 A. M.

At the other side of a low door are the faces of some of the prettiest girls in Boston—and that means the world—who are getting their tickets. All this you see through the glass of the door, and then the policeman tells you that you must walk along further and go in at another door.

Ah! Here you are!

See the man on the step ladder. No, he is not trying to make his mark, except on the charts of the seats which are pasted on to the board.

He has flowing side whiskers, and all the concert world know him as the head usher of the hall.

BOTH BID AT ONCE.

But observe the actions of the man in front of the upright board flourishing a short, fat baton, and pacing the platform like an actor doing heavy tragedy.

You might think that he had lost some money on Sullivan and was bemoaning his fate.

But he is only the auctioneer.

Listen! "Remember, ladies and gentlemen, that the amount you bid is the premium on the price of the seat which is $12. Don't blame me if you make a mistake in this matter. It won't be my fault. Now what do I get for this one. Right in the centre of the house—$10, $15, $18."

And so he goes up the scale until he cannot seem to vamp up the price any higher.

Then he does something with that fat baton which is more than artistic.

He lifts it up about three feet above his head and brings it down into his left hand with a reckless and sublime disregard of the consequences, exclaiming, "Going once."

This little ceremony he repeats three times, and at the third time the seat is declared sold.

Your part in the transaction?

Why, the simplest thing in the world.

Just take lots of money, all you can beg,

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

One Seat Brings $392—Ladies Predominate at the Auction Sale Monday.

The sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra began on Monday at Music Hall. There was a very large attendance, the feminine element predominating. The highest price brought within the first hour or two was paid for a selection in the front rows, for which $62 and the premium—$12—was bid, or $296 for the four seats taken. The name was not known, the seats probably being bought on order.

Before noon the auctioneer had only got to row G in his progress from A to Z. At that stage another bid of nearly as high as the first was made, this time $61 being the premium—$73 for the choice.

The sale yesterday was mostly by single seats. When a bidder took more than one seat it elicited some remarks of surprise. There was, though, quite the customary number of speculators on hand, many of them buying on order.

The opinion was expressed that the sale was a very fair one, and from the attendance it was also probable that there would be plenty of takers until the last seat was disposed of.

The sale continued with an increased attendance in the afternoon, and at 3 o'clock the $12 floor seats had all been sold with the exception of the two last rows, in the rear.

J. M. Stewart of the Germania Orchestra paid $392 for one seat in row J shortly after noon, and this was the highest price received, but the general average must have been between $30 and $40 premium, the last seats bringing a premium of about $20.

The sales of balcony choices will no doubt be very satisfactory, especially if the individual buyers continue in force and defeat the plans of the speculators. Thus far this has been the case, but although selections have been made by individuals largely who only took one or two seats at a time, even at the close of the floor sale it had not seemed to so very materially delay the progress of the auction.

The bids at the middle of the afternoon were so quickly accepted—owing to their number decreasing as the result of cheaper offerings—that the purchasers at times besieged the ticket room in great numbers and had to be subject to delay.

As might well be expected, the sale of a seat for $392 was the event of the day. It happened in this wise: The short row of which this was one of four is very well known as the Mrs. John L. Gardner row, and it appeared that Mr. Stewart was acting under orders when he made the first bid for a choice. There was a great competition, partly unexplainable one would think, and not until Mr. Stewart had bid $150 did his rivals subside. He hesitated, then, curiously enough it seemed to the interested spectators, said he would take three, leaving one seat out of the four. But when this was put up, Mr. Stewart "bobbed up serenely," and the resulting competition put the price up to $392, with the result that Mr. Stewart took the seat after all.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The Prices Range Much Higher Than Last Year.

Auctioneer Jackson was "knocking down" chairs in Music Hall yesterday for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale was extremely dull for some time, the bidding at its highest reaching only a $69 premium. Taken as a whole, however, the bidding is running higher than last season.

The real excitement came this morning when row I was reached, and the favorite old seats of Mrs. J. L. Gardner came into question. The bidding was brisk and stopped finally at $150. The bidder gave his name as G. W. Stewart and took three seats. There was a buzz of excitement all over the hall, which was only quieted by a fierce contest for the next seat. The bidding passed over the $150 figure in disdain, and never stopped on its mad career until stopped at $380.

"How many seats?" "One." "What name?" "Stewart."

Then there was more excitement. If Stewart wanted four seats, why did he not take them all at once on the $150 premium? That was the universal query. The natural supposition that Mrs. Gardner was bound to have her old seats at any price was enough to elicit the confession from the bidder that he bought them for her.

But that fourth seat remains unexplained.

BOSTON IDEAS.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The chorus that is being organized by Arthur Foote will add a potent attraction to the scheme and make possible the performance of a class of music that it has long been the desire of the management to include in the programme.

The partial list of music to be played, already published, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is fully alive to his opportunities, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find places on his programmes. It is impossible to present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, but the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where but few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony orchestra is superlatively fine.

It is in one sense a compliment to its chief when the interpretation of a piece is criticised and the conductor alone is held responsible, since it is in effect an admission that he has impressed his individuality on the entire host under him; that he has made, as Berlioz says, the orchestra into one instrument upon which he plays at will.

Nor need the members of the band feel that this result is an indication of a surrender of their personal importance; rather is it a proof of the development among them of artist natures, which thus consent to be moulded into an artistic whole.—Boston Transcript.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall will open Saturday evening, October 15. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of November 5, December 10, January 14, February 11, and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning October 14, omitting those of November 4, December 9, January 13, February 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. This is Mr. Arthur Nikisch's fourth season as conductor. The arrangements for the sale of season tickets: Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, September 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, September 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office September 21. Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, September 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, September 23; seats not taken, for sale at the office September 24. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered, to be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will be held in the Music hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

The attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals, at Music Hall this morning, was not so large as that of yesterday. The $7.50 seats found ready purchasers. Those on the floor away back under the gallery went at $6 to $8.50, the highest premium paid for any of these being $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly, the ticket agent, paid $35.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

HIGHER PRICES THAN LAST YEAR.

Ready Bidders for All the $7.50 Seats at the Symphony Rehearsals.

There was one disappointed young lady in Music Hall this forenoon. She had come to attend the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra, but she had determined that she would pay no phenomenal price for a seat. Richer persons could pay premiums of $380 if they chose, but she would not go beyond $5. When bids were called for for the first of the $7.50 seats she was prompt in replying "Five dollars!" But there were other bidders, and she saw the seat purchased for $14.50 premium. For half an hour she made first bids of "Five dollars," but every time the price ran up far beyond her limit, and the comparatively undesirable seats beneath the gallery on the back row on the floor found ready purchasers at prices ranging from $6 to $8.50.

The attendance was not so large as at the sale on yesterday, but all were would-be purchasers. The ticket speculators had few orders to place in this part of the hall, and music lovers contended one with another for the coveted places. The highest premium paid for any of the seats under the gallery was $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly, the ticket agent, paid $35.

Instead of diminishing, the enthusiasm seemed to increase as the sale went on, and by one o'clock every seat in the house had been sold. It had been announced that those seats for the rehearsals remaining unsold would be offered at the box-office tomorrow morning, but not a single ticket is left unpurchased. The auction sale of $12 seats for the concerts will be held Thursday morning beginning at ten o'clock, while the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be disposed of in the same manner Friday. If there should be any seats unsold—from the indications today there will be none—they will be sold at the Music Hall box-office on Saturday.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable Enthusiasm Manifested and Good Sales Result.

The attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals, at Music Hall on Tuesday, was not so large as that of Monday. The $7 50 seats found ready purchasers. Those on the floor away back under the gallery went at $6 to $8 50, the highest premium paid for any of these being $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly paid $35.

Instead of diminishing, the enthusiasm seemed to increase as the sale went on, and by 1 o'clock every seat in the house had been sold. It had been announced that those seats for the rehearsals remaining unsold would be offered at the box office this morning, but not a single ticket is left unpurchased. The auction sale of $12 seats for the concerts will be held Thursday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, while the $7 50 seats for the concerts will be disposed of in the same manner Friday. If there should be any seats unsold—from the indications to-day there will be none—they will be sold at the Music Hall box office on Saturday.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Cond'r.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS.

ON consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 15 to April 9, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available Soloists will appear.

SEASON TICKETS, with reserved seats for the series, $12 and $7 50, according to location.

THE AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS WILL BE HELD AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (THURSDAY), BEGINNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

The auction sales of tickets for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—twelfth season in the Music Hall—will be held tomorrow for the $12 seats, and on Friday for the $7.50 seats. These sales will begin at ten o'clock A. M., and will be held in in the Music Hall.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 83.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 21, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The interest shown by the auction sale of seats to the Symphony concerts indicates a social even more than an artistic attraction. If we are not mistaken, the suggestion that the seats at these concerts should be disposed of by auction was originally made by us as a means of overcoming the obvious defects of the scramble for places in the line that had previously existed. As matters are now conducted the premiums on the seats go entirely, with the exception of the slight commission paid to ticket dealers, who are employed to represent purchasers, to the promoter of the concerts, Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a disposition of the bonus in every way better than that which had previously been made of it. We dare say that this addition in the form of premiums, which must now amount to very much more than the fixed income through tickets, has enabled Mr. Higginson to make a number of improvements and to hold out inducements to artists that were hardly possible before, even with his generous and public spirited method of carrying on this enterprise; hence, the value of the concerts given has probably appreciated when judged of on a strictly mercantile basis.

But that this has been brought about by a departure from the original intentions of the originator of this series of entertainments is too well known to need more than a fair statement. We are obtaining in Boston performances of orchestral music through the maintenance of a permanent, high class orchestra superior to those given or obtainable in any city on the American continent, and in many, and perhaps most, respects equal to the best given in any of the musical centres of the old world. But, adding the premium which the tickets command to the regular price of admission, the cost of these entertainments to those who attend them is by no means a small one. We do not refer to such an extraordinary price as that paid for one seat at the auction of rehearsal tickets on Monday—a price which made each concert cost to the purchaser more than $16—but to the average price for reasonably good seats. These latter were disposed of on a range of premiums entailing the payment of from $2 to $4 per concert, an amount obviously beyond the means of persons of limited incomes.

If it could be said that this demand was due to the willingness of a large number of our people to make great financial sacrifices simply for the purpose of hearing musical performances of a high class rendered by artists of a high grade, the statement would be a very creditable indorsement of the artistic development attained by the residents of Boston and its vicinity. But, unfortunately, there is reason for thinking that this extraordinary demand is due more to social than to artistic considerations, and that a very considerable number of those whose bids have tended to raise the scale of premiums attend the concerts of the Symphony orchestra, not from a special love of music, but because it is considered in certain ranges of society the proper thing to do. It may furthermore be added that the probable effect of the fashionable demand has been to lessen the sum total of obtainable musical enjoyment by the exclusion of those who would appreciate the concerts much more than do many of those who attend them.

We do not state this in criticism of the management, for the reason that we do not see how Mr. Higginson can in any way be held responsible for the change that has taken place in his original plan of procedure. The only suggestion that can be given is one which we have made in the past, and which has been in some degree followed by those having charge of these entertainments; that is, increasing as far as possible the number of concerts given, or, in other words, providing a new series for those who find it financially impossible to attend the rehearsals and the final concerts. Years ago the Philharmonic Society in New York used to give first and second public rehearsals before its concerts, and while this system may have in it certain defects it might be well to see whether its adoption here, completely or in some modified form, would not be possible. It may be added that as fashion is uncertain in its dictates, in a few years more the changes that it makes may give larger opportunities to music lovers, even in those entertainments that are now accorded. Twenty-five years ago the Harvard Symphony concerts were supported by the social prestige connected with attendance upon them. But later on the fancy changed; social leaders turned in other directions, and, unfortunately in this case, the transition brought about the financial collapse of what [illegible] deserving enterprise.

Date 9/20

[illegible] SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The [illegible] to the Boston Symphony concerts held yesterday, which tickets to the [illegible] rehearsals only were sold, was a striking proof of the hold these fine entertainments have acquired upon the general public, the amount realized being in advance of the large sale of last season.

Regarding the large sums paid for premiums, reaching in some instances to $150, and in one case to $380, it may be said that this may be considered not altogether in the line of competition, but as one way of manifesting a friendly interest in the plan of the concerts, and incidentally aiding in the maintenance of the great scheme. Here is a good object lesson to the friends of the Worcester Festival, many of whom are able and willing to aid its very worthy aims in precisely the same way, should their attention be called to the matter in just the right manner.

TIMES, Gloucester, Mass.

Date 9-20

Mrs. Jack Gardner paid $362 yesterday for a seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Concert at Music Hall, also purchasing [illegible] at $162 each.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1892-93.
CONCERTS.
No. 373
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1892-93.
CONCERTS. 437
No.
Premium,
Name,

[10]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The Prices Range Much Higher Than Last Year.

Auctioneer Jackson was "knocking down" chairs in Music Hall yesterday for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale was extremely dull for some time, the bidding at its highest reaching only a $69 premium. Taken as a whole, however, the bidding is running higher than last season.

The real excitement came this morning when row I was reached, and the favorite old seats of Mrs. J. L. Gardner came into question. The bidding was brisk and stopped finally at $150. The bidder gave his name as G. W. Stewart and took three seats. There was a buzz of excitement all over the hall, which was only quieted by a fierce contest for the next seat. The bidding passed over the $150 figure in disdain, and never stopped on its mad career until stopped at $380.

"How many seats?" "One." "What name?" "Stewart."

Then there was more excitement. If Stewart wanted four seats, why did he not take them all at once on the $150 premium? That was the universal query. The natural supposition that Mrs. Gardner was bound to have her old seats at any price was enough to elicit the confession from the bidder that he bought them for her.

But that fourth seat remains unexplained.

BOSTON IDEAS.

SEPTEMBER 18, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The chorus that is being organized by Arthur Foote will add a potent attraction to the scheme and make possible the performance of a class of music that it has long been the desire of the management to include in the programme.

The partial list of music to be played, already published, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is fully alive to his opportunities, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find places on his programmes. It is impossible to present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, but the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where but few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony orchestra is superlatively fine.

It is in one sense a compliment to its chief when the interpretation of a piece is criticised and the conductor alone is held responsible, since it is in effect an admission that he has impressed his individuality on the entire host under him; that he has made, as Berlioz says, the orchestra into one instrument upon which he plays at will.

Nor need the members of the band feel that this result is an indication of a surrender of their personal importance; rather is it a proof of the development among them of artist natures, which thus consent to be moulded into an artistic whole.—Boston Transcript.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall will open Saturday evening, October 15. There will be twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday nights, omitting those of November 5, December 10, January 14, February 11, and March 18, and ending on April 29. The public rehearsals, also twenty-four, will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, beginning October 14, omitting those of November 4, December 9, January 13, February 10 and March 17, and ending on April 28. This is Mr. Arthur Nikisch's fourth season as conductor. The arrangements for the sale of season tickets: Public rehearsals—$12 seats, at auction, September 19; $7.50 seats, at auction, September 20; seats not taken, for sale at the office September 21. Concerts—$12 seats, at auction, September 22; $7.50 seats, at auction, September 23; seats not taken, for sale at the office September 24. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram, and marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered, to be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auctions will be held in the Music hall, beginning at 10 o'clock A. M.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

The attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals, at Music Hall this morning, was not so large as that of yesterday. The $7 50 seats found ready purchasers. Those on the floor away back under the gallery went at $6 to $8 50, the highest premium paid for any of these being $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which a ticket agent paid $35.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1892.

HIGHER PRICES THAN LAST YEAR.

Ready Bidders for All the $7.50 Seats at the Symphony Rehearsals.

There was one disappointed young lady in Music Hall this forenoon. She had come to attend the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra, but she had determined that she would pay no phenomenal price for a seat. Richer persons could pay premiums of $380 if they chose, but she would not go beyond $5. When bids were called for for the first of the $7.50 seats she was prompt in replying "Five dollars!" But there were other bidders, and she saw the seat purchased for $14.50 premium. For half an hour she made first bids of "Five dollars," but every time the price ran up far beyond her limit, and the comparatively undesirable seats beneath the gallery on the back row on the floor found ready purchasers at prices ranging from $6 to $8.50.

The attendance was not so large as at the sale on yesterday, but all were would-be purchasers. The ticket speculators had few orders to place in this part of the hall, and music lovers contended one with another for the coveted places. The highest premium paid for any of the seats under the gallery was $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper, and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly, the ticket agent, paid $35.

Instead of diminishing, the enthusiasm seemed to increase as the sale went on, and by one o'clock every seat in the house had been sold. It had been announced that those seats for the rehearsals remaining unsold would be offered at the box-office tomorrow morning, but not a single ticket is left unpurchased. The auction sale of $12 seats for the concerts will be held Thursday morning beginning at ten o'clock, while the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be disposed of in the same manner Friday. If there should be any seats unsold—from the indications today there will be none—they will be sold at the Music Hall box-office on Saturday.

Boston Journal.
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable Enthusiasm Manifested and Good Sales Result.

The attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals, at Music Hall on Tuesday, was not so large as that of Monday. The $7 50 seats found ready purchasers. Those on the floor away back under the gallery went at $6 to $8 50, the highest premium paid for any of these being $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly paid $35.

Instead of diminishing, the enthusiasm seemed to increase as the sale went on, and by 1 o'clock every seat in the house had been sold. It had been announced that those seats for the rehearsals remaining unsold would be offered at the box office this morning, but not a single ticket is left unpurchased. The auction sale of $12 seats for the concerts will be held Thursday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, while the $7 50 seats for the concerts will be disposed of in the same manner Friday. If there should be any seats unsold—from the indications to-day there will be none—they will be sold at the Music Hall box office on Saturday.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Cond'r.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS.

ON consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 15 to April 9, omitting Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18.

A Select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts, and the best available Soloists will appear.

SEASON TICKETS, with reserved seats for the series, $12 and $7 50, according to location.

THE AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS WILL BE HELD AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (THURSDAY), BEGINNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

The auction sales of tickets for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—twelfth season in the Music Hall—will be held tomorrow for the $12 seats, and on Friday for the $7.50 seats. These sales will begin at ten o'clock A. M., and will be held in in the Music Hall.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 83.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 21, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The interest shown by the auction sale of seats to the Symphony concerts indicates a social even more than an artistic attraction. If we are not mistaken, the suggestion that the seats at these concerts should be disposed of by auction was originally made by us as a means of overcoming the obvious defects of the scramble for places in the line that had previously existed. As matters are now conducted the premiums on the seats go entirely, with the exception of the slight commission paid to ticket dealers, who are employed to represent purchasers, to the promoter of the concerts, Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a disposition of the bonus in every way better than that which had previously been made of it. We dare say that this addition in the form of premiums, which must now amount to very much more than the fixed income through tickets, has enabled Mr. Higginson to make a number of improvements and to hold out inducements to artists that were hardly possible before, even with his generous and public spirited method of carrying on this enterprise; hence, the value of the concerts given has probably appreciated when judged of on a strictly mercantile basis.

But that this has been brought about by a departure from the original intentions of the originator of this series of entertainments is too well known to need more than a fair statement. We are obtaining in Boston performances of orchestral music through the maintenance of a permanent, high class orchestra superior to those given or obtainable in any city on the American continent, and in many, and perhaps most, respects equal to the best given in any of the musical centres of the old world. But, adding the premium which the tickets command to the regular price of admission, the cost of these entertainments to those who attend them is by no means a small one. We do not refer to such an extraordinary price as that paid for one seat at the auction of rehearsal tickets on Monday—a price which made each concert cost to the purchaser more than $16—but to the average price for reasonably good seats. These latter were disposed of on a range of premiums entailing the payment of from $2 to $4 per concert, an amount obviously beyond the means of persons of limited incomes.

If it could be said that this demand was due to the willingness of a large number of our people to make great financial sacrifices simply for the purpose of hearing musical performances of a high class rendered by artists of a high grade, the statement would be a very creditable indorsement of the artistic development attained by the residents of Boston and its vicinity. But, unfortunately, there is reason for thinking that this extraordinary demand is due more to social than to artistic considerations, and that a very considerable number of those whose bids have tended to raise the scale of premiums attend the concerts of the Symphony orchestra, not from a special love of music, but because it is considered in certain ranges of society the proper thing to do. It may furthermore be added that the probable effect of the fashionable demand has been to lessen the sum total of obtainable musical enjoyment by the exclusion of those who would appreciate the concerts much more than do many of those who attend them.

We do not state this in criticism of the management, for the reason that we do not see how Mr. Higginson can in any way be held responsible for the change that has taken place in his original plan of procedure. The only suggestion that can be given is one which we have made in the past, and which has been in some degree followed by those having charge of these entertainments; that is, increasing as far as possible the number of concerts given, or, in other words, providing a new series for those who find it financially impossible to attend the rehearsals and the final concerts. Years ago the Philharmonic Society in New York used to give first and second public rehearsals before its concerts, and while this system may have in it certain defects it might be well to see whether its adoption here, completely or in some modified form, would not be possible. It may be added that as fashion is uncertain in its dictates, in a few years more the changes that it makes may give larger opportunities to music lovers, even in those entertainments that are now accorded. Twenty-five years ago the Harvard Symphony concerts were supported by the social prestige connected with attendance upon them. But later on the fancy changed; social leaders turned in other directions, and, unfortunately in this case, the transition brought about the financial collapse of what had been a deserving enterprise.

Date 9/20

The [illegible] tickets to the Boston Symphony course of concerts, held yesterday, which tickets to the public rehearsals only were sold, was a striking proof of the hold these fine entertainments have acquired upon the general public, the amount realized being in advance of the large sale of last season.

Regarding the large sums paid for premiums, reaching in some instances to $150, and in one case to $380, it may be said that this may be considered not altogether in the line of competition, but as one way of manifesting a friendly interest in the plan of the concerts, and incidentally aiding in the maintenance of the great scheme. Here is a good object lesson to the friends of the Worcester Festival, many of whom are able and willing to aid its very worthy aims in precisely the same way, should their attention be called to the matter in just the right manner.

TIMES, Gloucester, Mass.

Date 9-20

Mrs. Jack Gardner paid $392 yesterday for a seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Concert at Music Hall, also purchasing [redacted] at $162 each.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1892-93.
573
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1892-93.
457
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

[10]

THE BOSTON NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

"MONEY TALKS," BUT DOESN'T SAY WHO.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 84.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 22, 1892.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Ready Sales at Large Premiums the Order Today.

The would-be patrons of the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra rallied in full ranks at Music Hall this morning, and when Auctioneer Jackson opened the bidding for the $12 seats, under the usual conditions, he found a ready response from the audience.

Last year the first seat sold, No. 1 in slip A, down under the second violins, with a fine view of the exit to Hamilton place, was bid off at 25 cents, but this choice (?) location induced some one to bid a premium of $8 today, and the example set was followed by subsequent purchasers to such an extent that fully double the amount of last year's premiums was realized from the first four rows, the top figure in slip C being $38.

There was a steady, legitimate demand for all the floor seats, the prices ranging from $20 to $50, according to the location. Some few seats on the outer aisles sold below $20, but the average was maintained at a figure that promised to bring the gross amount up to a figure largely in excess of last year's receipts.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1892.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

Concert Tickets Bring Lower Premiums Than Those for Rehearsal.

A rehearsal of a play is less interesting for the spectator than a performance of the same piece, but this rule does not hold true in regard to symphony concerts, for the rehearsals are more popular than the regular performances. On the first two days of this week all the rehearsal seats were disposed of at auction in Music Hall and today the sale of seats for the Saturday evening performances was begun. The $12 seats were those under consideration this morning and there was a large attendance when the auction began, but not so large as that on Monday or Tuesday.

"How much am I offered for this seat?" asked the auctioneer, indicating the end seat in the front row.

"Fifty cents" was the somewhat discouraging first offer, but subsequent bids raised the premium to $8. This was the highest price paid for a seat in the front row, the lowest being $5. On the second row the premiums ranged between $6 and $16; on the third, between $8 and $38; on the fourth, between $10, and $35; on the fifth, between $11.50 and $25.50; on the sixth between $11.50 and $41; on the seventh, between $9 and $47; and on the tenth, between $14 and $31.

When the auctioneer neared the seats on the eleventh row which commanded the now famous price of $380 on Monday's sale, the interest of the spectators increased. That seat with the two next to it brought a premium of $53 each, while the two just across the second aisle brought premiums of $55 each.

The bidding was rather slow this morning, and the premiums seemed small compared with those for the rehearsal tickets. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be disposed of at auction, and any left unsold will be placed in the Music Hall box office Saturday morning.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1892

SOLD IT FOR $24.

The Symphony Orchestra sale of seats for the Saturday night concerts was dull in comparison with the previous sale of Friday afternoon rehearsals seats, enlivened by $200 and $300 bids. As far back as H the premiums reached high water mark at $41.

Every one became interested when the Mrs. "Jack" Gardner seats were reached. That famed $380 premium seat could not arouse enough envy to overreach a $24 bid, and they let it go at that. Three seats next to it went to a speculator, Mr. Heard, for $53 premium each.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—There will be but five concerts of this famous organization at Chickering Hall. A sixth concert will take place at the Music Hall with Paderewski as solo performer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1892.

SOME HIGH PREMIUMS.

The $7 50 seats for the Saturday night Symphony Orchestra concerts sold yesterday at some remarkable premiums, and the dejected bidder who tenderly fondled his $25 with which to buy two $7 50 in the second balcony turned away sadly when he found the bidding invariably went beyond his $5 premium limit. A seat in the last row of the first balcony sold at a premium of $90, while even back in the second row of the second balcony, a $10 bill paid for a modest premium.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892.

SALE OF $7 50 SYMPHONY SEATS.

There was an unusual number of bidders Friday morning at the auction of the $7 50 seats for Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bidding was correspondingly brisk. The seats on the floor, way back under the balcony, brought premiums that averaged over six dollars.

When the first balcony seats were offered, the premium on the first twenty seats was, on the average, about $15. Seats 139, 140 and 141 were sold at an astonishing price. When the bidding went above $25 everybody stared; when it had reached $50 it set everybody quizzing, and when the price had reached $90, and the successful man said he would purchase three seats, many applauded.

Down the both sides of each balcony the premiums ranged from $18 to $10.

It had been the original intention to have the seats remaining unsold after the auction placed on sale at the Music Hall box office this morning, but when the sale finished yesterday every seat in the hall had been disposed of. Last year there were about 50 seats untaken at the auction sale, but the season before every one was bought at the first sale.

Clipping from Enterprise Brockton Mass

Date 9/22

THE PREMIUM paid for a nice seat for the symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, was $392. Boston is the town that ought to have a Metropolitan Opera House—not New York.

Clipping from

Date 22

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed an engagement with Paderewski as soloist for a number of concerts. Others to be expected are Joseffy, MacDowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin and propably Mrs. Emma Eames. The great German tenor Raimond von Zur Mühlen of Berlin will make his debut in Boston at one of the concerts. Some of the standard works to be played by the orchestra this season are Beethoven symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette;" overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 9/22

THEODORE THOMAS RETORTS.

Some More or Less Bitter Sentences for His Eminent New York Critics.

CHICAGO, Ill., Sept. 23 (Special).—Theodore Thomas, musical director of the World's Fair, has returned here after a long absence. Regarding the criticisms upon his inactivity from such notable musical people as Damrosch, Seidl and Van der Stucken, Mr. Thomas says: "I have nothing to say to these disgruntled musicians in New York. I treat their comments just as I would if I were crossing the street and were spattered with mud by a passing wagon—wipe it off and proceed on my course."

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1892.

HIGH PRICES FOR GALLERY SEATS.

Ninety Dollars Premium Paid on Three Symphony Concert Tickets.

Only surpassed by the exciting moment in the auction sale of symphony rehearsal seats was a scene which occurred in Music Hall this morning. The $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were being sold and the sale had proceeded in the ordinary manner with ready buyers but comparatively slow bidding. The seats on the floor had been disposed of at premiums ranging between $13 and $1 for the comparatively undesirable seats on the side of the hall under the gallery. The auctioneer was disposing of the seats on the back row of the first gallery on the right-hand side. Mr. Connelly, the theatre ticket agent at the Adams House, had just bought four seats at a premium of $11.50 each, and the adjoining seats were offered. Suddenly bidding began with a rush, and before the spectators realized it the premium had been pushed up by steps of $1 each to $90, for which J. R. Heard, the West-street agent, took three seats. Just a moment later, Mr. Connelly purchased two equally desirable seats at premiums of $17 each.

No other remarkably high prices were paid during the sale. With the one exception last noted, the highest premium was $22, for which sum several seats on the sides of the gallery were purchased. The average premium for a seat on the sides of the gallery was about $12, and for those on the floor, $6.

The sale lasted much longer than those of the previous days this week, as the entire second gallery is reserved for the Saturday concerts, and the disposition of these seats occupied considerable time, although the premiums were not excessively high. There was a large attendance at the sale.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEEDED.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The average music lover of modest means in these September days is haunted with anticipations of the symphony concerts which he cannot regularly hear.

"Now is the winter of [his] discontent," if he happens to have a family who takes pleasure in the art. His memory of the auctions has a bitter taint. The hours were solely vexatious in which the seats steadily eluded his resources on the gay wings of luxurious premiums.

Indeed it is, this season, more clearly and seriously true than ever before that a large and important class of the music-loving public is debarred from regular attendance at the concerts by the present condition and kind of demand for the tickets. That the class is large is evidenced by the number of complaints that any person interested in the matter may hear if the subject is mentioned; and it is also an important class because it includes not only large numbers of earnest amateurs who practice self-denial in other directions for the sake of their art, but also very many professional students and workers in the art.

Now, ought not some modification or extension of the present system be devised and attempted by which this class of persons might be accommodated? The suggestion most frequently heard is that a third performance, even of part, if not of all, the concerts be given.

The writer has met this suggestion from many individuals who have duly considered the matter. The losses incurred by the projector of this valuable enterprise in its earlier years are fully and gratefully recognized; but it is highly probable that these latter seasons are vigorously moving the balance to the other side of the account. And it is confidently believed by these well-wishers that the plan above suggested could be made practicable without serious loss, if any.

On behalf of the numerously disappointed seekers for seats at reasonable prices, the writer begs that this matter may be carefully weighed and some effort be made to make this worthy enterprise of education and elevating enjoyment more comprehensive. Its doors now work on springs that shut out very many who ought not to be so excluded. ONE OF THIS CLASS.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1892.

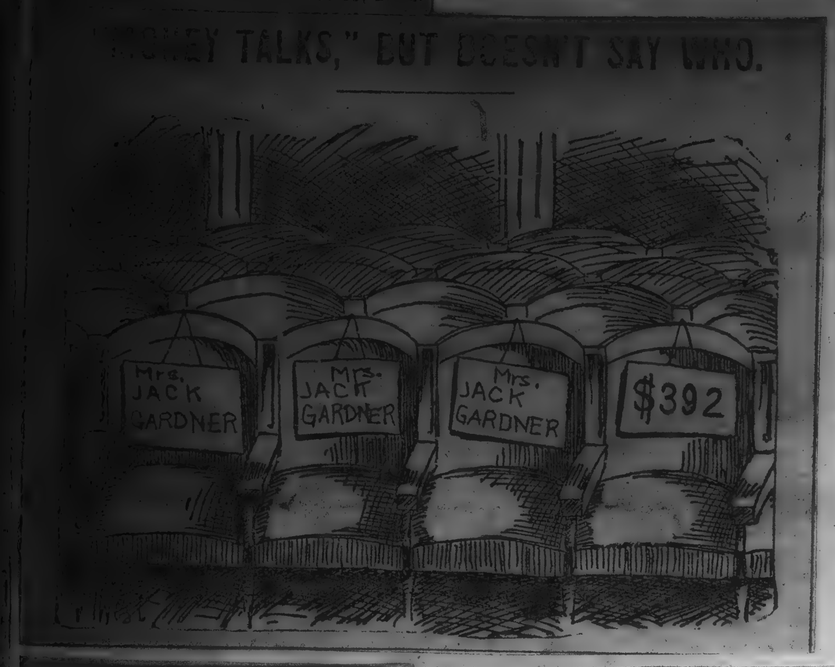
SALE OF $7 50 SYMPHONY SEATS.

There was an unusual number of bidders this morning at the auction of the $7 50 seats for Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bidding was correspondingly brisk. The seats on the floor, way back under the balcony, brought premiums that averaged over six dollars.

When the first balcony seats were offered, the premium on the first twenty seats was, on the average, about $15. Seats 139, 140 and 141 were sold at an astonishing price. When the bidding went above $25 everybody stared; when it had reached $50 it set everybody quizzing, and when the price had reached $90, and the successful man said he would purchase three seats, many applauded.

Down the both sides of each balcony the premiums ranged from $18 to $10, and if the seats in the second balcony sell as well as expected, the whole sale will have been very successful.

[11]



The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—There will be but five concerts of this famous organization at Chickering Hall. A sixth concert will take place at the Music Hall with Paderewski as solo performer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1892.

SOME HIGH PREMIUMS.

The $7 50 seats for the Saturday night Symphony Orchestra concerts sold yesterday at some remarkable premiums, and the dejected bidder who tenderly fondled his $25 with which to buy two $7 50 in the second balcony turned away sadly when he found the bidding invariably went beyond his $5 premium limit. A seat in the last row of the first balcony sold at a premium of $90, while even back in the second row of the second balcony, a $10 bill paid for a modest premium.

STAGE.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

A	34	28	A	27	18	B	17	8	B	A	7	1	A
B	34	28	B	27	18	C	17	8	C	B	7	1	B
C	34	28	C	27	18	D	17	8	D	C	7	1	C
D	34	28	D	27	18	E	17	8	E	D	7	1	D
E	34	28	E	27	18	F	17	8	F	E	7	1	E
F	34	28	F	27	18	G	17	8	G	F	7	1	F
G	34	28	G	27	18	H	17	8	H	G	7	1	G
H	34	28	H	27	18	I	17	8	I	H	7	1	H
I	34	28	I	27	18	J	17	8	J	I	7	1	I
J	34	28	J	27	18	K	17	8	K	J	7	1	J
K	34	28	K	27	18	L	17	8	L	K	7	1	K
L	34	28	L	27	18	M	17	8	M	L	7	1	L
M	34	28	M	27	18	N	17	8	N	M	7	1	M
N	34	28	N	27	18	O	17	8	O	N	7	1	N
O	34	28	O	27	18	P	17	8	P	O	7	1	O
P	34	28	P	27	18	Q	17	8	Q	P	7	1	P
Q	34	28	Q	27	18	R	17	8	R	Q	7	1	Q
R	34	28	R	27	18	S	17	8	S	R	7	1	R
S	34	28	S	27	18	T	17	8	T	S	7	1	S
T	34	28	T	27	18	U	17	8	U	T	7	1	T
U	34	28	U	27	18	V	17	8	V	U	7	1	U
V	34	28	V	27	18	W	17	8	W	V	7	1	V
W	34	28	W	27	18	X	17	8	X	W	7	1	W
X	34	28	X	27	18	Y	17	8	Y	X	7	1	X
Y	34	28	Y	27	18	Z	17	8	Z	Y	7	1	Y
Z	34	28	Z	27	18	AA	17	8	AA	Z	7	1	Z
AA	34	28	AA	27	18					AA	7	1	AA

FLOOR

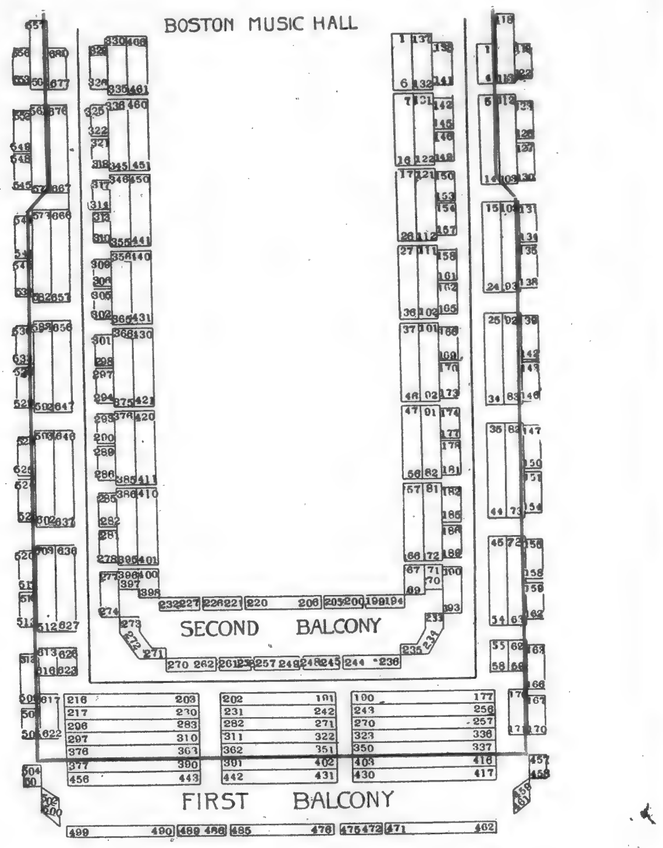
10	42	48	10	49	52	10	53	61	10	62	65	10	66	72
11	11	3	11	62	07	10	06	68	10	87	62	10	81	73
11	12	20	11	21	26	11	27	35	11	36	41	11	42	50
11	89	81	11	80	75	11	74	60	11	65	60	11	59	51
11	90	98	11	99	4	12	05	13	12	14	19	12	20	28	13	87
12	67	59	12	58	53	12	52	44	12	43	38	12	37	29
12	68	76	12	77	82	12	83	91	12	92	97	12	08	6
13	45	37	13	36	31	13	30	22	13	21	16	13	15	7	13

1388 — 94 — 81

1340 54 | 55 58 | 1359 67 | 1368 71 | 1372 80

THE RED LINES MARK THE DIVISIONS BETWEEN THE $12.00 AND THE $7.50 SEATS.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL



HIGH PRICES FOR GALLERY SEATS.

Ninety Dollars Premium Paid on Three Symphony Concert Tickets.

Only surpassed by the exciting moment in the auction sale of symphony rehearsal seats was a scene which occurred in Music Hall this morning. The $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were being sold and the sale had proceeded in the ordinary manner with ready buyers but comparatively slow bidding. The seats on the floor had been disposed of at premiums ranging between $13 and $1 for the comparatively undesirable seats on the side of the hall under the gallery. The auctioneer was disposing of the seats on the back row of the first gallery on the right-hand side. Mr. Connelly, the theatre ticket agent at the Adams House, had just bought four seats at a premium of $11.50 each, and the adjoining seats were offered. Suddenly bidding began with a rush, and before the spectators realized it the premium had been pushed up by steps of $1 each to $90, for which J. R. Heard, the West-street agent, took three seats. Just a moment later, Mr. Connelly purchased two equally desirable seats at premiums of $17 each.

No other remarkably high prices were paid during the sale. With the one exception last noted, the highest premium was $22, for which sum several seats on the sides of the gallery were purchased. The average premium for a seat on the sides of the gallery was about $12, and for those on the floor, $8.

The sale lasted much longer than those of the previous days this week, as the entire second gallery is reserved for the Saturday concerts, and the disposition of these seats occupied considerable time, although the premiums were not excessively high. There was a large attendance at the sale.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEEDED.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The average music lover of modest means in these September days is haunted with anticipations of the symphony concerts which he cannot regularly hear.

"Now is the winter of [his] discontent," if he happens to have a family who takes pleasure in the art. His memory of the auctions has a bitter taint. The hours were solely vexatious in which the seats steadily eluded his resources on the gay wings of luxurious premiums.

Indeed it is, this season, more clearly and seriously true than ever before that a large and important class of the music-loving public is debarred from regular attendance at the concerts by the present condition and kind of demand for the tickets. That the class is large is evidenced by the number of complaints that any person interested in the matter may hear if the subject is mentioned; and it is also an important class because it includes not only large numbers of earnest amateurs who practice self-denial in other directions for the sake of their art, but also very many professional students and workers in the art.

Now, ought not some modification or extension of the present system be devised and attempted by which this class of persons might be accommodated? The suggestion most frequently heard is that a third performance, even of part, if not of all, the concerts be given.

The writer has met this suggestion from many individuals who have duly considered the matter. The losses incurred by the projector of this valuable enterprise in its earlier years are fully and gratefully recognized; but it is highly probable that these latter seasons are vigorously moving the balance to the other side of the account. And it is confidently believed by these well-wishers that the plan above suggested could be made practicable without serious loss, if any.

On behalf of the numerously disappointed seekers for seats at reasonable prices, the writer begs that this matter may be carefully weighed and some effort be made to make this worthy enterprise of education and elevating enjoyment more comprehensive. Its doors now work on springs that shut out very many who ought not to be so excluded. ONE OF THIS CLASS.

...popular than the regular performances. On the first two days of this week all the rehearsal seats were disposed of at auction in Music Hall and today the sale of seats for the Saturday evening performances was begun. The $12 seats were those under consideration this morning and there was a large attendance when the auction began, but not so large as that on Monday or Tuesday.

"How much am I offered for this seat?" asked the auctioneer, indicating the end seat in the front row.

"Fifty cents" was the somewhat discouraging first offer, but subsequent bids raised the premium to $8. This was the highest price paid for a seat in the front row, the lowest being $5. On the second row the premiums ranged between $6 and $16; on the third, between $8 and $38; on the fourth, between $10, and $35; on the fifth, between $11.50 and $...50; on the sixth between $11.50 and $41; on the seventh, between $9 and $47; and on the tenth, between $14 and $31.

When the auctioneer reared the seats on the eleventh row which commanded the now famous price of $380 on Monday's sale, the interest of the spectators increased. That seat with the two next to it brought a premium of $53 each, while the two just across the second ... brought premiums of $55 each.

The bidding was rather slow this morning, the premiums seemed small compared ... for the rehearsal tickets. Tomorrow ... unsold will be placed in the ... office Saturday morning.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892.

SALE OF $7.50 SYMPHONY SEATS.

There was an unusual number of bidders Friday morning at the auction of the $7 50 seats for Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bidding was correspondingly brisk. The seats on the floor, way back under the balcony, brought premiums that averaged over six dollars.

When the first balcony seats were offered, the premium on the first twenty seats was, on the average, about $15. Seats 139, 140 and 141 were sold at an astonishing price. When the bidding went above $25 everybody stared; when it had reached $50 it set everybody quizzing, and when the price had reached $90, and the successful man said he would purchase three seats, many applauded.

Down the both sides of each balcony the premiums ranged from $18 to $10.

It had been the original intention to have the seats remaining unsold after the auction placed on sale at the Music Hall box office this morning, but when the sale finished yesterday every seat in the hall had been disposed of. Last year there were about 50 seats untaken at the auction sale, but the season before every one was bought at the first sale.

Clipping from Journal Lewiston Me.

Date 9/22.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed an engagement with Paderewski as soloist for a number of concerts. Others to be expected are Joseffy, MacDowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin and propably Mrs. Emma Eames. The great German tenor Raimond von Zur Mühlen of Berlin will make his debut in Boston at one of the concerts. Some of the standard works to be played by the orchestra this season are Beethoven symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9; Schumann, symphony No. 2; Brahms, symphonies 3 and 4; Mendelssohn, "Italian;" Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliette;" overture, "King Lear;" Dvorak, symphony, D major; serenade for strings; Wagner, "Tristan and Isolde" music, Kaisermarch; Goldmark, symphony No. 2; Spring Overture; Macdowell, symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," piano concerto; Mozart, symphony, D major; Haydn, symphony, B flat major; Gade, symphony, B flat major; Smetana, overture, "Verkaufte Braut;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Phaëton;" Grieg, suite, from "Holberg's Time."

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1892.

SALE OF $7.50 SYMPHONY SEATS.

There was an unusual number of bidders this morning at the auction of the $7 50 seats for Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The bidding was correspondingly brisk. The seats on the floor, way back under the balcony, brought premiums that averaged over six dollars.

When the first balcony seats were offered, the premium on the first twenty seats was, on the average, about $15. Seats 139, 140 and 141 were sold at an astonishing price. When the bidding went above $25 everybody stared; when it had reached $50 it set everybody quizzing, and when the price had reached $90, and the successful man said he would purchase three seats, many applauded.

Down the both sides of each balcony the premiums ranged from $18 to $10, and if the seats in the second balcony sell as well as expected, the whole sale will have been very successful.

...EVENING RECORD.

...22, 1892

...D IT FOR $24.

...Orchestra sale of seats for ... was dull in com... of Friday after... ...ed by $200 and ... the premiums ... at $41. ... increased when the Mrs. ... seats were reached. That ... seat could not arouse ... each a $24 bid, and they ... seats next to went ... Heard, for $53 premium

Clipping from Enterprise Brockton Mass.

Date 9/22

THE PREMIUM paid for a nice seat for the symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, was $392. Boston is the town that ought to have a Metropolitan Opera House—not New York.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 9/22

THEODORE THOMAS RETORTS.

Some More or Less Bitter Sentences for His Eminent New York Critics.

CHICAGO, Ill., Sept. 22 (Special).—Theodore Thomas, musical director of the World's Fair, has returned here after a long absence. Regarding the criticisms upon his inactivity from such notable musical people as Damrosch, Seidl and Van der Stucken, Mr. Thomas says: "I have nothing to say to these disgruntled musicians in New York. I treat their comments just as I would if I were crossing the street and were scattered with mud by a passing ...

[11]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 24, 1892.

What is to be done about the Symphony concerts and rehearsals? This has been a serious question for probably hundreds of people. What with the ever-increasing number of people who honestly desire to attend one or the other series and of those who feel that their position requires their attendance, the demand and the competition for tickets have become so powerful and active that hosts of people who are intrinsically entitled to hear the music are precluded from hearing because they cannot afford the price of even the poorest reserved seat. Not to cite the extraordinary cases in which the cost of each rehearsal amounts to ten dollars or more, the record of sales shows that many really undesirable places will cost at least a dollar and a half every time they are occupied, while others, by no means the best, will represent an average of from three to five dollars. To say that fashion and folly are provocative of this extravagance is easy and true; but this does not explain why the range of prices has been much higher this year than ever before and why seats have been bought at a high premium which heretofore brought either no premium or else only just enough for them to be claimed at the auction sale. There are unquestionably people who can afford to pay for all the house at high rates, and who are willing to do so and to contest for the opportunity. But there are also many people who cannot afford any tickets at all, or who having easily money enough to pay for the simple admission have not the strength to push for possible seats or to stand up during an entire programme. It is not Mr. Higginson's fault if the public has subverted his original plans and transformed an enterprise primarily intended for the benefit of music-lovers of moderate means into one for the delectation of the wealthy dilettante and the members of a Four Hundred. But it does behoove him to consider whether there does not remain for him something to do whereby his scheme can re-enter, at least in part, within its first scope, without disturbing the attitude which it has come to assume. The solution of the difficulty appears easy—to open to the public an earlier rehearsal, with the understanding that a progressive performance is not promised, but that errors may be corrected, passages repeated and all the business of practice conducted as at any working rehearsal. This was the plan of the Philharmonic Society in New York and it is that which obtains at the Worcester Festivals. Except when soloists participated, there could be no extra cost, and not always then, because in many cases they require a preliminary rehearsal with the orchestra. There might not be much more money in this, but Mr. Higginson is not speculating in his band. And, on the other hand, there would be a distinct and otherwise unattainable gain for a great many people. Nor can it be doubted that a student or a musician would often be glad of this extra hearing of a new work or an important classic. At any rate, such a plan might be tried for a season, and if it were unsuccessful there need be no mortification in abandoning it.

Clipping from Journal, Providence, R. I.

Date 9 22

Symphony concerts were started in Boston with the idea of giving people a chance to hear the very best music at moderate prices. With this in view, course tickets both for the evening concerts and the so-called afternoon rehearsals were offered at $12 and $7 50. But it came to be "the thing" to attend these performances, and so at the auction sales from year to year higher and higher premiums were paid. This season a single seat has brought $380, and average premiums in desirable parts of Music Hall run from $70 to $100. A few cheap seats, of course, can be obtained, but it may be fairly said in a general way that these concerts have become almost as much a luxury for the rich as grand opera has become in New York. Very possibly it can't be helped, but those who are interested in the musical education of the masses will regret it just the same. The man with a slender purse now has to wait for the "Pops" in June, where he can get his music and his beer together and enjoy both more than he would either separately.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25.

—The auction sale of the tickets for the Symphony Rehearsals brought together the first gathering of social importance of the season; for people came to town from right and left to attend the sale. Miss Virginia Stackpole, looking bronzed from her summer at Marion; Mrs. George Lewis and Miss Wheelwright, still full of their European trip; Mrs. Percy Browne, with Miss Browne, from Mt. Desert; Miss Andrew, from Hingham; Miss Stackpole, from York; Miss Forbush, from Cohasset; Miss Talbot, Mrs. F. S. Lockwood, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Swan, Mr. Charles Hamlin, Mr. Parkman Dexter, Mr. Fred Guild, Mrs. Hersey, Miss Allen, Mr. Frank Manning and Mr. Hiram Tucker were a few of those who were noticed in the Music Hall on Monday.

Boston Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 86.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

Every Seat for Both Rehearsals and Concerts Sold.

For the third successive season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's home rehearsals and concerts every reserved seat has been sold, the auction sales of the week having again surprised even those best acquainted with local amusement enterprises. The prices given by the public for these tickets—aggregating at a rough estimate $125,000—will afford a surplus over the expenses of the season and make a partial return for the vast sums expended in establishing the orchestra and maintaining it in former years.

The auction sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts called out the biggest attendance of the week yesterday morning, and the premiums bid were more within the means of ordinary patrons.

The six rows of seats on the rear floor under the balcony were quickly disposed of at merely nominal premiums, compared with the sums paid for the nearer locations, the bids ranging as a rule from $2 to $6, with occasional variations slightly above and below these figures.

In the right balcony, facing the stage, the seats against the wall brought from $10 to $20, except that Mr. John T. Heard, who had an unlimited order, passed the record of the concert ticket premiums by advancing the price of seats 138, 139 and 140, after a sharp competition, to $90.

THE HIGHEST BIDDER, MR. JOHN T. HEARD.

The seats in the left balcony sold at about the same figure.

There are three rows of the $7.50 seats at the rear of the front first balcony, and these sold at from $8 to $12.

More interest was shown in the sale when the upper balcony seats were put up, and the premiums for this part of the house averaged from $5 to $8.

It appears that the entire lot of $12 seats were sold at a premium, as the three that were not bid off at the sale of Thursday were taken immediately after at a premium of 50 cents each.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892

The annual agony of the auction sale of Symphony seats began this week and showed that toadyism and hero or heroine worship is not dead yet, at least among a class who have more dollars than brains, which is not saying much for their wealth. Everybody knows that Mrs. "Jack" Gardner is a kind of reigning queen in Boston, and I do not wonder at it, for a more gracious, whole souled, big-hearted woman never lived, if I am to believe all that I hear from sources which do not seek for publicity. Mrs. Gardner is as much of an institution as the Symphonies, or her bunch of violets, and she seems literally to be the center of attraction, not even secondarily to the orchestra.

But now her value is enhanced, and it has been decided at auction how much the privilege of sitting beside her is worth. It is rather a novel thing, this bidding for an opportunity of sitting next to a society favorite. The seats usually occupied by Mrs. Gardner were, of course, not bought by that lady herself, but through an agent. Now an agent bought these seats for $150 apiece, and then it is presumed that they were for her. Consequently the bidding for the next seat became fast and furious until a premium of $380 was obtained, which, with the price of admission, made its total cost $392, and this for one seat for a series of concerts!

Truly Boston has her peculiarities when this can be done, and when there are crowds about the very door who would be thankful for a five cent loaf of bread. It would buy 7,600 such loaves and fill more than that number of empty stomachs. But there are others who are equally hungry, music hungry, and who are unable to satisfy their longing in comfort so long as such selfish nonsense is practiced. But it's the way of the world! In this particular case I wonder how the man would feel who has paid his $392 if it were discovered that Mrs. Gardner had not taken her usual seat, after all? In that case some other man would, no doubt, feel that he had obtained a bargain in having to pay only $150 for the privilege of sitting in the same chair that Mrs. Gardner had sat in. Perhaps, if this is the case, it will be necessary for him to employ a cordon of police to protect him from the violence of anarchists with dynamite bags who wish to assail him as they would millionaires or others having a priceless treasure which they refuse to give up. And if Mrs. Gardner really does occupy them will it not be a good speculation on the part of the owner of the next high priced seat to let it out for so much an hour for the almost priceless privilege of sitting for sixty minutes next to the queen of society? There's money in that.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH has been busy during his summer abroad, and announces some of the novelties (for Boston) to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as follows: Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, opp. 55; Cæsar Culpetite suite, opp. 43 (in mode populara); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture. "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier; Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen?" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, schickalslied for chorus and orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 87.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

No previous sale of tickets for the season's rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever awakened the interest that has been shown in the auctions of the week just ended, and the handsome financial results indicate a lively appreciation of this great musical enterprise by the public of Boston and neighboring cities and towns.

It might gratify public curiosity to state the actual amount received from the sales of the week, but as the founder and patron of the orchestra is in no sense a professional manager he has a perfect right to withhold such a public announcement of his private affairs.

The public is apt to be led into error each year in regard to the expense attending these concerts, and it seems desirable to call to mind again the large opportunities given for a hearing of these rehearsals and concerts at a nominal expense.

The total receipts for the rehearsals and concerts may be figured at $125,000, and for this amount 103,872 seats are provided during the season, making the average expense $1.20 per seat, which is certainly a reasonable figure for such concerts. In addition to this, counting the upper balcony at the rehearsals and the admissions sold, there are about 30,000 opportunities given to hear these concerts during the season at the nominal fee of 25 cents, thus bringing the average expense per concert to each individual attending down below $1.

It will gratify all who have benefited in former years by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the sole patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to know that the receipts of sales for the week will offset a portion of the large expense attending the maintenance of these concerts in earlier seasons.

The Kneisel quartet will give eight concerts in Chickering Hall during the coming season.

Those who complain of the expense of attending the Symphony concerts would do well to recall certain incomplete performances of "Parsifal" in former seasons for which a $5 bill was paid without a murmur, and the director looked upon as a philanthropist at that.

The popularity of the Symphony rehearsals and concerts is attested by the fact that this year the orders received by Mr. Connolly of the Adams House are nearly doubly in number that received in any previous year. Among those who placed their orders with him this season for rehearsals may be mentioned: Mrs. John C. Phillips, Robert C. Winthrop, Jr., Mrs. B. P. Cheney, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Miss Wesselhoeft, nine seats, Arthur Amory, Charles L. Lovering, Mrs. W. Powell Mason, Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. D. R. Emerson, Jerome Jones, Miss Heloise E. Hersey, J. B. Billings, Miss R. L. Dexter, Mrs. Frances E. Bacon, George Bixby, Mr. Sylvester Tower, Mrs. T. Parsons, Mr. H. P. Sears, J. C. Kittredge, Mrs. J. G. Cooper, J. P. Stearns, Bert Dunbar, C. N. Wallace, Mr. Fennessey, Walter Ellis, Mrs. C. K. Earle of Worcester, T. E. Zerrahn, M. P. Mason, Mrs. S. I. Williams, William E. Cox, Rev. Fr. Bodfish of Canton, F. E. James, E. L. Sanborn, W. V. Kellen, Mrs. E. C. Swift of Lowell, Mrs. Dabney, Mrs. E. M. Bates, Mrs. Emily S. Rogers, Mrs. James L. Plympton, Russell Tyson, Arthur B. Smith, John Richardson, Frank L. Fish. And for concerts, Mrs. S. J. Williams, Mark Hollingsworth, Ellis Hollingsworth, M. M. Cunniff, Morrison Fuller, Charles Hollings, E. D. Lowe, Mrs. A. B. Claflin, Dr. Francis Minot, Miss Payson, George A. Pierce, Miss Heloise E. Hersey (20 seats, school), Mrs. M. H. Crocker, Mrs. Thatcher Loring, Miss Parkman.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1892.

MUSIC AGAIN.

The musical season of '92-'93 will open with the first Symphony concert, and already are singers and performers on musical instruments in active training for public appearance. Manufacturers of pianofortes have engaged their champions and framed letters of recommendation which will be signed in the heat of the season. The singer is eagerly examining his physical apparatus and is testing his method. Advance notices in the disguise of foreign dispatches and personal notes are circulated freely. We shall soon have the yearly opportunity of hearing at least a dozen versions of the "Waldstein" sonata. The vestals of the city stand ready to light and nurse the sacred fire on the altar of Brahms. The name of Paderewski is heard again in street cars. Singers who are neglected or forgotten in Europe are packing their trunks in preparation for triumphs in America. Soon there will be the charging of the air with music of various kinds. Chamber concerts and recitals, symphony and popular concerts will amuse, or possibly instruct. There will also be the discussions concerning the relative merits of schools, pieces and performers. And the stray foreigner will be amazed at the solemn attention paid here to the extraction of sound from human instruments, and from instruments of wood and string and hide and brass.

It is said that we shall hear new things. The long labor of the composer will be judged in the twinkling of an eye. That which is great in its simplicity may be scouted as flippant. That which is complexity and the twin-brother of obscurity may be crowned because of its unsympathetic darkness. There will be, on the other hand, a revival of emotion provoked by familiar and approved measures; and many who are frightened by the uncouth appearance of the modern Russian composers will purr complacently at the sight of Mendelssohn and his followers, who water the milk of their master. Originality in composition may again awaken the suspicion of the hearer; and virility of thought and expression will no doubt seem rude if not positively indecent. Much depends in this matter on the position assumed by the chief patrons and patronesses of music.

Much is expected of the combination of orchestra and chorus that has been talked of for two years, and is now apparently an established fact. Interesting works may thus be produced and variety be given to the Symphony concerts. The Handel and Haydn Society propose the performance of Handel's "Samson," a mass by Cherubini, and Mr. Chadwick's admirable "Phœnix Expiràns." The Cecilia thought of asking Mr. Dvorak to make the journey from New York that he might direct his Requiem. It is doubtful whether the experiment would have contributed to the glory of art. There would have been a natural curiosity to examine the face and figure of the Bohemian; but he is not regarded in Europe as a skillful conductor, and it is said there, in a low voice, that the Requiem is dull. It is not improbable that "The Damnation of Faust" will be sung by the Cecilia. The pianists and the singers have not announced their programmes; but it would not be impossible for an experienced concert-goer to frame them in advance. When one considers, for instance, the wealth of pianoforte literature, the scantiness of the usual repertoire seems inexplicable. As for the singers, they are no doubt striving with the pronunciation of foreign languages. We shall hear German and French and Italian. It is true that we do business, dispute and make love in English; and our novelists, historians, poets and writers on political economy still prefer their native language. It is only in music that our heart and understanding are affected by words in an unknown tongue.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 9 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Remarkable Premiums Paid for Seats at Its Series of Concerts.

Special Dispatch to The North American.

BOSTON, Sept. 22.—The sale by auction of seats for the twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which began Monday and will close to-morrow, has been the most successful in the history of the organization. The extraordinary premium of $380 was paid for a single seat. Three seats were sold for $162 each, and while these prices were naturally exceptional, the general average of premium paid was unusually high.

For the three days' sale the premiums paid, in addition to the regular subscription price, aggregate much over $70,000, and it is certain that by to-morrow evening not a seat for the series of forty-eight concerts will be left out of the twenty-four hundred seats which the music hall contains. Thus the pecuniary success of the season is already assured, and as Mr. Nikisch's orchestra never was in better form its artistic success is no less certain.

[12]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 24, 1892.

What is to be done about the Symphony concerts and rehearsals? This has been a serious question for probably hundreds of people. What with the ever-increasing number of people who honestly desire to attend one or the other series and of those who feel that their position requires their attendance, the demand and the competition for tickets have become so powerful and active that hosts of people who are intrinsically entitled to hear the music are precluded from hearing because they cannot afford the price of even the poorest reserved seat. Not to cite the extraordinary cases in which the cost of each rehearsal amounts to ten dollars or more, the record of sales shows that many really undesirable places will cost at least a dollar and a half every time they are occupied, while others, by no means the best, will represent an average of from three to five dollars. To say that fashion and folly are provocative of this extravagance is easy and true; but this does not explain why the range of prices has been much higher this year than ever before and why seats have been bought at a high premium which heretofore brought either no premium or else only just enough for them to be claimed at the auction sale. There are unquestionably people who can afford to pay for all the house at high rates, and who are willing to do so and to contest for the opportunity. But there are also many people who cannot afford any tickets at all, or who having easily money enough to pay for the simple admission have not the strength to push for possible seats or to stand up during an entire programme. It is not Mr. Higginson's fault if the public has subverted his original plans and transformed an enterprise primarily intended for the benefit of music-lovers of moderate means into one for the delectation of the wealthy dilettante and the members of a Four Hundred. But it does behoove him to consider whether there does not remain for him something to do whereby his scheme can re-enter, at least in part, within its first scope, without disturbing the attitude which it has come to assume. The solution of the difficulty appears easy—to open to the public an earlier rehearsal, with the understanding that a progressive performance is not promised, but that errors may be corrected, passages repeated and all the business of practice conducted as at any working rehearsal. This was the plan of the Philharmonic Society in New York and it is that which obtains at the Worcester Festivals. Except when soloists participated, there could be no extra cost, and not always then, because in many cases they require a preliminary rehearsal with the orchestra. There might not be much more money in this, but Mr. Higginson is not speculating in his band. And, on the other hand, there would be a distinct and otherwise unattainable gain for a great many people. Nor can it be doubted that a student or a musician would often be glad of this extra hearing of a new work or an important classic. At any rate, such a plan might be tried for a season, and if it were unsuccessful there need be no mortification in abandoning it.

lipping from Journal, Providence, R. I.
Date 9 22

Symphony concerts were started in Boston with the idea of giving people a chance to hear the very best music at moderate prices. With this in view, course tickets both for the evening concerts and the so-called afternoon rehearsals were offered at $12 and $7 50. But it came to be "the thing" to attend these performances, and so at the auction sales from year to year higher and higher premiums were paid. This season a single seat has brought $380, and average premiums in desirable parts of Music Hall run from $70 to $100. A few cheap seats, of course, can be obtained, but it may be fairly said in a general way that these concerts have become almost as much a luxury for the rich as grand opera has become in New York. Very possibly it can't be helped, but those who are interested in the musical education of the masses will regret it just the same. The man with a slender purse now has to wait for the "Pops" in June, where he can get his music and his beer together and enjoy both more than he would either separately.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25.

—The auction sale of the tickets for the Symphony Rehearsals brought together the first gathering of social importance of the season; for people came to town from right and left to attend the sale. Miss Virginia Stackpole, looking bronzed from her summer at Marion; Mrs. George Lewis and Miss Wheelwright, still full of their European trip; Mrs. Percy Browne, with Miss Browne, from Mt. Desert; Miss Andrew, from Hingham; Miss Stackpole, from York; Miss Forbush, from Cohasset; Miss Talbot, Mrs. F. S. Lockwood, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Swan, Mr. Charles Hamlin, Mr. Parkman Dexter, Mr. Fred Guild, Mrs. Hersey, Miss Allen, Mr. Frank Manning and Mr. Hiram Tucker were a few of those who were noticed in the Music Hall on Monday.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 86.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

Every Seat for Both Rehearsals and Concerts Sold.

For the third successive season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's home rehearsals and concerts every reserved seat has been sold, the auction sales of the week having again surprised even those best acquainted with local amusement enterprises. The prices given by the public for these tickets—aggregating at a rough estimate $125,000—will afford a surplus over the expenses of the season and make a partial return for the vast sums expended in establishing the orchestra and maintaining it in former years.

The auction sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts called out the biggest attendance of the week yesterday morning, and the premiums bid were more within the means of ordinary patrons.

The six rows of seats on the rear floor under the balcony were quickly disposed of at merely nominal premiums, compared with the sums paid for the nearer locations, the bids ranging as a rule from $2 to $6, with occasional variations slightly above and below these figures.

In the right balcony, facing the stage, the seats against the wall brought from $10 to $20, except that Mr. John T. Heard, who had an unlimited order, passed the record of the concert ticket premiums by advancing the price of seats 138, 139 and 140, after a sharp competition, to $90.

THE HIGHEST BIDDER, MR. JOHN T. HEARD.

The seats in the left balcony sold at about the same figure.

There are three rows of the $7.50 seats at the rear of the front first balcony, and these sold at from $8 to $12.

More interest was shown in the sale when the upper balcony seats were put up, and the premiums for this part of the house averaged from $5 to $8.

It appears that the entire lot of $12 seats were sold at a premium, as the three that were not bid off at the sale of Thursday were taken immediately after at a premium of 50 cents each.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892

The annual agony of the auction sale of Symphony seats began this week and showed that toadyism and hero or heroine worship is not dead yet, at least among a class who have more dollars than brains, which is not saying much for their wealth. Everybody knows that Mrs. "Jack" Gardner is a kind of reigning queen in Boston, and I do not wonder at it, for a more gracious, whole souled, big-hearted woman never lived, if I am to believe all that I hear from sources which do not seek for publicity. Mrs. Gardner is as much of an institution as the Symphonies, or her bunch of violets, and she seems literally to be the center of attraction, not even secondarily to the orchestra.

But now her value is enhanced, and it has been decided at auction how much the privilege of sitting beside her is worth. It is rather a novel thing, this bidding for an opportunity of sitting next to a society favorite. The seats usually occupied by Mrs. Gardner were, of course, not bought by that lady herself, but through an agent. Now an agent bought these seats for $150 apiece, and then it is presumed that they were for her. Consequently the bidding for the next seat became fast and furious until a premium of $380 was obtained, which, with the price of admission, made its total cost $392, and this for one seat for a series of concerts!

Truly Boston has her peculiarities when this can be done, and when there are crowds about the very door who would be thankful for a five cent loaf of bread. It would buy 7,600 such loaves and fill more than that number of empty stomachs. But there are others who are equally hungry, music hungry, and who are unable to satisfy their longing in comfort so long as such selfish nonsense is practiced. But it's the way of the world! In this particular case I wonder how the man would feel who has paid his $392 if it were discovered that Mrs. Gardner had not taken her usual seat, after all? In that case some other man would, no doubt, feel that he had obtained a bargain in having to pay only $150 for the privilege of sitting in the same chair that Mrs. Gardner had sat in. Perhaps, if this is the case, it will be necessary for him to employ a cordon of police to protect him from the violence of anarchists with dynamite bags who wish to assail him as they would millionaires or others having a priceless treasure which they refuse to give up. And if Mrs. Gardner really does occupy them will it not be a good speculation on the part of the owner of the next high priced seat to let it out for so much an hour for the almost priceless privilege of sitting for sixty minutes next to the queen of society? There's money in that.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1892

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been busy during his summer abroad, and announces some of the novelties (for Boston) to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as follows: Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, opp. 55; Cæsar Culpetite suite, opp. 43 (in mode populara); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture. "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier; Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen?" Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, schickalslied for chorus and orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 87.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

No previous sale of tickets for the season's rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever awakened the interest that has been shown in the auctions of the week just ended, and the handsome financial results indicate a lively appreciation of this great musical enterprise by the public of Boston and neighboring cities and towns.

It might gratify public curiosity to state the actual amount received from the sales of the week, but as the founder and patron of the orchestra is in no sense a professional manager he has a perfect right to withhold such a public announcement of his private affairs.

The public is apt to be led into error each year in regard to the expense attending these concerts, and it seems desirable to call to mind again the large opportunities given for a hearing of these rehearsals and concerts at a nominal expense.

The total receipts for the rehearsals and concerts may be figured at $125,000, and for this amount 103,872 seats are provided during the season, making the average expense $1.20 per seat, which is certainly a reasonable figure for such concerts. In addition to this, counting the upper balcony at the rehearsals and the admissions sold, there are about 30,000 opportunities given to hear these concerts during the season at the nominal fee of 25 cents, thus bringing the average expense per concert to each individual attending down below $1.

It will gratify all who have benefited in former years by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the sole patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to know that the receipts of sales for the week will offset a portion of the large expense attending the maintenance of these concerts in earlier seasons.

The Kneisel quartet will give eight concerts in Chickering Hall during the coming season.

Those who complain of the expense of attending the Symphony concerts would do well to recall certain incomplete performances of "Parsifal" in former seasons for which a $5 bill was paid without a murmur, and the director looked upon as a philanthropist at that.

The popularity of the Symphony rehearsals and concerts is attested by the fact that this year the orders received by Mr. Connolly of the Adams House are nearly doubly in number that received in any previous year. Among those who placed their orders with him this season for rehearsals may be mentioned: Mrs. John C. Phillips, Robert C. Winthrop, Jr., Mrs. B. P. Cheney, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Miss Wesselhoeft, nine seats, Arthur Amory, Charles L. Lovering, Mrs. W. Powell Mason, Henry M Whitney, Mrs. D. R. Emerson, Jerome Jones, Miss Heloise E. Hersey, J. B. Billings, Miss R. L. Dexter, Mrs. Frances E. Bacon, George Bixby, Mr. Sylvester Tower, Mrs. T. Parsons, Mr. H. F. Sears, J. C. Kittredge, Mrs. J. G. Cooper, J. P. Stearns, Bert Dunbar, C. N. Wallace, Mr. Fennessey, Walter Ellis, Mrs. C. K. Earle of Worcester, T. E. Zerrahn, M. P. Mason, Mrs. S. I. Williams, William E. Cox, Rev. Fr. Bodfish of Canton, F. E. James, E. L. Sanborn, W. V. Kellen, Mrs. E. C. Swift of Lowell, Mrs. Dabney, Mrs. E. M. Bates, Mrs. Emily S. Rogers, Mrs. James L. Plympton, Russell Tyson, Arthur B. Smith, John Richardson, Frank L. Fish. And for concerts, Mrs. S. J. Williams, Mark Hollingsworth, Ellis Hollingsworth, M. M. Cunniff, Morrison Fuller, Charles Hollings, E. D. Lowe, Mrs. A. B. Claflin, Dr. Francis Minot, Miss Payson, George A. Pierce, Miss Heloise E. Hersey (20 seats, school), Mrs. M. H. Crocker, Mrs. Thatcher Loring, Miss Parkman.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1892.

MUSIC AGAIN.

The musical season of '92-'93 will open with the first Symphony concert, and already are singers and performers on musical instruments in active training for public appearance. Manufacturers of pianofortes have engaged their champions and framed letters of recommendation which will be signed in the heat of the season. The singer is eagerly examining his physical apparatus and is testing his method. Advance notices in the disguise of foreign dispatches and personal notes are circulated freely. We shall soon have the yearly opportunity of hearing at least a dozen versions of the "Waldstein" sonata. The vestals of the city stand ready to light and nurse the sacred fire on the altar of Brahms. The name of Paderewski is heard again in street cars. Singers who are neglected or forgotten in Europe are packing their trunks in preparation for triumphs in America. Soon there will be the charging of the air with music of various kinds. Chamber concerts and recitals, symphony and popular concerts will amuse, or possibly instruct. There will also be the discussions concerning the relative merits of schools, pieces and performers. And the stray foreigner will be amazed at the solemn attention paid here to the extraction of sound from human instruments, and from instruments of wood and string and hide and brass.

It is said that we shall hear new things. The long labor of the composer will be judged in the twinkling of an eye. That which is great in its simplicity may be scouted as flippant. That which is complexity and the twin-brother of obscurity may be crowned because of its unsympathetic darkness. There will be, on the other hand, a revival of emotion provoked by familiar and approved measures; and many who are frightened by the uncouth appearance of the modern Russian composers will purr complacently at the sight of Mendelssohn and his followers, who water the milk of their master. Originality in composition may again awaken the suspicion of the hearer; and virility of thought and expression will no doubt seem rude if not positively indecent. Much depends in this matter on the position assumed by the chief patrons and patronesses of music.

Much is expected of the combination of orchestra and chorus that has been talked of for two years, and is now apparently an established fact. Interesting works may thus be produced and variety be given to the Symphony concerts. The Handel and Haydn Society propose the performance of Handel's "Samson," a mass by Cherubini, and Mr. Chadwick's admirable "Phœnix Expirans." The Cecilia thought of asking Mr. Dvorak to make the journey from New York that he might direct his Requiem. It is doubtful whether the experiment would have contributed to the glory of art. There would have been a natural curiosity to examine the face and figure of the Bohemian; but he is not regarded in Europe as a skillful conductor, and it is said there, in a low voice, that the Requiem is dull. It is not improbable that "The Damnation of Faust" will be sung by the Cecilia. The pianists and the singers have not announced their programmes; but it would not be impossible for an experienced concert-goer to frame them in advance. When one considers, for instance, the wealth of pianoforte literature, the scantiness of the usual repertoire seems inexplicable. As for the singers, they are no doubt striving with the pronunciation of foreign languages. We shall hear German and French and Italian. It is true that we do business, dispute and make love in English; and our novelists, historians, poets and writers on political economy still prefer their native language. It is only in music that our heart and understanding are affected by words in an unknown tongue.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 9/24/92

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Remarkable Premiums Paid for Seats at Its Series of Concerts.

Special Dispatch to The North American.

BOSTON, Sept. 22.—The sale by auction of seats for the twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which began Monday and will close to-morrow, has been the most successful in the history of the organization. The extraordinary premium of $380 was paid for a single seat. Three seats were sold for $162 each, and while these prices were naturally exceptional, the general average of premium paid was unusually high.

For the three days' sale the premiums paid, in addition to the regular subscription price, aggregate much over $70,000, and it is certain that by to-morrow evening not a seat for the series of forty-eight concerts will be left out of the twenty-four hundred seats which the music hall contains. Thus the pecuniary success of the season is already assured, and as Mr. Nikisch's orchestra never was in better form its artistic success is no less certain.

[12]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1892.

Failed to Secure Large Premiums.

Undoubtedly the rain of the forenoon had much to do with the attendance at the auction sale of seats for Star Course of Entertainments which was held in Tremont Temple this forenoon. There were about a hundred persons in the hall when the sale began, but more came in as it progressed. The sale began with the third row from the front and no one cared to bid for the seats on the sides under the galleries. The bidding at no time could be called lively. The auctioneer made frequent references to the $380 premium for a single symphony seat, but the best that he could get was about a hundredth of that sum. The seats which were not purchased at the sale today will be sold at the Tremont Temple box-office tomorrow beginning at 8 A. M.

TELEGRAPH, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 9-24

—Concert-goers will be interested in some of Mr. Nikisch's plans for the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The membership of the band will remain practically what it was last year. For the local concerts in Boston a choir of 200 voices has been organized, which will be trained by Arthur Foote. There will be analytical notes on the programmes written by W. F. Apthorp. In the list of compositions to be played we find the following novelties: E. A. McDowell, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Eugen D'Albert, symphony; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor; Rudorff, symphony, G minor; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest"; Thierot, symphonietta; Cesar Cui, petite suite; Riemenschneiner, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"; Raff, symphonietta for wind instrument; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie;

Clipping from Observer Date 9-24

The tickets for the Symphony Concerts were sold at auction in Boston this week, and brought high prices. Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $392 for a seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsals and bought three others at $1[illegible] each.

Clipping from Graphic Boston Times Date 9-23

THE sale of seats for the concerts and public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Monday and Tuesday were very satisfactory, the highest premium for the concerts being $380. For the rehearsals the premiums ranged from $10 to $30. These prices are greatly in excess of last year's sales.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28.

Miss Emma Juch is engaged as soloist at the Symphony concerts Oct. 28 and 29.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, beginning in October. Many who were disappointed in securing seats for the Boston concerts will doubtless avail themselves of this oppertunity.

Op. Chic. St. Louis Mo.

MUSIC HATH CHARMS. 25

The membership of the Nikisch Orchestra for next season, it is announced, will remain the same. For local concerts in Boston a chorus of 200 will be organized and trained by Arthur Foote. There will be analytical notes on the programmes by H. F. Apstrom. In the list of novelties to be given are included A. E. McDowell's "Launcelot and Eleine," Eugen D'Albert's new symphony, Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, opus 55; Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Tempest;" "Symphonetta" by Cesar Cue; symphonic poem, "Todtentanz," by Riemenscheiner, and "Impressions d'Italie" by Charpentier.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 9-25

[illegible] extraordinary appreciation of its Symphony Orchestra has been strikingly proved this week, the tickets having gone at absurdly high premiums. The purchase of one seat at a season of [illegible] 380, or a cost of $16 for each concert, is an extreme instance, but the average purchaser of a season ticket was made to pay at the rate of from $2 to $4 for one entertainment, to speak by the book, the purchaser pays the actual price for the ticket and $2 to $16, as the case may be, for the glory of possessing it. The [illegible] to Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the promoter of the concerts, and will be expended in a [illegible] manner, to give ticket holders, [illegible] possible, the worth of their money. [illegible] ventures to hope that a second popular [illegible] may be given before each concert [illegible] lovers with light purses to [illegible]

9-23

Boston, Sept. 2[illegible]

It doesn't seem as if this could really be the twelfth season of the Symphony concerts in this city, but that is what the advertisements say, and I suppose there is no use disputing them. No more successful artistic enterprise was ever planned or carried out. We have all talked a good deal of Mr. Higginson's generosity, but I don't think that we even yet quite appreciate it. There was no reason to suppose, twelve years ago, that Boston would or could support a body of musicians superior to any other in this country and equal to any in Europe. This is not, of course, the same thing as saying that our Symphony Orchestra is a better one than Theodore Thomas's or Damrosch's, or equal to similar organizations in Paris or Vienna; whether it is or not is in one sense a distinctly subsidiary question. The point is simply this—that the extent and perfection of the organization, the number and popularity of the concerts and the character of the music, place it above most similar orchestras and make it equal to the best. Whether it is as well worth praising as it was once, whether Mr. Nikisch is as good a leader as Herr Gericke, whether the programmes are always judiciously selected—these are subjects upon which one may have an opinion without affecting the main issue.

At all events, the immense success of the Symphony Orchestra is too patent even to need mentioning. This week the seats for rehearsals and concerts have been selling at auction and the prices they have brought have afforded a pretty fair test of the popularity of these performances. Perhaps I should call them functions. That is the word which society—or at least the society papers—uses, and the "Symphonies" have been taken up by society to an extraordinary extent. If this could be laid to society's love of music we should all rejoice. Needless to say, it can not. Fashion is the real explanation. People go to these concerts because they are "the thing."

It is curious, indeed, to observe how social life is made to revolve about the Symphonies. In this respect they take the place which grand opera has held in New York. The women of light and leading here have their seats just as the women in New York have—or used to have—their boxes; and they pay high prices to get them. On Friday afternoons at the rehearsals, and on Saturday evenings at the concerts, society is out on dress parade. Both, especially the concerts, are made the nucleus of social engagements. People dine together before and sup together after. Some of the musicians themselves are in the social swim—not many of them. Herr Gericke was lionized here a good deal; so was his predecessor, Mr. Henschel. But Mr. Nikisch, the present leader, has no desire to roar in drawing rooms. He would have been "taken up" if he had wished. But he did not wish; he turned a deaf ear to siren invitations, preferring the company of his own countrymen in modest and informal reunions at the Adams House. Thus he has given offence—deep offence. What is the principal figure in a fashionable diversion for?

Thus these concerts are fulfilling a very different purpose than their founder intended. Mr. Higginson's wish was to put classical music, interpreted by the best players, within the reach of the many. Boston is a highly musical city. Hosts of teachers and composers live here. We have numberless schools, and a big Conservatory, of which last the less said the better. The sarcastic gentleman who described it as "a big boarding school, with a music box attachment," hit the bull's eye very effectually. Most of the instruction which pupils can get here, however, is really of the best. They have the advantage, too, of a really musical atmosphere. Outside of the Symphonies there are concerts and recitals innumerable. Perhaps there are too many of them; so that the result is a kind of asthetic indigestion.

The Symphonies, however, stand apart. Music is played there which can not be heard to advantage, if at all, anywhere else. To attend them is an invaluable privilege to students. When, at the start, course tickets were placed at $12 and $7 50, it was felt that these students would obtain and appreciate an unusual opportunity. Of course the concerts could not pay, but Mr. Higginson was willing to make good the deficit. It was the greatest benefaction which musical Boston has ever enjoyed. No city in the world could offer anything better.

Then society took up the Symphonies and it became "the thing" to attend them. The outcome could easily be foreseen. Seats in Music Hall began to acquire an increased—even a fictitious—value, and the premiums at the auction sales began to run very high. With the principle of these sales no one can find any fault. However unfortunate it may be that prices should thus be run up, there is no fairer way—perhaps none so fair—of disposing of the seats. To criticise any method adopted, moreover, would be somewhat impertinent. Mr. Higginson stood the loss for several seasons, and he was clearly entitled to the profits. There was no reason why he alone should support an institution reflecting so much credit upon all the city.

But there is one vital objection to auction sales, so far as maintaining the original purpose of these concerts is concerned. With society all agog to go, prices have advanced amazingly until the slim-pursed student and lover of music is practically crowded out. Seats can still be had at a moderate price in some remote corner of the hall. But these are few. The great bulk bring premiums many times their original value. There was actually one seat bidden in the other day at a premium of $380; which means over $16 a concert. This is an extraordinary, an unprecedented, instance. But premiums of $150 are not uncommon, and average premiums for the desirable seats range from $75 to $100. One who hears either rehearsals and concerts for not more than $2 each is very lucky indeed.

This the student or the music lover who is obliged to be economical is really no better off than he was before the Symphony Concerts were instituted. Society is getting its classical recreation, and is paying the full price for the same. Is this to be regretted or not? Perhaps society needs to be educated in this direction as much as that large and comparatively inconspicuous mass of human [illegible] is not [illegible]

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1892.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERT TALK.

A correspondent craves one last word concerning the Symphony Concert tickets. He asks, "Is it fair in estimating the average cost of desirable seats to take those under the balcony?" Certainly, since the premiums paid for some of those seats were higher than were earned for some of the seats "in the open," so to speak. Very high premiums were also paid for seats in the back rows of one of the galleries, where there are only narrow benches without backs, and a constricted space for one's knees. It would be impossible to strike an average without including every seat that was sold. The writer adds that in New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia there are few or no undesirable seats in the halls, meaning, presumably, those where the Symphony Orchestra gives concerts. The statement needs qualification. For our own part we would prefer the most remote corner on the Music Hall floor to any seat in the highest gallery of either the Brooklyn or the Philadelphia Academy of Music. Individual taste may guide one's preference. Our correspondent thus refers to the system pursued by the New York Philharmonic Society: "At the beginning of each season, subscribers of the previous season are invited to renew their tickets, and failing to do so the tickets are at the disposal of new subscribers, who must send their orders by mail to the secretary. No season tickets are to be had at the box office." If this custom were adopted by the managers of the Symphony Orchestra there would be no end to the moans and sobs over the favoritism and the exclusion of the masses from the benefits of the concerts. It is also to be remembered that the Symphony Orchestra gives at least forty-eight concerts in the Music Hall and eight in the Sanders Theatre—which, by the way, is nearer to the homes of many lovers of high class music on this side of the bridge than is the Metropolitan Opera House to the homes of many buyers of the Philharmonic tickets—while the great New York orchestra provides only twelve concerts, all told, in a season. Our correspondent complains of the eternal echo of Music Hall and protests against the great increase in numbers of the Symphony Orchestra on that account. Forty years' experience of the hall have not made us aware of echoes there with these exceptions: when the hall has been empty or nearly so, when somebody has been projecting a cornet solo into space, and when a brass band has been playing. An increase of the host of violins will not make more echoes possible—quite the contrary. The proportion of an orchestra to a hall is not a question of mathematics. In Paris, where they really know a little something about beauty of tone, the Sunday concerts at the Conservatory are given in an apartment much smaller than the Music Hall and with an orchestra of ninety.

BOSTON IDEAS

SEPTEMBER 25, 1892.

Good price that—$392. for a single Symphony seat.

LOCAL MUSICAL NOTES.

The choir of the Central Presbyterian Church are preparing a programme for a Columbian international concert, which they will give about October 21. The services of Miss Jessie Corlette and Messrs. Murray, Beresford and Westlake have been secured for the solo parts.

The responsibility, already assumed by the Detroit Musical Society, of engaging both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra for the only concerts they are to give in Detroit this season, is producing good results. The people, appreciating the sincerity and enterprise of the organization, recognize that it is the leading musical society of the city, and that as such, it will give the principal musical events of the season. Accordingly there is a good demand for season tickets. By subscribing $10 the subscriber receives three admissions to each one of the orchestral concerts (which cost, ordinarily, $1 50 each) and three admissions to the choral presentations by the society of "Elijah" and "The Creation." Surely, no better series at more liberal rates can be conceived.

Enterprise, Marlboro, Mass.

Date 9-26

The prices paid for Symphony concert tickets indicates that the owners of the burned New York Metropolitan Opera House might do worse than rebuild in Boston.

N Y Recorder 9/20

It is a crying shame that New York has not men possessed of public spirit enough to make grand opera a permanency. Little need now of crowing over Boston, and telling the inhabitants of the beaned Hub that Gotham is a musical as well as a literary centre. Boston can truthfully reply that it owns the best orchestra in the country, and that New York has grand opera no longer.

How have the mighty fallen!

Clipping from Transcript Boston Letter Date 9-28 complished the dastardly deed had nothing for their reward [illegible] accomplishment than a awful and cowardly wholesale murder.

Boston Letter

There is a sort of musical craze at present in this city. An organization known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed almost entirely of Germans, has been giving winter season concerts for some years past. Its forte is classical music, with the works of the modern continental masters added. Of course there are many who understand and admire the style of music, but there are also infinitely more who do not. Many of the former unluckily are either poor, or, at the best, people of moderate means, while of the latter it is safe to say they largely embrace in their ranks the vast body of the noveau richesse, or, as we bluntly put it, "the shoddy aristocracy." Now, among the latter it has got to be "the proper caper" to affect a wild enthusiasm over the divine art. Those who could not tell whether a piece was written in the key of M or of X, roll their eyes with a beatified expression when a Beethoven Sonata or the "Fifth Nocturne" is alluded. Well, so determined are these people to be on hand to display their grand toilets and flashing diamonds that there has been a tremendous rush for seats, so that the management, seeing a fine chance to make a harvest, decided to auction the seats, with the result that the premiums bid have put some of the best seats up to $19.50 a ticket for each performance, and as there will be twenty performances, the total cost for this seat will be $390. And yet in many places little children are crying for bread. The seats for the daytime rehearsals which used to sell for 25 cents to 50 cents each ticket, have been run up to $6 each (under the galleries and next the wall). What chance have the common people in this instance? And all to hear a band, which, on the whole, is inferior to the band of "H. M. Leicestershire" regiment stationed at Halifax.

* * * * *

Spy, Worcester, Mass.

Date 9-30

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

DATES FOR THE FOUR CONCERTS DEFINITELY ANNOUNCED.

It is definitely stated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Worcester with soloists for a series of four concerts during the coming season. The management wishes it stated that all subscribers will have an analytical program mailed to them a few days in advance of each concert, giving an opportunity for study of the works to be rendered. Further, that subscribers will have first choice of seats on Nov. 5th, the public sale opening Nov. 8th. The subscription book will be left open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s until Oct. 15. Between 600 and 700 seats are already subscribed for. The dates of the concerts are Nov. 28, Dec. 29, Feb. 16, March 28.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 9-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard as heretofore at Chickering Hall. Music lovers are impatient for the first concert of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's men.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 2.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three afternoon concerts in Chickering Hall during the coming season.

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place at the University Bookstore, Harvard square, on Saturday, Oct. 15, at 8 A. M.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who has played with Mr. Adamowski at the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past seven years, will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 94.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1892.

The sale of season tickets for the 10 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take at the University bookstore, Harvard square, on Saturday Oct. 15, at 8 A. M.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who [illegible] occupied with Mr. Adamowski the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past seven years will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

[13]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1892.

Failed to Secure Large Premiums.

Undoubtedly the rain of the forenoon had much to do with the attendance at the auction sale of seats for Star Course of Entertainments which was held in Tremont Temple this forenoon. There were about a hundred persons in the hall when the sale began, but more came in as it progressed. The sale began with the third row from the front and no one cared to bid for the seats on the sides under the galleries. The bidding at no time could be called lively. The auctioneer made frequent references to the $380 premium for a single symphony seat, but the best that he could get was about a hundredth of that sum. The seats which were not purchased at the sale today will be sold at the Tremont Temple box-office tomorrow beginning at 8 A. M.

TELEGRAPH, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 9-24

Concert-goers will be interested in some of Mr. Nikisch's plans for the approaching season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The membership of the band will remain practically what it was last year. For the local concerts in Boston a choir of 200 voices has been organized, which will be trained by Arthur Foote. There will be analytical notes on the programmes written by W. F. Apthorp. In the list of compositions to be played we find the following novelties: E. A. McDowell, "Launcelot and Elaine"; Eugen D'Albert, symphony; Saint-Saens, symphony, A minor; Rudorff, symphony, G minor; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest"; Thierot, symphonietta; Cesar Cui, petite suite; Riemenschneiner, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"; Raff, symphonietta for wind instrument; Charpentier, Impressions d'Italie; Homberger, pachimanik for string orchestra.

Clipping from Worcester Mass

Date 9-24

The tickets for the Symphony Concerts were sold at auction in Boston this week, and brought high prices. Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $392 for a seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsals and bought three others at $102 each.

Clipping from Providence Newton Mass

Date 9-23

THE sale of seats for the concerts and public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Monday and Tuesday were very satisfactory, the highest premium for the concerts being $380. For the rehearsals the premiums ranged from $10 to $30. These prices are greatly in excess of last year's sales.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28.

Miss Emma Juch is engaged as soloist at the Symphony concerts Oct. 28 and 29.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, beginning in October. Many who were disappointed in securing seats for the Boston concerts will doubtless avail themselves of this opportunity.

Rep Rep St Louis Mo

MUSIC HATH CHARMS.

The membership of the Nikisch Orchestra for next season, it is announced, will remain the same. For local concerts in Boston a chorus of 200 will be organized and trained by Arthur Foote. There will be analytical notes on the programmes by H. F. Apstrom. In the list of novelties to be given are included A. E. McDowell's "Launcelot and Eleine," Eugen D'Albert's new symphony, Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, opus 55; Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Tempest;" "Symphonetta" by Cesar Cue; symphonic poem, "Todtentanz," by Riemenscheiner, and "Impressions d'Italie" by Charpentier.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 9-25

Boston's extraordinary appreciation of its Symphony Orchestra has been strikingly proved this week, the tickets having gone at absurdly high premiums. The purchase of one seat at a premium of $380, or a cost of $16 for each concert, is an extreme instance, but the average purchaser of a season ticket was made to pay at the rate of from $2 to $4 for one entertainment, or, to speak by the book, the purchaser pays the regular price for the ticket and $2 to $16, as the case may be, for the glory of possessing it. The bonus goes to Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the promoter of the concerts, and will be expended in a public-spirited manner, to give ticket holders, so far as possible, the worth of their money. The public ventures to hope that a second popular rehearsal may be given before each concert, to allow music lovers with light purses to share in the entertainment.

[illegible], Providence, R. I.

Date 9-25

Boston, Sept. 2[illegible]

It doesn't seem as if this could really be the twelfth season of the Symphony concerts in this city, but that is what the advertisements say, and I suppose there is no use disputing them. No more successful artistic enterprise was ever planned or carried out. We have all talked a good deal of Mr. Higginson's generosity, but I don't think that we even yet quite appreciate it. There was no reason to suppose, twelve years ago, that Boston would or could support a body of musicians superior to any other in this country and equal to any in Europe. This is not, of course, the same thing as saying that our Symphony Orchestra is a better one than Theodore Thomas's or Damrosch's, or equal to similar organizations in Paris or Vienna; whether it is or not is in one sense a distinctly subsidiary question. The point is simply this—that the extent and perfection of the organization, the number and popularity of the concerts and the character of the music, place it above most similar orchestras and make it equal to the best. Whether it is as well worth praising as it was once, whether Mr. Nikisch is as good a leader as Herr Gericke, whether the programmes are always judiciously selected—these are subjects upon which one may have an opinion without affecting the main issue.

At all events, the immense success of the Symphony Orchestra is too patent even to need mentioning. This week the seats for rehearsals and concerts have been selling at auction and the prices they have brought have afforded a pretty fair test of the popularity of these performances. Perhaps I should call them functions. That is the word which society—or at least the society papers—uses, and the "Symphonies" have been taken up by society to an extraordinary extent. If this could be laid to society's love of music we should all rejoice. Needless to say, it can not. Fashion is the real explanation. People go to these concerts because they are "the thing."

It is curious, indeed, to observe how social life is made to revolve about the Symphonies. In this respect they take the place which grand opera has held in New York. The women of light and leading here have their seats just as the women in New York have—or used to have—their boxes; and they pay high prices to get them. On Friday afternoons at the rehearsals, and on Saturday evenings at the concerts, society is out on dress parade. Both, especially the concerts, are made the nucleus of social engagements. People dine together before and sup together after. Some of the musicians themselves are in the social swim—not many of them. Herr Gericke was lionized here a good deal; so was his predecessor, Mr. Henschel. But Mr. Nikisch, the present leader, has no desire to roar in drawing rooms. He would have been "taken up" if he had wished. But he did not wish; he turned a deaf ear to siren invitations, preferring the company of his own countrymen in modest and informal reunions at the Adams House. Thus he has given offence—deep offence. What is the principal figure in a fashionable diversion for?

Thus these concerts are fulfilling a very different purpose than their founder intended. Mr. Higginson's wish was to put classical music, interpreted by the best players, within the reach of the many. Boston is a highly musical city. Hosts of teachers and composers live here. We have numberless schools, and a big Conservatory, of which last the less said the better. The sarcastic gentleman who described it as "a big boarding school, with a music box attachment," hit the bull's eye very effectually. Most of the instruction which pupils can get here, however, is really of the best. They have the advantage, too, of a really musical atmosphere. Outside of the Symphonies there are concerts and recitals innumerable. Perhaps there are too many of them; so that the result is a kind of asthetic indigestion.

The Symphonies, however, stand apart. Music is played there which can not be heard to advantage, if at all, anywhere else. To attend them is an invaluable privilege to students. When, at the start, course tickets were placed at $12 and $7 50, it was felt that these students would obtain and appreciate an unusual opportunity. Of course the concerts could not pay, but Mr. Higginson was willing to make good the deficit. It was the greatest benefaction which musical Boston has ever enjoyed. No city in the world could offer anything better.

Then society took up the Symphonies and it became "the thing" to attend them.

The outcome could easily be foreseen. Seats in Music Hall began to acquire an increased—even a fictitious—value, and the premiums at the auction sales began to run very high. With the principle of these sales no one can find any fault. However unfortunate it may be that prices should thus be run up, there is no fairer way—perhaps none so fair—of disposing of the seats. To criticise any method adopted, moreover, would be somewhat impertinent. Mr. Higginson stood the loss for several seasons, and he was clearly entitled to the profits. There was no reason why he alone should support an institution reflecting so much credit upon all the city.

But there is one vital objection to auction sales, so far as maintaining the original purpose of these concerts is concerned. With society all agog to go, prices have advanced amazingly until the slim-pursed student and lover of music is practically crowded out. Seats can still be had at a moderate price in some remote corner of the hall. But these are few. The great bulk bring premiums many times their original value. There was actually one seat bidden in the other day at a premium of $380; which means over $16 a concert. This is an extraordinary, an unprecedented, instance. But premiums of $150 are not uncommon, and average premiums for the desirable seats range from $75 to $100. One who hears either rehearsals and concerts for not more than $2 each is very lucky indeed.

Thus the student or the music lover who is obliged to be economical is really no better off than he was before the Symphony Concerts were instituted. Society is getting its classical recreation, and is paying the full price for the same. Is this to be regretted or not? Perhaps society needs to be educated in this direction as much as that large and comparatively inconspicuous mass of human beings that is not society.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1892.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERT TALK.

A correspondent craves one last word concerning the Symphony Concert tickets. He asks, "Is it fair in estimating the average cost of desirable seats to take those under the balcony?" Certainly, since the premiums paid for some of those seats were higher than were earned for some of the seats "in the open," so to speak. Very high premiums were also paid for seats in the back rows of one of the galleries, where there are only narrow benches without backs, and a constricted space for one's knees. It would be impossible to strike an average without including every seat that was sold. The writer adds that in New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia there are few or no undesirable seats in the halls, meaning, presumably, those where the Symphony Orchestra gives concerts. The statement needs qualification. For our own part we would prefer the most remote corner on the Music Hall floor to any seat in the highest gallery of either the Brooklyn or the Philadelphia Academy of Music. Individual taste may guide one's preference. Our correspondent thus refers to the system pursued by the New York Philharmonic Society: "At the beginning of each season, subscribers of the previous season are invited to renew their tickets, and failing to do so the tickets are at the disposal of new subscribers, who must send their orders by mail to the secretary. No season tickets are to be had at the box office." If this custom were adopted by the managers of the Symphony Orchestra there would be no end to the moans and sobs over the favoritism and the exclusion of the masses from the benefits of the concerts. It is also to be remembered that the Symphony Orchestra gives at least forty-eight concerts in the Music Hall and eight in the Sanders Theatre—which, by the way, is nearer to the homes of many lovers of high class music on this side of the bridge than is the Metropolitan Opera House to the homes of many buyers of the Philharmonic tickets—while the great New York orchestra provides only twelve concerts, all told, in a season. Our correspondent complains of the eternal echo of Music Hall and protests against the great increase in numbers of the Symphony Orchestra on that account. Forty years' experience of the hall have not made us aware of echoes there with these exceptions: when the hall has been empty or nearly so, when somebody has been projecting a cornet solo into space, and when a brass band has been playing. An increase of the host of violins will not make more echoes possible—quite the contrary. The proportion of an orchestra to a hall is not a question of mathematics. In Paris, where they really know a little something about beauty of tone, the Sunday concerts at the Conservatory are given in an apartment much smaller than the Music Hall and with an orchestra of ninety.

BOSTON IDEAS

SEPTEMBER 25, 1892.

Good price that—$392. for a single Symphony seat.

LOCAL MUSICAL NOTES.

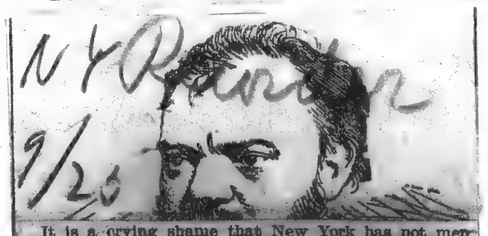
The choir of the Central Presbyterian Church are preparing a programme for a Columbian international concert, which they will give about October 21. The services of Miss Jessie Corlette and Messrs. Murray, Beresford and Westlake have been secured for the solo parts.

The responsibility, already assumed by the Detroit Musical Society, of engaging both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra for the only concerts they are to give in Detroit this season, is producing good results. The people, appreciating the sincerity and enterprise of the organization, recognize that it is the leading musical society of the city, and that as such, it will give the principal musical events of the season. Accordingly there is a good demand for season tickets. By subscribing $10 the subscriber receives three admissions to each one of the orchestral concerts (which cost, ordinarily, $1 50 each) and three admissions to the choral presentations by the society of "Elijah" and "The Creation." Surely, no better series at more liberal rates can be conceived.

Enterprise, Marlboro, Mass.

Date 9-26

The prices paid for Symphony concert tickets indicates that the owners of the burned New York Metropolitan Opera House might do worse than rebuild in Boston.



N Y Recorder 9/20

It is a crying shame that New York has not men possessed of public spirit enough to make grand opera a permanency. Little need now of crowing over Boston, and telling the inhabitants of the beanfed Hub that Gotham is a musical as well as a literary centre. Boston can truthfully reply that it owns the best orchestra in the country, and that New York has grand opera no longer.

How have the mighty fallen!

Clipping from Evening Budgetown Mass 9-28

Date (Boston Letter)

complished the dastardly deed had nothing for their reward [illegible] accomplishment [illegible] awful and cowardly wholesale murder.

(Boston Letter)

There is a sort of musical craze at present in this city. An organization known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed almost entirely of Germans, has been giving winter season concerts for some years past. Its forte is classical music, with the works of the modern continental masters added. Of course there are many who understand and admire the style of music, but there are also infinitely more who do not. Many of the former unluckily are either poor, or, at the best, people of moderate means, while of the latter it is safe to say they largely embrace in their ranks the vast body of the noveau richesse, or, as we bluntly put it, "the shoddy aristocracy." Now, among the latter it has got to be "the proper caper" to affect a wild enthusiasm over the divine art. Those who could not tell whether a piece was written in the key of M or of X, roll their eyes with a beatified expression when a Beethoven Sonata or the "Fifth Nocturne" is alluded. Well, so determined are these people to be on hand to display their grand toilets and flashing diamonds that there has been a tremendous rush for seats, so that the management, seeing a fine chance to make a harvest, decided to auction the seats, with the result that the premiums bid have put some of the best seats up to $19.50 a ticket for each performance, and as there will be twenty performances, the total cost for this seat will be $390. And yet in many places little children are crying for bread. The seats for the daytime rehearsals which used to sell for 25 cents to 50 cents each ticket, have been run up to $6 each (under the galleries and next the wall). What chance have the common people in this instance? And all to hear a band, which, on the whole, is inferior to the band of "H. M. Leicestershire" regiment stationed at Halifax.

* * * * *

[illegible] Worcester Mass

Date 9-30

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

DATES FOR THE FOUR CONCERTS DEFINITELY ANNOUNCED.

It is definitely stated that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Worcester with soloists for a series of four concerts during the coming season. The management wishes it stated that all subscribers will have an analytical program mailed to them a few days in advance of each concert, giving an opportunity for study of the works to be rendered. Further, that subscribers will have first choice of seats on Nov. 5th, the public sale opening Nov. 8th. The subscription book will be left open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s until Oct. 15. Between 600 and 700 seats are already subscribed for. The dates of the concerts are Nov. 22, Dec. 29, Feb. 16, March 28.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 9-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard as heretofore at Chickering Hall. Music lovers are impatient for the first concert of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's men.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 2.

The Adamowski Quartet will give three afternoon concerts in Chickering Hall during the coming season.

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place at the University Bookstore, Harvard square, on Saturday, Oct. 15, at 8 A. M.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who has played with Mr. Adamowski at the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past seven years, will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 94.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1892.

The sale of season tickets for the 10 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take at the University bookstore, Harvard square on Saturday Oct. 15, at 8 A. M.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who is occupied with Mr. Adamowski the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past seven years will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

[13]

MONDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1892.

AN INVITATION.

The following invitation has been received from the Director General of the World's Columbian Exposition by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION, CHICAGO.

Gentlemen: The World's Columbian Exposition requests the honor of receiving the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its guest at such time as may be convenient, inviting it to give two concerts in the Music Hall of the Exposition. Awaiting your favorable response to the Bureau of Music,

Your obedient servants,
GEORGE R. DAVIS, Director General.
THEODORE THOMAS, Musical Director.
JOHN T. DICKINSON,
Secretary World's Columbian Exposition.

The above invitation has been accepted for the third week in May, '93, the exact days to be fixed hereafter.

The sale of seats for the Sanders Theatre Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Seaver's book store, Harvard square, Old Cambridge, Saturday morning.

The Mendelssohn Quintet Club start out on their annual tour to-day, beginning in Spencer, and in Westfield Tuesday.

Miss Laura Burnham of Boston is in Paris studying with Marchesi.

Miss Marguerite Hall will give song recitals in Chickering Hall Friday afternoon, Nov. 4, and Saturday evening, Nov. 5. Her programme will include songs by Beethoven, Handel, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Bruch and Henschel, also songs by composers of the 17th century.

The members of the Boston Singers' Society are cordially invited to join the chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. It is expected that the chorus will appear at several concerts in the regular series and at two extra performances. Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote in Sumstead Hall Tuesday evening, beginning punctually at 7.30 and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal. The last rehearsal before each concert in which the chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall Thursday evening, and will be with orchestra and soloists.

AN ABUSED MAN.

All thoughtful and unprejudiced musicians and lovers of music rejoiced when Theodore Thomas was chosen director-in-chief of the musical exercises of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago. The selection was a guarantee of good faith. It was an assurance that the musical features of the exposition would be worthy of the occasion. For Mr. Thomas has shown in his public career remarkable skill as a drillmaster, catholic taste in the arrangement of programmes, a desire to encourage all that is new and worthy of respect and indomitable perseverance and courage in the face of difficulties and discouragements. The American composer owes him a special debt of gratitude. Nor is it too much to say that Mr. Thomas has done more than any one man in this country in raising and broadening the musical taste of the people of the United States. To have passed him over in selecting a fit man for the place would have been an extraordinary instance of the traditional ingratitude of republics.

It is easy to forget the labors of Mr. Thomas. To-day orchestral concerts are in fashion. Here in Boston speculators welcome eagerly the announcement for the sale of tickets for the symphony concerts in Music Hall. The speculator is always found close to the heels of fashion. The caprice of the rich man or the fashionable woman increases the expense of the pleasure or the education of the student of music. That which is true in Boston holds good in other large cities. There are reasons for this enthusiasm of fashion. There are now excellent orchestras in this country besides the organization under the direction of Mr. Thomas. There are conductors worthy of respect. But these orchestras would not now be in existence if Mr. Thomas had not prepared the way. He was the drudge, the pioneer. After his labors Messrs. Seidl and Vander Stucken, Nikisch and Damrosch reap the reward.

Many will recall easily the condition of musical affairs when Mr. Thomas first began to travel with his orchestra. The lighter symphonies of Beethoven were regarded by audiences as hard nuts to crack. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was considered radical music. The Strauss waltz, which in those days was an indispensable number, gave the genuine pleasure. Little by little the people became acquainted with modern works of all schools. The musical stomach grew stronger. The programmes were of a higher standard. Mr. Thomas never wavered in his task of educating the public.

If Mr. Thomas were at present loose in discipline, a rider of a hobby horse, or a physical or mental sufferer by the march of years, there might be a pretext for the attacks made upon him by certain people in New York. His eye is not dim, nor his natural force abated. Why then is he a target for poisoned arrows? The exposition at Chicago is not a local issue. There is no question between the rival claims of Chicago and New York. Why should there be this incessant demand that Mr. Seidl, who is a successful director of the music-dramas of Wagner, should have the place of honor at the feast? Why should Mr. Damrosch, who leans so heavily on the broad shoulder of Mr. Brodsky, be boosted into attention as deserving national recognition? The present action of certain members of the New York press is the working out of old private grievances or the grinding of new axes. And so we find that the refusal of Mr. Brahms to cross the Atlantic is really due to the glaring incompetence of Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Joachim would land, without doubt, at New York if there was another chief at Chicago.

The arrangements that have been made at Chicago are worthy of the occasion. There has been an absence of all that is mean and low; there is no smell of jobbery. Mr. Thomas deserves the hearty and unquestioning support of all Americans interested in music. Writers on musical subjects show often the irritability attributed to poets. And there are such writers in New York, who are so busy in their attempt to Germanize musical America that they cannot afford

Boston Musical Herald. BOSTON, OCTOBER, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor ARTHUR NIKISCH.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-1893.

For Terms, Dates, &c., Address

C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

Also this pertinent paragraph about the orchestral music: "An appropriation of $175,000 for a permanent orchestra of 120, was made June 30. When it is realized that no less than three hundred concerts will be given at which the services of an orchestra will be required, and that the time of giving those concerts which depend upon the presence in Chicago of visiting choral societies, and of distinguished foreign composers, cannot be fixed with certainty for many days in advance, the imperative need of a permanent orchestra will be seen. Provision being made for the appearance at the Exposition of representative orchestras of New York City and Boston, invitations have been sent to the New York Philharmonic Society, Anton Seidl, Conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, Conductor."

THE MUSICAL SEASON.

Already a few interesting nuggets of news concerning the coming musical season are available. Boston's dominating organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its twelfth season, fourth with Arthur Nikisch, Conductor, on Oct. 15. Twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Saturdays and Fridays, omitting Nov. 5, 4; Dec. 10, 9; Jan. 14, 13; Feb. 11, 10; March 18, 17. The orchestra will be increased to 90 players. For the first time in the history of the organization a chorus will be maintained throughout the season. The important task of organizing and drilling it has been intrusted to Arthur Foote. Mr. Nikisch has announced a partial repertoire for the season which is appended:

It is estimated that the sum of $125,000 will fall short of the actual amount received at the season ticket sales of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place the last week in September. Every seat in Boston Music Hall for concerts and rehearsals was sold, excepting those in the second balcony section, some five hundred in all, which are held for single buyers of rehearsal tickets. The September Symphony fever in Boston has no parallel the world over. This year more money than ever was realized in premiums, the maximum amount being $392. The tears of the disappointed ones fill the columns of the Transcript but, as usual, no one minds their flow; for they represent, not the sighs of the disappointed music lover but of the piqued persons who have lost their chance to train with Fashion's favored ones.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE,

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with the assistance of

Eminent Soloists,

will give a series of

TEN CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 20th, November 10th, December 1st, December 22d, 1892, January 19th, February 2d, February 23d, March 23d, April 13th and April 27th, 1893.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, October 15th. Sale opens at eight A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

SEVENTY PERFORMERS.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.

The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o10 J&B6t (15)

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 10-10

The first public rehearsal of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place October 14th and 15th in Music Hall. The program will include, probably, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the prelude to "Tristan," and Wagner's Kaiser march. There will be no soloist.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 10-8

Boston's Boss Orchestra Coming.

The Boston symphony orchestra has officially accepted the invitation of the exposition to visit Chicago as guest. The concerts will be given under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, conductor, by the full orchestra of ninety players. While the date is not positively fixed it will probably be about the third week in May, 1893.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 10-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, numbering ninety players, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give five concerts in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9 and March 16. Mr. Nikisch has been invited by the World's Fair Committee to give two concerts at the exhibition next May and has accepted.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 10-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts at Chickering Hall, New York city, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16.

[14]

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1892.

AN INVITATION.

The following invitation has been received from the Director General of the World's Columbian Exposition by the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION, CHICAGO.

Gentlemen: The World's Columbian Exposition requests the honor of receiving the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its guest at such time as may be convenient, inviting it to give two concerts in the Music Hall of the Exposition. Awaiting your favorable response to the Bureau of Music,

Your obedient servants,
GEORGE R. DAVIS, Director General.
THEODORE THOMAS, Musical Director.
JOHN T. DICKINSON,
Secretary World's Columbian Exposition.

The above invitation has been accepted for the third week in May, '93, the exact days to be fixed hereafter.

The sale of seats for the Sanders Theatre Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Seaver's book store, Harvard square, Old Cambridge, Saturday morning.

The Mendelssohn Quintet Club start out on their annual tour to-day, beginning in Spencer, and in Westfield Tuesday.

Miss Laura Burnham of Boston is in Paris studying with Marchesi.

Miss Marguerite Hall will give song recitals in Chickering Hall Friday afternoon, Nov. 4, and Saturday evening, Nov. 5. Her programme will include songs by Beethoven, Handel, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Bruch and Henschel; also songs by composers of the 17th century.

The members of the Boston Singers' Society are cordially invited to join the chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. It is expected that the chorus will appear at several concerts in the regular series and at two extra performances. Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote in Rumstead Hall Tuesday evening, beginning punctually at 7.30 and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal. The last rehearsal before each concert in which the chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall Thursday evening, and will be with orchestra and soloists.

AN ABUSED MAN.

All thoughtful and unprejudiced musicians and lovers of music rejoiced when Theodore Thomas was chosen director-in-chief of the musical exercises of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago. The selection was a guarantee of good faith. It was an assurance that the musical features of the exposition would be worthy of the occasion. For Mr. Thomas has shown in his public career remarkable skill as a drillmaster, catholic taste in the arrangement of programmes, a desire to encourage all that is new and worthy of respect and indomitable perseverance and courage in the face of difficulties and discouragements. The American composer owes him a special debt of gratitude. Nor is it too much to say that Mr. Thomas has done more than any one man in this country in raising and broadening the musical taste of the people of the United States. To have passed him over in selecting a fit man for the place would have been an extraordinary instance of the traditional ingratitude of republics.

It is easy to forget the labors of Mr. Thomas. To-day orchestral concerts are in fashion. Here in Boston speculators welcome eagerly the announcement for the sale of tickets for the symphony concerts in Music Hall. The speculator is always found close to the heels of fashion. The caprice of the rich man or the fashionable woman increases the expense of the pleasure or the education of the student of music. That which is true in Boston holds good in other large cities. There are reasons for this enthusiasm of fashion. There are now excellent orchestras in this country besides the organization under the direction of Mr. Thomas. There are conductors worthy of respect. But these orchestras would not now be in existence if Mr. Thomas had not prepared the way. He was the drudge, the pioneer. After his labors Messrs. Seidl and Vander Stucken, Nikisch and Damrosch reap the reward.

Many will recall easily the condition of musical affairs when Mr. Thomas first began to travel with his orchestra. The lighter symphonies of Beethoven were regarded by audiences as hard nuts to crack. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was considered radical music. The Strauss waltz, which in those days was an indispensable number, gave the genuine pleasure. Little by little the people became acquainted with modern works of all schools. The musical stomach grew stronger. The programmes were of a higher standard. Mr. Thomas never wavered in his task of educating the public.

If Mr. Thomas were at present loose in discipline, a rider of a hobby horse, or a physical or mental sufferer by the march of years, there might be a pretext for the attacks made upon him by certain people in New York. His eye is not dim, nor his natural force abated. Why then is he a target for poisoned arrows? The exposition at Chicago is not a local issue. There is no question between the rival claims of Chicago and New York. Why should there be this incessant demand that Mr. Seidl, who is a successful director of the music-dramas of Wagner, should have the place of honor at the feast? Why should Mr. Damrosch, who leans so heavily on the broad shoulder of Mr. Brodsky, be boosted into attention as deserving national recognition? The present action of certain members of the New York press is the working out of old private grievances or the grinding of new axes. And so we find that the refusal of Mr. Brahms to cross the Atlantic is really due to the glaring incompetence of Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Joachim would land, without doubt, at New York if there was another chief at Chicago.

The arrangements that have been made at Chicago are worthy of the occasion. There has been an absence of all that is mean and low; there is no smell of jobbery. Mr. Thomas deserves the hearty and unquestioning support of all Americans interested in music. Writers on musical subjects show often the irritability attributed to poets. And there are such writers in New York, who are so busy in their attempt to Germanize musical America that they cannot afford to be just.

Boston Musical Herald. BOSTON, OCTOBER, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor ARTHUR NIKISCH.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-1893.

For Terms, Dates, &c., Address

C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

Also this pertinent paragraph about the orchestral music: "An appropriation of $175,000 for a permanent orchestra of 120, was made June 30. When it is realized that no less than three hundred concerts will be given at which the services of an orchestra will be required, and that the time of giving those concerts which depend upon the presence in Chicago of visiting choral societies, and of distinguished foreign composers, cannot be fixed with certainty for many days in advance, the imperative need of a permanent orchestra will be seen. Provision being made for the appearance at the Exposition of representative orchestras of New York City and Boston, invitations have been sent to the New York Philharmonic Society, Anton Seidl, Conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, Conductor."

THE MUSICAL SEASON.

Already a few interesting nuggets of news concerning the coming musical season are available. Boston's dominating organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its twelfth season, fourth with Arthur Nikisch, Conductor, on Oct. 15. Twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Saturdays and Fridays, omitting Nov. 5, 4; Dec. 10, 9; Jan. 14, 13; Feb. 11, 10; March 18, 17. The orchestra will be increased to 90 players. For the first time in the history of the organization a chorus will be maintained throughout the season. The important task of organizing and drilling it has been intrusted to Arthur Foote. Mr. Nikisch has announced a partial repertoire for the season which is appended:

It is estimated that the sum of $125,000 will fall short of the actual amount received at the season ticket sales of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place the last week in September. Every seat in Boston Music Hall for concerts and rehearsals was sold, excepting those in the second balcony section, some five hundred in all, which are held for single buyers of rehearsal tickets. The September Symphony fever in Boston has no parallel the world over. This year more money than ever was realized in premiums, the maximum amount being $392. The tears of the disappointed ones fill the columns of the Transcript but, as usual, no one minds their flow; for they represent, not the sighs of the disappointed music lover but of the piqued persons who have lost their chance to train with Fashion's favored ones.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE,

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with the assistance of

Eminent Soloists,

will give a series of

TEN CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 20th, November 10th, December 1st, December 22d, 1892, January 19th, February 2d, February 23d, March 23d, April 13th and April 27th, 1893.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, October 15th. Sale opens at eight A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

(SEVENTY PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.

The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o10 J&B6t (15)

Journal, Lewiston Me.

Date 10-3

The first public rehearsal of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will take place October 14th and 15th in Music Hall. The program will include, probably, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the prelude to "Tristan," and Wagner's Kaiser march. There will be no soloist.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 10-8

Boston's Boss Orchestra Coming.

The Boston symphony orchestra has officially accepted the invitation of the exposition to visit Chicago as guest. The concerts will be given under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, conductor, by the full orchestra of ninety players. While the date is not positively fixed it will probably be about the third week in May, 1893.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.

Date 10-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, numbering ninety players, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give five concerts in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9 and March 16. Mr. Nikisch has been invited by the World's Fair Committee to give two concerts at the exhibition next May and has accepted.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.

Date 10-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts at Chickering Hall, New York city, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 16.

[14]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tonight the new season of Symphony concerts is to begin in Music Hall, when Mr. Nikisch will present three works—Beethoven's fifth symphony, the prelude and death-scenes from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Royal March" of Wagner. It is a strong programme, passing through many phases of feeling.

The sale of seats for the ten concerts to be given in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is going on this morning, and the signs point to an unusually large attendance of Boston people, who have been disappointed of their seats in Boston or who prefer the effect of the music in that hall. The programmes are al-

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The announcement that the Kneisel Quartette will begin on Monday evening next a new series of light concerts is a welcome one. It means that there will be heard in due course a selection of the best chamber music of the present and past times performed undoubtedly as well as it can be anywhere in the world. Mr. Kneisel's acquaintance with the literature of his art is wide, and his taste is unimpeachable, while his coadjutors have been associated with him long enough to insure unity of view and action. The artists who are to assist are all eminent in their several ways, and thus variety as well as purity of programmes is secured. The concerts—the first of which falls on Monday evening next—are to be given at Chickering Hall, the capacity of which is limited, so that the current sale of seats should not be neglected.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15.

The Symphony Orchestra is to give a series of ten concerts at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, beginning October 20th. It will be assisted by eminent soloists. The sale of season tickets with reserved seats opens at the University Book Store, Cambridge, today.

The first of the series of eight concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given at Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The deserved popularity of the quartet insures a full house and an appreciative audience. Ladies especially appreciate the change from Union to Chickering Hall, as the long flights of stairs are avoided. Tickets are on sale at the Music Hall box office.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

(SEVENTY PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street, (O'Conner's flower store, opposite Boston store.)

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

(15)

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

The attention to the many patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again called to the series of six concerts to be given in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings during the coming season. The visits of this organization have become a welcome feature of each musical season. It is no longer necessary to speak of the quality of its performances, and of the carefulness which characterizes all the work of preparation. It is well known in all cities where the orchestra has played that it stands on a plane which few orchestral bodies can be compared with. In the individual excellence of its players, and the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert, and the management will present other eminent soloists to be announced later. The sale of tickets for these concerts takes place at O'Connor's Flower Store, 170 Westminster street, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

[15]

Boston Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 15, 1892.

OH! SO DELIGHTFUL.

Fashionable to Rush at Symphony Rehearsals.

Fair Girl Criticises Mr. Nikisch for the Color of His Trousers.

But Then All Admired the Music and the Chance to Gossip.

"They says such things an' they does such things—on the Bowery."

Likewise at Symphony concerts.

From a recipe for making doughnuts to a description of Matilda's maid of honor's dress with the lilac velvet sleeves, there wasn't anything they didn't talk about yesterday, and there were practical object lessons in a great variety of things from tumbling upstairs to crochetting a necktie.

Fact!

If there's anybody left who supposes the great and only symphony concerts are enchanted regions where the body is annihilated and only the soul floats on in space, the rarity of which is expressed by the equation, the tooness of the which equals the thenness of the now—well, all is, he is destined to be shown as a freak beside the glass eaters, the person who continues to swallow this fiction.

Dear Music Hall!

Everything good and glorious ever said or prophesied about it is all true. At every one of its truly melodious functions the real musicians there do congregate, and also a very many more people who appreciate the notes of the heavenly maid, but they aren't all.

No.

Variety is the spice of life.

It is, it is, and there are condiments enough at a Music Hall symphony concert to give relish to the biggest spice pudding ever concocted.

Also at the concert Rehearsals, Reheasrsal with a cap R.

For 12 years now has the chronicler had to epitomize the initial performance of the series of tuneful entertainments that crowd Music Hall floor and two balconies, and fill in all the standing and perching room between.

Yesterday when a cordial ripple of

Kid Glove Applause

announced the appearance from behind the body of players of Herr Arthur Nikisch there were a few seats on the floor unfilled, and the steps of the stage were not preempted by "admissioners," every other nook and corner was filled.

The few vacant seats were nearly all occupied after the first intermission, a few alone standing in empty state to mark the absence of society's Mrs. Courtly, who journeyeth home from the land of the almond-eyed and chrysanthemums.

It might have been a concert rehearsal of last season or of season before last or the one before that, but for the fact of that rug, a new rug, a white rug, a wolf's skin that has naught whatever to do with sheep's clothing. It covers the baton wielder's stand. It is conspicuous, very.

"The man who stands on it ought to wear serpent-blue trousers, they're adorable. 'Dolphe got some in Picadilly," a pretty girl said so, and it must be so.

Mr. Nikisch wore gray trousers and they killed the rug and the rug killed them, but the music was divine; the pretty girl said that, too.

It was Beethoven to begin with, the fifth symphony, and the big audience liked it. The biggest pianist in Boston was there and he said it was great playing and great conducting, the best in the world, and his nearest neighbor agreed.

The people listened, all of them without a murmur, save the fiance of the pretty girl in the tiny chapeau with forget-me-nots for strings. He whispered a little, but anybody in his place couldn't have resisted doing the same.

The expressions of the listeners were not monotonous. They ranged from seraphic to the land of Nod, mostly betwixt' and between, on the pitch of vivid interest.

The first Rehearsal of the season, the smallest democratic gathering of local clans of the round year, warranted duplication 23 times, unless brass and wood wind blow themselves into Mars before season tickets are punched with eyelets.

Verily, verily democratic was the audience traversing the scale, from the seat-owners, who covered them with gold eagles, to the "rushers," the people who pay a quarter and face murder, sudden death and annihilation to get the upper balcony unreserved seats.

What a lot they are, very largely music students.

With More Time Than Money,

and every phase of character from the philosopher, who counts standing from 1 to 2 o'clock in a suffocating crowd, small trouble for the purpose of getting a seat to hear all about the "Loredeath" of Mr. Wagner's fancy and genius between Tristan and Isolde, to the grumpy person who enjoys martyring herself and everybody else, and joins the "rushers," not so much because she's poor as to keep discomfort from going off and flocking by itself.

Then there are the admissioners who value time, and if they didn't, wouldn't run the gauntlet of that breathless chase up multitudinous steps and through corridors not for any seat, not even for the gilt-edged one beside Mrs. Jack Gardiner. They go in leisurely and late and join the standers on the floor, and among them are often some of the best people in town.

Yesterday, for instance, among the standers were Miss Shaw of Marlboro st., who last spring was presented at court and is a London favorite, as she is one in Boston.

There, too, was Mr. Ernst Perabo, and several others only less well known.

But standing is a vetation to the flesh though the spirit is soothed, and the "rushers" continue to make marvellous records. Yesterday, as so often in other seasons, tickets were dropped by the blundering ones, and halts were made by the nervous ones who were promptly hustled out of the way by the tearing tide behind them.

Those who had never before tried "going up in the rush" got scared, and not a few stumbled, one losing her purse, another getting her "duds ripped clean off," another having her pince-nez smashed with the ubiquitous umbrella, one having her arm nearly crushed off at the "squeeze" which comes at the ticket-taker's gate, one fainting, another falling flat and being walked over till she said she felt like a pancake and looked like a dust heap, etc., ever and ever so many arriving at the top and at seats without a chair-back [illegible] is worth doing once for the experience. It is all over a full hour before the concert begins, every seat in the upper gallery being filled, and here is where the fancy work comes in, some of the rushers getting a good share of their Christmas handiwork done in these odd minutes; some read, everybody talks, and watches the seats down stairs fill up—all within the last quarter of an hour.

A good many of these skyed listeners know Mrs. Gardner and other social suns as well as their acquaintances know these celebrities.

Yesterday, Mrs. Gardner was not in evidence, and by so much the by-play was wanting in flavor.

Mrs. "Monty" Sears was there, though, and was one of the most profound listeners, coming in in good season to her high-priced seat on the floor, and remaining until the fashionables trooped out after the noisy "Emperor's March."

Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, who dislike notoriety as the regent of the place paved with good intentions does conscience, were there; so were Miss Lyman, the Amorys, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Dr. Bigelow, the Whitneys, Dr. Cabot, Mrs. Thomas Mack, the Barthold Schlesingers, Mrs. Lowell of Newton, Mrs. John Reed of Longwood, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, the Winthrops, Miss Wesselhoeft, the Greenes, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Mrs. Nikisch, looking adorably piquant, Mrs. E. B. Southard and her belle of a daughter, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Mrs. H. W. Dodd and Mrs. N. U. Walker (Miss Helen Dunklee).

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was among the missing and much missed, though in the pleasant excitement of the moment nobody had time to do much regretting.

There never were

So Many Pretty Girls Out,

so the wise ones said, and truth to tell there were any number of fetching young women, who, in the rainbow garb in vogue, were doubly and trebly good to look at.

There were old women there and old men and a few young ones, but youth held sway in all description of toilets, from the sailor-hatted, shirt-waisted school girl with such a pretty face who sat under the clock with a lap full of school books, to Miss Rice, who was chaperoned two deep and was an autumn vision in wood tints wearing a light brown Irish lace over deeper brown silk, with some velvet sumac in her tip tilted hat.

Some of the other rehearsal devotees were, are and will continue to be Rev. Father Bodfish, who is a clerical prince of good fellows, the Russell Tysons, Mr. T. E. Zerrahn, a bevy of future buds from Miss Hersey's school, Mr. H. F. Sears, Mr. John Richardson, Miss Wesselhoeft, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., the Robert C. Winthrop, Jrs., Miss R. L. Dexter, Mrs. Emily S. Rogers, Mrs. S. I. Williams and Mrs. John C. Phillips.

Every pause in the programme yesterday was the signal for an afternoon tea torrent of small talk.

"So glad to see you?"

"When did you get home? Lovely summer!"

"Oh, of course; isn't Adamowski just too handsome, and always dresses so well. You'd know Nickish's coat was a Dutch sack, ugly! awful!"

"Engaged? So soon? O, O, O, you dear!"

"Kneisel doesn't get on combing his hair any better than he ever did, does he? And Loeffler, isn't it too funny the way he always sits with one leg twisted into a Z round his chair, and—"

And so on and on, with scanter references to the music than to any other subject on earth, save from the delvers who glued their eyes to their scores, and who, when the buds and fresh blossoms went off to ice cream, soda and bon-bon headquarters, snuggled their books under their arms and scattered, talking of scherzos and vorspiels, puissant climaxes, and the relationship of the adagio to the allegretto.

"They say such things, etc."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 16, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT TOMORROW.

The first concert by the Kneisel quartette will be given at Chickering hall on Monday evening (tomorrow). The programme includes a quartette in D major by Haydn, a fragment in C minor by Schubert, and a sextette for strings in A major by Dvorak, with Mr. Max Zach as second viola and Mr. Leo Schulz as second 'cello.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Thursday evening Symphony orchestra concerts in Cambridge, at Sanders theatre, are events of wide interest each year. This season the number has been increased to ten, the first being Oct. 20. The other dates are given in the announcement. Eminent soloists will appear, and much pleasure is sure to result. The price of tickets is $7.50 for the series, and they are now on sale at the University Book store, Cambridge.

The Telegram.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

One word expresses the excellence and rank of the Boston Symphony orchestra—unsurpassable. Perhaps many would go another step in the exercise of their vocabulary of praise and say, "unapproachable." It cannot be disputed that this land knows no orchestra which can be named before the Boston Symphony in the award of merit, and certainly Europe has none that can outshine it.

It is the next block to a condescension that Providence is permitted to enjoy as it is going to this season the superlative performances of this elevated band of orchestrans. Boston has gone almost daft over the coming concerts in that city, and from what is being gleaned from local comment the probabilities are that staid Providence will get pretty generally woke up over a similar source of rejoicing.

The character of the selections Conductor Nikisch has put on his programs for rendition at Infantry hall is above question, and that he will treat patrons of the course to music of whose magnificence few people have any conception, is an assurance. He has arranged to bring some sterling artists to fill the solo numbers, and they will be restlessly awaited.

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts will be opened tomorrow at the flower store of O'Connor, Westminster street, between Eddy and Union.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In making up the first programme of his new season, Mr. Nikisch did not bear in mind the old principle which dictates the administration of light food for the first meal of starving people. For before his eager thousands, presumably hungry almost to exhaustion, he set a solid feast composed of a Beethoven symphony—the fifth—and from Wagner, the Imperial March and two operatic episodes, these being the Prelude and "Love's Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Thus during the first half of the evening the full attention of spirit and sympathy was claimed, while during the latter half the more sensuous nerves were kept alert and thrilled.

It requires some courage and much faith in Wagner to put next after that mighty and passionate symphony, which seems to utter the ultimate word in every one of the moods with which it is inspired, any extract from the great modern master's dramatic pages, even though that extract be as instinct with pathos, agony and "climbing sorrow" as the passages selected by Mr. Nikisch for this night. After the perfect form of Beethoven the ever wandering progressions of Wagner seem doubtful and tentative, and their highest climax of passion suggests rather the contrived and elaborated effects of a theatrical spectacle than the spontaneous and irrepressible outbursts of a soul which must express itself in music alone.

The "Kaiser" march stands in a different catagory. It frankly appeals to vast spaces and to surging crowds; it is not content with exhilarating—it must excite; it begins with pomp and pride, it passes to the clamor of conflict, the stateliness of patriotness, and the solemnity of a nation's hymn, and it ends in the clangor of jubilant triumph expressed with all the resonance and superb splendor of sound which the many-voiced modern orchestra can create. But after all, it speaks first to the ear and then to the spirits of activity, courage and physical prowess. Therefore, however great a contrast it might present to that abstract music which moves from soul to soul, it cannot be incongruous with it, because its sphere is its own.

The performance of this programme was remarkably fine for an opening night. Mr. Nikisch was, of course, at his very best in the Wagner music, and read the wild and yet tender love scene romantically, but forcibly, and wrought up the march to an enthusiastic and voluminous rendering which put the audience in a glow. In the symphony he seemed earnest to give a conservative reading, and avoided the melodramatic effects with which he has sometimes emphasized the greater thoughts. One might perhaps think that some passages had more vehemence than intensity, but Beethoven is often so strange, so audacious, and so tremendous (we might fairly say) in his symphony, that so long as violence is avoided, even an extreme of force and emphasis can hardly be judged excessive.

Whether the new arrangement of the orchestra will prove altogether satisfactory, it is too soon to say. Certainly the effect upon the eye is good, as the men sit in a little amphitheatre upon their dark red platforms, while the conductor has under his feet a great white rug. But as the brass is now in the center and all face directly forward, it is possible that they may be too sonorous for the rest of the orchestra—a fault easy of correction. The wooden wind is massed in the centre, the harp comes nearer to the front, the double-basses are divided at the rear left and right, and the kettle-drummer (who was almost modest last night, thank goodness!) has changed sides.

The programme for next week includes two works not yet known to Boston—Reinecke's "King Manfred," overture, and Tschhikowsky's fifth symphony, written in E minor. The other number will be the fourth pianoforte concerto—in C minor—of Saint Saens, in which that brilliant and energetic player, Mr. Carl Stasny, will take the solo part.

The audience of last evening was large and sympathetic with the orchestra and conductor, applauding with particular fervor and continuance the Wagner scene. The programme-book, ornamented with an Ipsen vignette, has serious notes by Mr. Apthorp. H. M. T.

The Kneisel Quartet give their first concert in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The programme consists of a quartet in D major by Haydn, a fragment in C minor by Schubert, and a sextet for strings in A major by Dvorak, with Mr. Max Zach as second viola, and Mr. Leo Schulz as second 'cello.

The ten concerts to be given at Sanders Theatre Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 10, Dec. 1 and 22, Jan. 19, Feb. 2 and 23, March 23, April 13 and 27, promise to be largely attended—that they will be artistic successes is a foregone conclusion, when one remembers that it is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Arthur Nikisch, conductor.

Boston Transcript

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 15, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tonight the new season of Symphony concerts is to begin in Music Hall, when Mr. Nikisch will present three works—Beethoven's fifth symphony, the prelude and death-scene from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Royal March" of Wagner. It is a strong programme, passing through many phases of feeling.

The sale of seats for the ten concerts to be given in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is going on this morning, and the signs point to an unusually large attendance of Boston people, who have been disappointed of their seats in Boston or who prefer the effect of the music in that hall. The programmes are al-

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The announcement that the Kneisel Quartette will begin on Monday evening next a new series of light concerts is a welcome one. It means that there will be heard in due course a selection of the best chamber music of the present and past times performed undoubtedly as well as it can be anywhere in the world. Mr. Kneisel's acquaintance with the literature of his art is wide, and his taste is unimpeachable, while his coadjutors have been associated with him long enough to insure unity of view and action. The artists who are to assist are all eminent in their several ways, and thus variety as well as puri ty of programmes is secured. The concerts—the first of which falls on Monday evening next—are to be given at Chickering Hall, the capacity of which is limited, so that the current sale of seats should not be neglected.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15.

The Symphony Orchestra is to give a series of ten concerts at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, beginning October 20th. It will be assisted by eminent soloists. The sale of season tickets with reserved seats opens at the University Book Store, Cambridge, today.

The first of the series of eight concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given at Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The deserved popularity of the quartet insures a full house and an appreciative audience. Ladies especially appreciate the change from Union to Chickering Hall, as the long flights of stairs are avoided. Tickets are on sale at the Music Hall box office.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

(SEVENTY PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.

The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street, (O'Conner's flower store, opposite Boston store.)

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o10 J&B6t (15)

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

The attention to the many patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is again called to the series of six concerts to be given in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings during the coming season. The visits of this organization have become a welcome feature of each musical season. It is no longer necessary to speak of the quality of its performances, and of the carefulness which characterizes all the work of preparation. It is well known in all cities where the orchestra has played that it stands on a plane which few orchestral bodies can be compared with. In the individual excellence of its players, and the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert, and the management will present other eminent soloists to be announced later. The sale of tickets for these concerts takes place at O'Connor's Flower Store, 170 Westminster street, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

[15]

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, OCT. 15, 1892.

OH! SO DELIGHTFUL.

Fashionable to Rush at Symphony Rehearsals.

Fair Girl Criticises Mr. Nikisch for the Color of His Trousers.

But Then All Admired the Music and the Chance to Gossip.

"They says such things an' they does such things—on the Bowery."

Likewise at Symphony concerts.

From a recipe for making doughnuts to a description of Matilda's maid of honor's dress with the lilac velvet sleeves, there wasn't anything they didn't talk about yesterday, and there were practical object lessons in a great variety of things from tumbling upstairs to crochetting a necktie.

Fact!

If there's anybody left who supposes the great and only symphony concerts are enchanted regions where the body is annihilated and only the soul floats on in space, the rarity of which is expressed by the equation, the tooness of the which equals the thenness of the now—well, all is, he is destined to be shown as a freak beside the glass eaters, the person who continues to swallow this fiction.

Dear Music Hall!

Everything good and glorious ever said or prophesied about it is all true. At everyone of its truly melodious functions the real musicians there do congregate, and also a very many more people who appreciate the notes of the heavenly maid, but they aren't all.

No.

Variety is the spice of life.

It is, it is, and there are condiments enough at a Music Hall symphony concert to give relish to the biggest spice pudding ever concocted.

Also at the concert Rehearsals, Reheasrsal with a cap R.

For 12 years now has the chronicler had to epitomize the initial performance of the series of tuneful entertainments that crowd Music Hall floor and two balconies, and fill in all the standing and perching room between.

Yesterday when a cordial ripple of

Kid Glove Applause

announced the appearance from behind the body of players of Herr Arthur Nikisch there were a few seats on the floor unfilled, and the steps of the stage were not preempted by "admissioners," every other nook and corner was filled.

The few vacant seats were nearly all occupied after the first intermission, a few alone standing in empty state to mark the absence of society's Mrs. Courtly, who journeyeth home from the land of the almond-eyed and chrysanthemums.

It might have been a concert rehearsal of last season or of season before last or the one before that, but for the fact of that rug, a new rug, a white rug, a wolf's skin that has naught whatever to do with sheep's clothing. It covers the baton wielder's stand. It is conspicuous, very.

"The man who stands on it ought to wear serpent-blue trousers, they're adorable, 'Dolphe got some in Picadilly," a pretty girl said so, and it must be so.

Mr. Nikisch wore gray trousers and they killed the rug and the rug killed them, but the music was divine; the pretty girl said that, too.

It was Beethoven to begin with, the fifth symphony, and the big audience liked it. The biggest pianist in Boston was there and he said it was great playing and great conducting, the best in the world, and his nearest neighbor agreed.

The people listened, all of them without a murmur, save the fiance of the pretty girl in the tiny chapeau with forget-me-nots for strings. He whispered a little, but anybody in his place couldn't have resisted doing the same.

The expressions of the listeners were not monotonous. They ranged from seraphic to the land of Nod, mostly betwixt and between, on the pitch of vivid interest.

The first Rehearsal of the season, the smallest democratic gathering of local clans of the round year, warranted duplication 23 times, unless brass and wood wind blow themselves into Mars before season tickets are punched with eyelets.

Verily, verily democratic was the audience traversing the scale, from the seat-owners, who covered them with gold eagles, to the "rushers," the people who pay a quarter and face murder, sudden death and annihilation to get the upper balcony unreserved seats.

What a lot they are, very largely music students.

With More Time Than Money,

and every phase of character from the philosopher, who counts standing from 1 to 2 o'clock in a suffocating crowd, small trouble for the purpose of getting a seat to hear all about the "Loredeath" of Mr. Wagner's fancy and genius between Tristan and Isolde, to the grumpy person who enjoys martyring herself and everybody else, and joins the "rushers," not so much because she's poor as to keep discomfort from going off and flocking by itself.

Then there are the admissioners who value time, and if they didn't, wouldn't run the gauntlet of that breathless chase up multitudinous steps and through corridors not for any seat, not even for the gilt-edged one beside Mrs. Jack Gardiner. They go in leisurely and late and join the standers on the floor, and among them are often some of the best people in town.

Yesterday, for instance, among the standers were Miss Shaw of Marlboro st., who last spring was presented at court and is a London favorite, as she is one in Boston.

There, too, was Mr. Ernst Perabo, and several others only less well known.

But standing is a vetation to the flesh though the spirit is soothed, and the "rushers" continue to make marvellous records. Yesterday, as so often in other seasons, tickets were dropped by the blundering ones, and halts were made by the nervous ones who were promptly hustled out of the way by the tearing tide behind them.

Those who had never before tried "going up in the rush" got scared, and not a few stumbled, one losing her purse, another getting her "duds ripped clean off," another having her pince-nez smashed with the ubiquitous umbrella, one having her arm nearly crushed off at the "squeeze" which comes at the ticket-taker's gate, one fainting, another falling flat and being walked over till she said she felt like a pancake and looked like a dust heap, etc., ever and ever so many arriving at the top and at seats without a hair being turned is worth doing once for the experience. It is all over a full hour before the concert begins, every seat in the upper gallery being filled, and here is where the fancy work comes in, some of the rushers getting a good share of their Christmas handiwork done in these odd minutes; some read, everybody talks, and watches the seats down stairs fill up—all within the last quarter of an hour.

The Rehearsal Rush

A good many of these skyed listeners know Mrs. Gardner and other social suns as well as their acquaintances know these celebrities.

Yesterday, Mrs. Gardner was not in evidence, and by so much the by-play was wanting in flavor.

Mrs. "Monty" Sears was there, though, and was one of the most profound listeners, coming in in good season to her high-priced seat on the floor, and remaining until the fashionables trooped out after the noisy "Emperor's March."

Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, who dislike notoriety as the regent of the place paved with good intentions does conscience, were there; so were Miss Lyman, the Amorys, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Dr. Bigelow, the Whitneys, Dr. Cabot, Mrs. Thomas Mack, the Barthold Schlesingers, Mrs. Lowell of Newton, Mrs. John Reed of Longwood, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, the Winthrops, Miss Wesselhoeft, the Greenes, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Mrs. Nikisch, looking adorably piquant, Mrs. E. B. Southard and her belle of a daughter, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Mrs. H. W. Dodd and Mrs. N. U. Walker (Miss Helen Dunklee).

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was among the missing and much missed, though in the pleasant excitement of the moment nobody had time to do much regretting.

There never were

So Many Pretty Girls Out,

so the wise ones said, and truth to tell there were any number of fetching young women, who, in the rainbow garb in vogue, were doubly and trebly good to look at.

There were old women there and old men and a few young ones, but youth held sway in all description of toilets, from the sailor-hatted, shirt-waisted school girl with such a pretty face who sat under the clock with a lap full of school books, to Miss Rice, who was chaperoned two deep and was an autumn vision in wood tints wearing a light brown Irish lace over deeper brown silk, with some velvet sumac in her tip tilted hat.

Some of the other rehearsal devotees were, are and will continue to be Rev. Father Bodfish, who is a clerical prince of good fellows, the Russell Tysons, Mr. T. E. Zerrahn, a bevy of future buds from Miss Hersey's school, Mr. H. F. Sears, Mr. John Richardson, Miss Wesselhoeft, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., the Robert C. Winthrop, Jrs., Miss R. L. Dexter, Mrs. Emily S. Rogers, Mrs. S. I. Williams and Mrs. John C. Phillips.

Every pause in the programme yesterday was the signal for an afternoon tea torrent of small talk.

"So glad to see you?"

"When did you get home? Lovely summer!"

"Oh, of course; isn't Adamowski just too handsome, and always dresses so well. You'd know Nickish's coat was a Dutch sack, ugly! awful!"

"Engaged? So soon? O, O, O, you dear!"

"Kneisel doesn't get on combing his hair any better than he ever did, does he? And Loeffler, isn't it too funny the way he always sits with one leg twisted into a Z round his chair, and—"

And so on and on, with scanter references to the music than to any other subject on earth, save from the delvers who glued their eyes to their scores, and who, when the buds and fresh blossoms went off to ice cream, soda and bon-bon headquarters, snuggled their books under their arms and scattered, talking of scherzos and vorspiels, puissant climaxes, and the relationship of the adagio to the allegretto.

"They say such things, etc."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 16, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT TOMORROW.

The first concert by the Kneisel quartette will be given at Chickering hall on Monday evening (tomorrow). The programme includes a quartette in D major by Haydn, a fragment in C minor by Schubert, and a sextette for strings in A major by Dvorak, with Mr. Max Zach as second viola and Mr. Leo Schulz as second 'cello.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Thursday evening Symphony orchestra concerts in Cambridge, at Sanders theatre, are events of wide interest each year. This season the number has been increased to ten, the first being Oct. 20. The other dates are given in the announcement. Eminent soloists will appear, and much pleasure is sure to result. The price of tickets is $7.50 for the series, and they are now on sale at the University Book store, Cambridge.

The Telegram.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

One word expresses the excellence and rank of the Boston Symphony orchestra—unsurpassable. Perhaps many would go another step in the exercise of their vocabulary of praise and say, "unapproachable." It cannot be disputed that this land knows no orchestra which can be named before the Boston Symphony in the award of merit, and certainly Europe has none that can outshine it.

It is the next block to a condescension that Providence is permitted to enjoy as it is going to this season the superlative performances of this elevated band of orchestrans. Boston has gone almost daft over the coming concerts in that city, and from what is being gleaned from local comment the probabilities are that staid Providence will get pretty generally woke up over a similar source of rejoicing.

The character of the selections Conductor Nikisch has put on his programs for rendition at Infantry hall is above question, and that he will treat patrons of the course to music of whose magnificence few people have any conception, is an assurance. He has arranged to bring some sterling artists to fill the solo numbers, and they will be restlessly awaited.

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts will be opened tomorrow at the flower store of O'Connor, Westminster street, between Eddy and Union.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In making up the first programme of his new season, Mr. Nikisch did not bear in mind the old principle which dictates the administration of light food for the first meal of starving people. For before his eager thousands, presumably hungry almost to exhaustion, he set a solid feast composed of a Beethoven symphony—the fifth—and from Wagner, the Imperial March and two operatic episodes, these being the Prelude and "Love's Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Thus during the first half of the evening the full attention of spirit and sympathy was claimed, while during the latter half the more sensuous nerves were kept alert and thrilled.

It requires some courage and much faith in Wagner to put next after that mighty and passionate symphony, which seems to utter the ultimate word in every one of the moods with which it is inspired, any extract from the great modern master's dramatic pages, even though that extract be as instinct with pathos, agony and "climbing sorrow" as the passages selected by Mr. Nikisch for this night. After the perfect form of Beethoven the ever wandering progressions of Wagner seem doubtful and tentative, and their highest climax of passion suggests rather the contrived and elaborated effects of a theatrical spectacle than the spontaneous and irrepressible outbursts of a soul which must express itself in music alone.

The "Kaiser" march stands in a different catagory. It frankly appeals to vast spaces and to surging crowds; it is not content with exhilarating—it must excite; it begins with pomp and pride, it passes to the clam or of conflict, the stateliness of patriotness, and the solemnity of a nation's hymn, and it ends in the clangor of jubilant triumph expressed with all the resonance and superb splendor of sound which the many-voiced modern orchestra can create. But after all, it speaks first to the ear and then to the spirits of activity, courage and physical prowess. Therefore, however great a contrast it might present to that abstract music which moves from soul to soul, it cannot be incongruous with it, because its sphere is its own.

The performance of this programme was remarkably fine for an opening night. Mr. Nikisch was, of course, at his very best in the Wagner music, and read the wild and yet tender love scene romantically, but forcibly, and wrought up the march to an enthusiastic and voluminous rendering which put the audience in a glow. In the symphony he seemed earnest to give a conservative reading, and avoided the melodramatic effects with which he has sometimes emphasized the greater thoughts. One might perhaps think that some passages had more vehemence than intensity, but Beethoven is often so strange, so audacious, and so tremendous (we might fairly say) in his symphony, that so long as violence is avoided, even an extreme of force and emphasis can hardly be judged excessive.

Whether the new arrangement of the orchestra will prove altogether satisfactory, it is too soon to say. Certainly the effect upon the eye is good, as the men sit in a little amphitheatre upon their dark red platforms, while the conductor has under his feet a great white rug. But as the brass is now in the center and all face directly forward, it is possible that they may be too sonorous for the rest of the orchestra—a fault easy of correction. The wooden wind is massed in the centre, the harp comes nearer to the front, the double-basses are divided at the rear left and right, and the kettle-drummer (who was almost modest last night, thank goodness!) has changed sides.

The programme for next week includes two works not yet known to Boston—Reinecke's "King Manfred," overture, and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, written in E minor. The other number will be the fourth pianoforte concerto—in C minor—of Saint Saens, in which that brilliant and energetic player, Mr. Carl Stasny, will take the solo part.

The audience of last evening was large and sympathetic with the orchestra and conductor, applauding with particular fervor and continuance the Wagner scene. The programme-book, ornamented with an Ipsen vignette, has serious notes by Mr. Apthorp. H. M. T.

The Kneisel Quartet give their first concert in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The programme consists of a quartet in D major by Haydn, a fragment in C minor by Schubert, and a sextet for strings in A major by Dvorak, with Mr. Max Zach as second viola, and Mr. Leo Schulz as second 'cello.

The ten concerts to be given at Sanders Theatre Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evenings, Oct. 20, Nov. 10, Dec. 1 and 22, Jan. 19, Feb. 2 and 23, March 23, April 13 and 27, promise to be largely attended—that they will be artistic successes is a foregone conclusion, when one remembers that it is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Arthur Nikisch, conductor.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major.
Allegro.—Cantabile e mesto.—
Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto).

SCHUBERT. FRAGMENT (one movement) in C minor.

DVOŘÁK. SEXTET FOR STRINGS, in A major, op. 48.
Allegretto moderato.—Dumka (Elegie).—Poco allegretto.—
Furiant (Presto).—Finale (Theme with variations).—
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.

MR. MAX ZACH, Second Viola.
MR. LEO SCHULZ, Second Violoncello.

INFANTRY HALL, - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

(SEVENTY PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts.

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.

The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street (O'Conner's flower store, opposite Boston store).

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

There will be six concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, on the following dates: Wednesday evenings, Oct. 26, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 1 and April 5th, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are the musical features of the season here, and each year are looked forward to more eagerly not only by strictly musical people but by the general music-loving public. The management announce eminent soloists, and among them Miss Emma Juch, who will sing at the first concert. Tickets with reserved seats for the series will be placed on sale at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street, Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

ARTHUR NIKISCH

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

A Weekly Journal for the Jewish Home.

New York, October 14, 1892.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are to be given on Thursday evenings instead of on Tuesday evenings, as in the past. They will be given at Chickering Hall on the following dates: November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, and March 16. It need hardly be said that the programmes will be as interesting to music lovers as hitherto, and as to the performance of the works we all know what to expect from this incomparable combination of artists. At the sale of seats recently in Boston for the series there this season, the people paid the highest premiums for choice of seats ever known in the history of any musical organization, and every seat in the big Music Hall there was quickly sold. It is expected that in another year arrangements will have to be made for giving an extra series to accommodate all who desire to attend the concerts. For the concerts to be given here seats can now be secured at Schuberth's, on Union Square.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Music Hall, last evening, in the presence of a large audience. The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially the same as it was last season. There are some changes in the arrangement of the players, the most notable being the division of the string basses into two bodies, one being placed at the upper right and the other at the upper left-hand corner of the orchestra. There was a decided gain in the body tone under the new distribution. Mr. Nikisch was accorded a genial recognition when he first appeared. The programme was devoted to Beethoven and Wagner, illustrating musical art in its strongest development and in its degeneration. The selections were: Symphony, C minor, Beethoven; Prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; and "Kaiser-March," Wagner. The symphony was read in a more conservative and a more satisfying manner than it has been of late at these concerts, and though its performance was a little ragged now and then, and there was occasionally, something of uncertainty in attack, it may be justly urged in excuse, that it was the first concert by the orchestra after a vacation of some six months, during which its members have not played together. The Wagner selections were given their fullest effect, though it must be confessed that they are beginning to sound like musical platitudes, and, strangely enough, to seem more stale than does the symphony, which is some eighty and odd years older. The audience was generous in its applause. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke (first time here); Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C-minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, in B-minor; Tschaikowsky (first time in Boston). The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Stasny.

Music Notes.

The first in this season's series of Chamber Concerts by the Kneisel Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, tomorrow evening. The programme is: Quartet, D-major, Haydn; a "Fragment," in C-minor by Schubert; and a sextet for strings in A-major, by Dvorak.

—— The first Symphony rehearsal of the season filled Music Hall to overflowing with the representatives of all the different social circles who there find food for eyes or ears, or both. The woman was there who says she goes because it is the one time and place in the week where, during the "season," she gets "time to sit quiet and think"; so was the music lover, poring over his Beethoven score; so were a very great many more people, including more young people than ever before; a proportionate sprinkling of very fashionable people; a much larger contingent of people who like, above every thing else on earth, to be where the fashionable people congregate, to sit in the seats of the wealthy, and to feel themselves of the elect; and in between, and above and all about, were the numbers who go because they like the tunes, when there are any, and the general atmosphere sacred to the haunts of the musical muse, as she abides in Boston. The Symphony players were in all shades of bronze along with their afternoon dress, Mr. Loeffler, looking vastly better than for a long time; Mr. Adamowski, the pink of perfection in dress, and more distingué than ever; while Mr. Roth was every whit as boyish-looking as when he first made his advent among the "strings." Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for a politely cordial welcome, as effective as well gloved hands could make it in point of noise; and then, everybody fell to talking about the white fur rug which is a departure in the way of a drapery for the Herr Conductor's stand, until the uplift and down beat of the commanding baton put a period to chatter. It was very like a reception between movements, what with the talk that went on on all sides; and the big hall looked very festive and actually picturesque, with the gay garb, of the audience, largely feminine, and including more pretty women than ever, and a good many who make admirable foils for beauty. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was not present; Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, being still on the other side; and thus the two most prominent figures of the Rehearsals were missing. Among the well known people who were in evidence were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Dr. Cabot, Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Miss Sturgis, Mrs. N. U. Walker, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. John Reece, of Longwood, Mrs Thomas Mack, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, Mrs. Lowell, of Newton, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mrs. H. W. Dodd, Miss Harriet A. Shaw, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Miss Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major.
Allegro.—Cantabile e mesto.—Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto).

SCHUBERT. FRAGMENT (one movement) in C minor.

DVOŘÁK. SEXTET FOR STRINGS, in A major, op. 48.
Allegretto moderato.—Dumka (Elegie).—Poco allegretto.—Furiant (Presto).—Finale (Theme with variations).—Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.

MR. MAX ZACH, Second Viola.
MR. LEO SCHULZ, Second Violoncello.

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

A Weekly Journal for the Jewish Home.

New York, October 14, 1892.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are to be given on Thursday evenings instead of on Tuesday evenings, as in the past. They will be given at Chicker ng Hall on the following dates: November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, and March 16. It need hardly be said that the programmes will be as interesting to music lovers as hitherto, and as to the performance of the works we a'l know what to expect from this incomparable combination of artists. At the sale of seats recently in Boston for the series there this season, the people paid the highest premiums for choice of seats ever known in the history of any musical organization, and every seat in the big Music Hall there was quickly sold. It is expected that in another year arrangements will have to be made for giving an extra series to accommodate all who desire to attend the concerts. For the concerts to be given here seats can now be secured at Schuberth's, on Union Square.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1892

INFANTRY HALL, - - NIKISCH

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra.

(SEVENTY PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Twelfth Season.

Six Grand Concerts.

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.

The sale of season tickets opens MONDAY, October 17, at No. 170 Westminster street (O'Conner's flower store, opposite Boston store).

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

There will be six concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, on the following dates: Wednesday evenings, Oct. 26, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 25, March 1 and April 5th, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are the musical features of the season here, and each year are looked forward to more eagerly not only by strictly musical people but by the general music-loving public. The management announce eminent soloists, and among them Miss Emma Juch, who will sing at the first concert. Tickets with reserved seats for the series will be placed on sale at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street, Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

ARTHUR NIKISCH

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Music Hall, last evening, in the presence of a large audience. The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially the same as it was last season. There are some changes in the arrangement of the players, the most notable being the division of the string basses into two bodies, one being placed at the upper right and the other at the upper left-hand corner of the orchestra. There was a decided gain in the body tone under the new distribution. Mr. Nikisch was accorded a genial recognition when he first appeared. The programme was devoted to Beethoven and Wagner, illustrating musical art in its strongest development and in its degeneration. The selections were: Symphony, C minor, Beethoven; Prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; and "Kaiser-Marech," Wagner. The symphony was read in a more conservative and a more satisfying manner than it has been of late at these concerts, and though its performance was a little ragged now and then, and there was occasionally, something of uncertainty in attack, it may be justly urged in excuse, that it was the first concert by the orchestra after a vacation of some six months, during which its members have not played together. The Wagner selections were given their fullest effect, though it must be confessed that they are beginning to sound like musical platitudes, and, strangely enough, to seem more stale than does the symphony, which is some eighty and odd years older. The audience was generous in its applause. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke (first time here); Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C-minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, in B-minor; Tschaikowsky (first time in Boston). The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Stasny.

Music Notes.

The first in this season's series of Chamber Concerts by the Kneisel Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, tomorrow evening. The programme is: Quartet, D-major, Haydn; a "Fragment," in C-minor by Schubert; and a sextet for strings in A-major, by Dvorak.

—The first Symphony rehearsal of the season filled Music Hall to overflowing with the representatives of all the different social circles who there find food for eyes or ears, or both. The woman was there who says she goes because it is the one time and place in the week where, during the "season," she gets "time to sit quiet and think"; so was the music lover, poring over his Beethoven score; so were a very great many more people, including more young people than ever before; a proportionate sprinkling of very fashionable people; a much larger contingent of people who like, above everything else on earth, to be where the fashionable people congregate, to sit in the seats of the wealthy, and to feel themselves of the elect; and in between, and above and all about, were the numbers who go because they like the tunes, when there are any, and the general atmosphere sacred to the haunts of the musical muse, as she abides in Boston. The Symphony players were in all shades of bronze along with their afternoon dress, Mr. Loeffler, looking vastly better than for a long time; Mr. Adamowski, the pink of perfection in dress, and more distingué than ever; while Mr. Roth was every whit as boyish-looking as when he first made his advent among the "strings." Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for a politely cordial welcome, as effective as well gloved hands could make it in point of noise; and then, everybody fell to talking about the white fur rug which is a departure in the way of a drapery for the Herr Conductor's stand, until the uplift and down beat of the commanding baton put a period to chatter. It was very like a reception between movements, what with the talk that went on on all sides; and the big hall looked very festive and actually picturesque, with the gay garb, of the audience, largely feminine, and including more pretty women than ever, and a good many who make admirable foils for beauty. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was not present; Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, being still on the other side; and thus the two most prominent figures of the Rehearsals were missing. Among the well known people who were in evidence were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Dr. Cabot, Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Miss Sturgis, Mrs. N. U. Walker, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. John Reece, of Longwood, Mrs Thomas Mack, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, Mrs. Lowell, of Newton, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mrs. H. W. Dodd, Miss Harriet A. Shaw, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Miss Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis.

[16]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 108.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twelfth Season's Symphony Concerts Begun.

The concerts of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra were begun, under the direction of Mr. Arthur N kisch, last evening, with the most favorable auspices, the usual record o recent years, every seat sold for the entire season, having been made.

The long continuance of this great musical enterprise, and the rapidity with which generatio s of concert, as well as amusement, patrons pass away, makes it desirable to call attention, at the opening of each season of the Symphony co certs, to the condition under which Boston has been able to enjoy the performances of a permanent orchestra made up of the best musicians, directed by an able conductor and thoroughly competent to perform the most varied and difficult repertoire of instrumental compositions.

The Boston orchestra is essentially a one-man institution. Mr. Henry L Higginson having, without financial aid of any sort, founded, established and maintained the organization upon his own ideas of what is best and most valuable to the cause of music in this city. The public-spirited action of Mr. H ggmson in regard to this enterprise is often ignored by those who are unfamiliar with the earlier years of the orchestra's existence, and the utter lack of ostentation in the conduct of its affairs is not calculated to g ve the prominence deserved to the citizen who has so nobly estimated his duty to his fellows.

The programme chosen by Conductor Nikisch for the opening concert of this season consisted of the symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" (prelude and "Lovedeath"), from "Tristan and Iso de," Wagner, and the Kaiser Marsch, Wagner.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchester has all the advantages possible in t e engagament and cont ol of his men, and so no allowances are called for, un er ordinary circumstances, the standard of perfecti n und r human condition being justifiable in estimat ng the merits of its performances. Director Nikisch has had his men in harness, so to speak, for two weeks, and in l st evening's work the orchestra was s complete in its subject on to the director's will as it was in the final concert of last season.

It can be said at once that the performance of last evening showed distinctly the results of the control enjoyed over the organization by its faith ul conductor, a d the audience were treated to rea lings of the works given which must have filled the measure of anticipation of the most captious critic.

It will be remembered that a great many exceptions were taken to the reading given by Mr. Nikisch of the great fifth symphony in his first season here. Possibly allowa ces should then have been more generally made for the innovations introduced by the new director, and possibly a greater familiarity with the ideas of Mr. Nikisch and his treatment of the great composers have led to a more corr ct estimate of his work. Certain it is that, aside from the opening movement, which by contrast with the ideal interpretat on of t e elder Damrosch seemed somewhat lacking in refinement, the fifth symphony was given with well nigh faultless grace, force and dignity.

The beauty of the andante was all apparent in the delightful performance given it, and t e brilliant finale was played with grand effect throughout.

The excellence of the performance of the "Tristan" excerpts charmed all, and these numbers have rarely been heard under such complete conditions as upon this occasion.

"The Kaiser Marsch" made a spirited ending of the programme, and left the audience enraptured with the pleasures of the opening concert of the season.

The personal and artistic popularity enjoyed by Mr. Nikisch here in Boston was again very clearly shown by the ovation which attended his entrance and the hearty applause which followed the conclusion of the several portions of the programme.

The new platform planned by Mr. Nikisch is the greatest improvement yet made in t e hall, an ' the correctne s estimate of its effect ma te by the conductor has been fully demonstrated. All of the string players are now raise above the stage upon lightly built platforms, which a d much to the effect of these sections of the band, and the massing o the wind players at the back in the rear of the strings solidifies and improves the tone of the organization as a whole. Next week's programme includes Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint Saens' concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston). Mr. Carl Stasney is to be the soloist.

Boston patrons of the symp o ny concerts who were unsuccessful in obtaining seats would do well, for contrast and novelty, attending t e sale of seats for the Providence series, which opens tomorrow. O'Connor's new flower store, where the sale is to be held, is to have a passageway of palms and ferns, through which the weary purchaser will wend his way, to be refreshed by their odor and a glimpse of Mr. Ellis surrounded by roses and symphony tickets. The concerts will be given monthly on Wednesday evenings, and brilliant audiences will be in attendance.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 16, 1892.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Inauguration of the Twelfth Season of Boston's Magnificent Orchestra at Music Hall Last Evening.

The "Open Sesame" of the musical season has been pronounced and the winter's flood of melody has begun, for the first rehearsal and concert in the 12th season of the Boston symphony orchestra are now but pleasant remembrances, and musical Boston for the coming six months will be "at home" on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Music Hall only.

The hall was crowded, of course, about every seat was occupied, and standees fringed the walls in uncomfortable abundance.

One great improvement was noticeable, and that was the new terraced manner of seating the players, every member of the orchestra now being in plain view of the conductor, which also enables the men to see the leader without difficulty.

The popular director, Mr. Nikisch, was greeted with prolonged plaudits as he took his position at his desk, and after receiving his acknowledgments, the audience settled back in their seats to listen to a fine classical programme, interpreted by one of the best if not the best orchestra in the world.

The programme consisted of Bethoven's familiar fifth symphony, the prelude and "Lovedeath" from Tristan, and Wagner's "Kaiser March."

The fifth is undoubtedly the best known of all Beethoven symphonies, and surely it is the most popular.

Berlioz, the celebrated French composer, says it was Beethoven's own life which he illustrated in it.

His secret sorrows, his concentrated wrath, his dreams of sad dejection, his nocturnal visions, his outbursts of enthusiasm, supplied him with its subject; and the forms of the melody, harmony, rhythm and instrumentation, show themselves to be as essentially individual and new as they are endowed with power and nobility.

The allegro, in which is pictured the disordered emotions of a great soul, is considered one of the grandest pieces of passionate compositions ever given to the world, and grandly was it played by Mr. Nikisch's men.

The alternate phrases of violence or weakness by the full orchestra or strings were beautiful tone pictures of conflicting emotions, and the lights and shades of the composition were finely illustrated by the players.

The second movement is full of melancholy sombreness and sad simplicity, and the scherzo partakes of this gravity, relieved by the peculiar sinister introductions which are almost fantastic.

The difficult passages for the basses in the scherzo were excellently played, and the finale was as effectively performed as the most captious critic could desire.

The prelude and "Lovedeath" from Wagner present great technical difficulties, but they were hardly discernible last evening, the work of the orchestra being so uniformly excellent in this almost perfect composition.

The intermittent wailing of the strings and the mournful, mysterious rhythm of the brasses were fine bits of instrumentation, and the whole composition was marked with exquisite interpretation of varied motifs.

The "Emperor's March," with its joyous pomp of victory and discordant notes of battle, was brilliantly performed and made an effective finale to an enjoyable concert.

The programme for the second rehearsal and concert, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the overture from "King Manfred," Reinecke; concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in C minor, Saint Saens, and symphony No. 5 in E minor, Tschaikowsky. The overture and symphony will be given for the first time in this city. Mr. Carl Stansy will be the soloist.

——Another sign of the return of society to town was the audience at Music Hall Friday afternoon, which was assembled for the first Symphony rehearsal. It was a goodly sight, the spacious floor and both balconies filled with the representative company which only comes together in such numbers for these rehearsals. Mr. Nikisch was very heartily welcomed as he appeared and took his old place on the stand. He is looking finely after his summer's rest. In the audience, which was made up almost entirely of season ticket holders, were Col. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, who occupied the same seats in the middle of the hall which Mr. Higginson has had since the opening of the Symphonies; Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis and Mrs. Agassiz, who were in their old places, Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Weld, who have seats near the platform, Mr. and Mrs. T. S. Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Dupee and daughter, Father Bodfish, who keeps his old place in front of the platform, Mr. and Mrs. Thornton Lothrop, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and her handsome daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Tyson, the latter looking extremely well, Robert C. Winthrop, Jr., and his bright-faced daughter, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mr. John D. Williams, Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Jr., Mr. J. H. Bradford, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. George B. Shattuck and Mr. Perabo were also among those who had centre seats on the floor of the hall. In the balcony were Dr. Sturgis Bigelow and his aunt, Miss Mary Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Dwight, Mrs. Charles Fairchild and son, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Prof. and Mrs. Ernest Fenollosa, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Mr. Henry Wainright, Mr. Apthorp and many, many more. Miss Windom, daughter of the ex-secretary, was in the audience.

The friends and acquaintances of young Kuntz of the Symphony orchestra predict, I understand, a brilliant future for him. During the summer he has been, I believe, in Beyreuth, the Wagner Mecca, playing in the orchestra there, so that it is clear he means not to let his most tuneful strings grow rusty from disuse. A little bird has whispered a little secret to me about this same musician that calls for congratulations. I am not at liberty to tell it yet, but it is news that will keep and shower the youth with good wishes when it comes out.

The Kneisel Concerts.

The Kneisel quartet, comprising Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give a series of eight concerts in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings of Oct. 17, Nov. 7, Nov. 21, Dec. 26, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, Feb. 27 and March 27.

The programme for tomorrow evening's concert includes a quartet in D major by Haydn, a fragment in C minor by Schubert and a sextet for strings in A major by Dvorak, with Mr. Max Zach as second viola and Mr. Leo Schulz as second 'cello.

She was at the Symphony rehearsal. She was studious. She read every moment she got in a book which she held close to her eyes. I guessed that she was near sighted. The name of the book was on the cover. It was Hegel's Philosophy. I thought how wise all Boston girls are. She dropped her book. I picked it up. I was awkward unwittingly, believe me, the cover, one of those embroidered adjustable affairs, fell off. The name of the book was on the cover, this time the inner cover. It was not Hegel. It was "A Little Game, With," etc. Again I thought "how wise Boston girls are."

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1892.

The First Symphony Concert of the Season.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season '92-'93, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. There was a large audience. Mr. Nikisch was welcomed warmly, and hearty applause followed each number of the programme. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
Kaiser-Marsch.....Wagner

***

The symphony was in its proper place. When such an elaborate composition is heard toward the end of a concert the music falls on sated or dulled ears. Beethoven himself knew this. On the third page of the first violin part of the Heroic Symphony, which was published in 1806, is this remark in Italian: "This symphony is longer than the ordinary symphony. It should be played at the beginning and not at the end of a concert, after an overture, air or perhaps a concerto. If it appears too late it will not affect the hearer as the composer intended, for the faculty of hearing will have been fatigued by the preceding compositions."

***

The symphony was read with sane and musical feeling. There was an absence of the theatrical exaggeration that characterized the performance of Nov. 9, 1889, and provoked acrid discussion, and, in certain instances, family strife. With the exception of an occasional lack of precision, it was finely played.

***

The chromatic groanings and moanings of the music from "Tristan" were treated with reverential appreciation by the orchestra and by many of the hearers. But the constant straining after effect and the hysterical promises of the composer that are never fulfilled seemed tawdry after the noble work of Beethoven.

***

I believe that the Kaiser March was last heard at a Symphony concert in January, 1886. One performance in six years is enough. This blatant galimatias, this combination of reminiscences of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhaeuser," which jostle constantly a famous choral, is better adapted to the circus ring than the concert hall. It was that sturdy patriot, Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, who declared in 1871 that "the barbarous vulgarity of this latest outbreak of Wagner cannot be regarded otherwise than as an insult against the sublime majesty of the Emperor of Germany."

***

The orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and the right, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage and its further sides. The grouping is to be commended. It was thought in the eighteenth century that the double basses, 'cellos and bassoons should be dispersed throughout the orchestra. As Rosseau quaintly expressed it, "It is the bass that should regulate and sustain all the other parts, and all the players should hear it equally." We know how the celebrated orchestra of the Dresden opera under Hasse was arranged. The conductor was in the middle of the railed space, seated before a clavier. Behind him was a violoncello as well as a double bass. The first violins were at his right hand in a line. The second violins were on the same side, but nearer the stage. The other 'cellos and double basses were at the extreme ends. The violas were between the first and second violins. All of the wind instruments, with the exception of the trumpets, were on the left of the conductor. The oboes were nearest the stage and the bassoons were close to the conductor. The drums and the trumpets were on raised platforms at the sides.

***

NOTES.

The programme of the Kneisel Quartette concert this evening in Chickering Hall is as follows: Quartette in D major, Haydn; Fragment C minor, Schubert, and Sextet for strings, A major, Dvorak. Messrs. Zach and Schulz will assist.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 110.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet opened their eighth season with a most delightful programme last night in Chickering Hall.

Haydn, Schubert and Dvorak were the composers—a trio individually distinctive and altogether friendly. The song movement of the Haydn quartet, "Cantabile e Mesto," was most ineffably exquisite, and the setting was worthy the jewel.

Schubert' "Fragment" was hardly Schubert at his best; much of it was rather dull. Still, it was Schubert, and the players made the most of it.

Dvorak's sextet, in which Messrs. Zach and Schulz of the Symphony orchestra joined with second viola and second 'cello respectively, was a good example of what genius can do, whether it has a full orchestra or a sextet of strings for a means of expression. It was Dvorak music from first measure to last, just as thoroughly characteristic as the same composer's works for orchestra—spirited, virile, richly colored.

It almost goes without saying that the music was played with the best musicianly feeling and artistic finish; and it was a pleasure to hear every movement taken at exactly the right tempo.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1892.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The first concert in the twelfth series given by the Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall, Saturday evening, when the following programme was rendered: Ludwig von Beethoven, symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67; Richard Wagner, Vorspiel and "Liebestod" prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde"; Richard Wagner, Kaiser-marsch (B-flat major).

The Beethoven symphony is not new to Boston, but it is ever welcome, especially when played by a company of talented musicians so ably conducted. It is one of the most intricate as well as attractive works of the great composer, and on this occasion called forth hearty and well-merited applause.

Mr. Nikisch has had his men in rehearsal for some time, and the result of his faithful and conscientious training was apparent throughout the number. The allegro was rendered with spirit and excellent taste, as was also the andante with its dainty movement. The finale, famous for its brilliancy, was given with rare effect.

Wagner's prelude and "Love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," brought out the force of the orchestra, the number taxing the resources of the organization, but throughout there was little with which to take exception.

Wagner's imposing "Kaiser-marsch," with its varying themes, formed a fitting termination to one of the most brilliant inaugurals the Symphony Orchestra has ever given.

The programme for the concert next Saturday evening will be as follows:

Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston).

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Stasny.

The Kneisel Quartet give the first of a series of eight concerts this evening in Chickering Hall and will have the assistance of Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schulz.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 18, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

First Concert at Chickering Hall an Artistic Triumph.

Music, sweet, vibrant and resonant, is certainly loved for its own sake in Boston, judging by the appreciative and richly dressed audience that filled Chickering Hall last evening.

It was the first appearance of the Kneisel quartet this season, and the audience that greeted its leader and members followed their playing with intense interest.

The quartet is composed of Mr. Franz Kneisel, first violin; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Louis Soecenski, viola, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncello.

It is needless to say that the well-known young leader came in for a large share of this applause, which he amply deserved by his strong and brilliant work.

This must have been more than gratifying to him on account of the number of musicians of equal prominence with himself who sat in the audience well qualified to judge as to the merits or demerits of the performance.

The first piece was a quartet in D major by Haydn, and the rich sweetness and perfect blending of the strings seemed incapable of any improvement throughout its different movements.

The allegro, with its joyful strains, was followed by the sweetly solemn cantabile e mesto. The odd concert of the menuetto (allegro) showed in bold relief the finale in presto, which was played with a dash and finish evidencing the hard and faithful work which the members of the quartet must have given to reach the high standard of excellence displayed.

A fragment from Schubert in C minor was the next piece, and its delicate embroidery of theme and pensive reverie were brought out with a delicious nicety of shading and phrasing.

The piece de resistance was the sextet for strings in A major, by Doorak, opus 48, and the manner in which the various movements were rendered explained fully the vogue which this latest composer has attained.

To the other artists above-named were added Mr. Max Zach, second viola, and Mr. Leo Schulz, second violoncello.

The allegretto moder to, with its happy pulsating resonance, gave an opportunity for some very strong playing, which was met in a most artistic manner.

The elegie which followed was given in a manner to defy criticism, while the furiant in presto was amusing in its odd end ng. The finale, a theme with variations, was most excellently rendered, and was a fitting termination of a strong and exquisitely artistic programme.

Boston has cause to be proud of its possession of this quartet of musicians, whose combined excellence it seems must be impossible to equal in any other city of the country.

The next concert will be given Nov. 7.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first concert of the eighth season of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. There was a large and an enthusiastic audience. The programme was well arranged, and although the selections have been heard in former concerts of the quartet it was a pleasure to hear them the second time, particularly as they were played with the finish that characterizes the work of these admirable artists. The Dvorak Sextet was the least familiar of the numbers, as it was last heard during the season of 1886-7. The second viola and second 'cello were then played by Messrs. Zach and Campanari. Last evening they were played by Messrs. Zach and Schulz. The second of these delightful concerts will be given Monday evening, Nov. 7.

[17]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Although there were no novelties on the programme of Saturday's concert, the fifth symphony by Beethoven was the worthiest possible manner of launching the new season, and the Wagner selections which followed were admirable foils to its shapely movements. At the very first, one was impressed with a fuller quality of tone than heretofore, and this must undoubtedly be ascribed to the new mode of grouping the orchestra. By the new method the wood wind instruments have more clearness, yet the strings lose nothing of their power and unity. The Achilles' heel of the arrangement lies in the separation of the contra-basses into two groups; one would imagine that in such passages as, for example, the finale of the fourth symphony, there would be a deterioration of ensemble. The choice of the fifth symphony for the opening piece seemed like a gauntlet thrown down to criticism in this matter, for this work gives unusual prominence to the contra-basses. It is but justice, therefore, to state at the outset that the figure in the trio of the Scherzo (almost the acme of contrabass virtuosity in orchestal work) has never been played so clearly as last Saturday, and this would seem to dispose of the one objection to the new grouping.

The reading of the work throughout was a conservative one, free from exaggeration, and in this respect much in advance of past distortions, and the execution too, was excellent for a first-concert performance. Yet the first movement left many things to be desired. The difficult attacks of the chief figure were at times good but also at times very ragged; the sequence figures of the contrabasses, interrupting the second theme in so marvellous a manner, could have been made more forcible, and the horn playing both in the entrance of the second theme and in the inversion of the chief figure, seemed timid, and the tones broke more than once. The coda was roughly played and the contrasts not well brought out. But the second movement was charmingly rendered, and the cellos and violas did their important work finely, although the contra-basses seemed light in their variation of the theme; it is a question whether the orchestra would not gain by the addition of two more contra-basses, for at times there is a little topheaviness in the ensemble—too much power in the upper voices and too little to balance against it in the lower.

The Scherzo was magnificently played and the crescendo which led from it into the finale was a fine specimen of orchestral dynamics. The kettle-drummer deserves praise for the gradation of his important work here, and the balance throughout the orchestra was praiseworthy. Of the superb work of the contrabasses I have already spoken. Beethoven was the first composer to fully develop the contrabass part in orchestral work, and this passage in the Scherzo has not been sufficiently dwelt upon by commentators as an instance of the composer's fidelity to an ideal. The terrific contrabass passages of the finale of the fourth symphony had aroused the keen sarcasm of Weber. In the quarrel between Weber and Beethoven, the former fought with a rapier, the latter with a bludgeon. Weber had written a trenchant satire of the whole proceedings of the fourth symphony in the "Cecilia" and made especially merry over the use of the contra-basses. He portrayed the instruments holding an indignation meeting, and the contra-basses bemoaning the way in which they were made to caper and jump about as if they were giddy young violins, until finally, when the instruments grew boisterous in complaint, the janitor entered the hall and threatened that, unless they ceased their uproar, he would get Mr. Beethoven to write another symphony—"and they all ceased in terror." Beethoven only answered with oaths, but when the next symphony came (this fifth symphony) he continued calmly on his course, and finally, in the ninth symphony, gave the instruments an earnest theme and a set of recitative phrases such as the world had never dreamed of.

The finale was given with a good, heroic style that was invigorating, and it fully deserved the great applause which greeted it. It is in just such massive semi-military effects that our conductor shines at his best, and the broad crescendos and the sharp contrasts were all well done.

Almost unlimited praise can be given to the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Occasionally a sub-theme was drowned in the rush of the harmonies, but there was so much of loftiness, such power and ecstasy in the conception that one could readily excuse this. The unity of the orchestra was remarkable throughout.

Now came Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch" with a force sufficient for the resurrection-morning. I do not think that the world would suffer greatly if all of Wagner's marches (always excepting the noble ones in his operas) were lost. They give the public a false impression of his school. Wagner was not filled with a wild desire to make all the noise possible; when he began his wonderful performances at Bayreuth he could have had an orchestra of 1000 men of the best material in Europe, yet he chose but 116. But when he wrote marches he seems to have fallen into the Berlioz vein of inflated force and blatancy. Yet this Emperor March is the best of his marches. Divest it of its extreme loudness (and this lost nothing in the handling) and one finds a martial rhythm and a very appropriate theme. When Wagner wrote his poorest work, the "American Centennial March," he knew not a single American theme and the figures and theme in it have no real meaning; but when he wrote this march of the German empire he was well equipped with material, and it shows the taste and artistic force of the man that he discarded the rather bombastic themes of the German national songs of today and chose "Ein Feste Burg" as his proper core. Luther's great hymn (the tune is probably by Franc however) is the fittest representation of united Protestant Germany today. In the stirring times of the reformation it was the war cry of the protestants. The soldier sang it as he marched to battle; the martyr intoned it as he walked to the stake. Wagner's disesteemed contemporaries, Mendelssohn and Mayerbeer had already used it in the "Reformation symphony" and in "The Hugenuots," but it remained for him to show that it belonged to modern Germany as well as to bygone times. But, spite of this tribute to the fitness of things, one wearies with the incessant fortissimo effects and longs for a less forcible expression of musical ideas. The complexity too, is not always pleasing; in short the "Liebestod" was to this as Hyperion to a satyr. Such music is too exciting and one begins to ask whether it is healthy. Of old, music was a sedative; let us beware of making it a morbid or abnormal excitant. After hearing such a noisy and furious instrumentation, after being conducted from forte to fortissimo, and from fortissimo to fortississimo, one feels like asking with Emerson—"Why so hot, my little man?"

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Kneisel Quartette, consisting of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svcenski and Alwin Schroede, give the first of a series of eight concerts in Chickering Hall this evening. On this occasion they will have the assistance of Max Zach and Leo Schulz.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the first symphony concert of the present season, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.
Wagner: Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."
Wagner: Kaiser-Marsch.

"Ta-ta-ta, Tah!" That was good, unspeakably good, to hear those four notes (whether "Fate knocking at the door," or some less exalted operation, matters little) ring out short, strong and crisp; and not long drawn out, like the pompous "Oyez! oyez!" of some portentous town-crier! What Hans von Bülow said of this wonderful opening of the Fifth Symphony, when asked his opinion as to how it should be played, is worth remembering. "Ab initio erat rhythmus!" (in the beginning was rhythm!), shrieked the little man, stamping his foot to the beat; "Snap out those notes sharp and strong, as they stand written; don't drag them out!" Thanks to Mr. Nikisch for once more restoring this passage to its original estate. And how splendidly the orchestra played the four notes, all together, with a will, like one man! It is a good thing to be put into the very best of humors at the out set of a concert; these four notes did it. It is no mean thing to be called to hear music, and even great music, once more, after a whole summer's rest (which begins by seeming like immunity, and then gradually turns to something more and more like starvation); but it is better still to be met on the threshold by a welcome surprise. And these four notes were something of a surprise, after all; for the last time Mr. Nikisch gave the Fifth Symphony here, he fell into the error, not uncommon nowadays, of trying to make Beethoven greater by making him bigger and more magniloquent. Let there be double rejoicing over the repentant sinner! The whole first movement was admirably played, with beautiful clearness, with vigor, go, and true Beethovenish fury. Mr. Sautet's playing of the oboe cadence was a gem of artistic phrasing and true depth of sentiment. The slow movement went to a charm. Here, too, it was to be noted that Mr. Nikisch had made up his mind to bury again that queer little bit of cantilena he once unearthed in the second violins, so that the unheard-of was once more unheard. Again bravo! The weird ghost-spookery of the Scherzo was done to perfection, and Berlioz's "frolicking elephant" sported through the Trio with a clearness of articulation such as no trained clog-dancer could have surpassed. When double-basses can play like that, they can match themselves against any body. The great Finale was one grand outburst of splendor, the horns especially covering themselves with glory in the second theme. If the season begins so, what may we not look for in the future? Such a performance of the C minor symphony is a thing to be marked with a white stone in the records of every concert-goer.

Whether any conductor or programme maker ever before dared to play anything after the Finale of the C minor symphony is a question which we are in no position to answer authoritatively; but surely no one ever tried a more daring experiment. Yet an intermission is a good time to cool down in and prepare one's self for further listening, even after that blaze of glory, especially on an opening night, when the question of who is sitting where can legitimately act as a sedative to over-excited nerves. To us, at least, the Wagner selections came as no anticlimax; the audience, too, seemed to enjoy them as if no Fifth Symphony had been. Such is the power of a young, fresh, unsurfeited musical digestion. But we doubt if the experiment would prove equally successful later on in the season.

The ever-beautiful prelude to "Tristan" was played with the most exquisite finish. How the 'celli breathed out that opening phrase, and what perfect balance there was between the various wind instruments! The great climax in the middle, too, was superbly worked up; and yet, admirable as the performance was in all technical points, and poignantly expressive as every phrase was made, we could not wholly and unreservedly like it. Here Mr. Nikisch gave the fullest rein to what has ever been his most questionable tendency, to our thinking—a tendency toward over-elaboration, resulting in this case in the most serious of all musical misfortunes, a lack of continuity of impression. Every single phrase in the prelude was given to perfection, with a finish of style, a beauty and depth of expressiveness that left nothing to be desired; thus to get every drop of blood out of a phrase is next to the sunlight of the performer's art—next to the summit, but not quite the summit. The one trouble was that, with and in spite of all this rare perfection, the whole prelude was, so to speak, constantly in large capitals, emphasis overshot its mark by sheer pertinacity. Those continual rhythmic modications checked the free onward flow of the music, and made it seem always out of breath. Note, for one thing, that in music nothing is so monotonous as a persistent irregularity; always to hold back the rhythm at just the same point in the phrase is to produce a more wearying monotony of rhythmical impression than even the metronomic regularity of a Kéler-Béla galop. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the syncopated descending violin passage, after the great fortissimo outburst, is new to us, and certainly has a good deal to say for itself. He gives it great prominence, as a sort of dramatic-declamatory recitative, and the first violins played it as such with poignant power of effect. As we have said, much may be urged in favor of this. Still we must own to preferring the old reading in which the syncopations in the violins served only to break up all sense of rhythm, and the long-drawn climax ended in a measure or two of sheer mad raving, in a giving up all attempt to express the inexpressible, followed immediately by complete exhaustion and a state of quasi-coma. The wonderful "Liebestod" was, however, grandly played, and carried everything before it. Here were both expressiveness and artistic measure; to be expressive is not all, but to be coherently expressive.

To the playing of the "Kaiser-Marsch" we have the same objection to make as to that of the "Tristan" prelude: it seemed all too mannered, tortured out of shape, and lacking in frank, direct vigor. No doubt in a work of this magnitude, the term "March" in the title may safely be taken with a grain of salt; it is a march in the ideal, rather than in the prosaic real sense—as much of a march as a Chopin waltz is a waltz. Still one instinctively attributes something of rythmic simplicity (not to speak of simplicity of other sorts) to even the most idealized march form, together with something more nervously inspiring than an absolutely funereal slowness of gait. Probably Mr. Nikisch finds the "Kaiser-Marsch" planned on the largest scale, and deems no inflation of style too grandiose for it. But there should be measure in all things; admitting that the "Kaiser-Marsch" is somewhat bigger than the Berlin Kurfürsten-Brücke, and might well span the Rhine itself, there is no need of so stretching it out that it can reach "from the Aurora Borealis to the Precession of the Equinoxes"! To our mind, this process of Procrustes-stretching results only in making it crack and totter. But it was suberbly played for all that.

The new seating of the orchestra, with all the heavy brass in the middle at the back, and the double basses divided equally, four on a side, seems at once to be an admirable improvement. The wind players say they can now hear each other better than before, and they certainly seem to play more exactly together than they did last year. The blending of the general mass of the wind tone is also better. Strange to say, too, the double-basses, although their two wings are separated by the trumpets, trombones and tuba, make decidedly more effect than formerly, and play wonderfully well together.

Mr. Nikisch was very warmly received, both as he first stepped up to the conductor's desk and at the close of the concert.

The next programme is: Reinecke: overture to "König Manfred;" Saint-Saëns: pianoforte concerto No. 4, in C minor, op. 93; Tschaikowsky; symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. Mr. Carl Stasny will be the pianist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 18, 1892.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Despite operatic counter attractions at the theatres this admirable and deservedly popular organization, which has become such an indispensable feature of the higher grade of musical life in Boston, inaugurated its eighth season last night under most favorable conditions. Among the regular habitués were many of our leading musicians, who testified in a generous manner to the excellent performance of such an exacting programme.

Haydn's quartet in D minor was a fitting introduction, and received the able treatment which the works of the greatest writer for the strings deserve. Faultless in its classic form, and the purity of its melody and harmony, the great master's quartet will always serve as the truest model in this branch of musical literature. The perfect intonation of the artists was perhaps most observable in the beautiful cantabile movement.

A "Fragment" in C minor, by Schubert, followed, and again the rare gift of melody, but much freer and more subtly poetic in style than in the foregoing number, was conspicuous.

The sextet for strings in A major, by Dvorak, was the concluding number, in which the quartette was reinforced by second viola (Mr. Max Zach) and second 'cello (Mr. Leo Schulz), offered a striking contrast to its predecessors. From beginning to end the Slavonic origin of the themes, broadly treated to six-part harmony, was indicative of the peculiarity and the marvellous scoring facility of this talented modern composer. Towards the close of the first movement (allegretto moderato), during an exciting crescendo, one of Mr. Kneizel's strings snapped, but it is only just to say it was so promptly replaced the connection suffered almost imperceptibly.

Monday, Nov. 7, is the date of the next of this series.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 18, 1892.

The eighth season of the Kneisel Quartet concerts opened most auspiciously at Chickering Hall last evening. The quartet: Messrs. Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncello, were assisted by Max Zach, second viola, and Leo Schulz, second violoncello. The programme, quartet in D major, by Haydn, in four movements, fragment in C minor, by Schubert, and a sextet in A major, op. 48, by Dvorak, with five movements, was received most enthusiastically, each movement bringing encore upon encore. The cantabile e mesto in the quartet from Haydn and the fragment in C minor from Schubert seemed to be the most pleasing numbers of the evening's performance, although every piece received the same plaudits. The programme, varying as it did, showed each performer at his best. On Monday, Nov. 7, the second of these concerts will be given.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, 1892.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. NIKISCH.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

FIVE PUBLIC REHEARSALS:

On FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, November 4, December 9, 1892; January 13, February 10 and March 17, 1893.

FIVE CONCERTS:

On SATURDAY EVENINGS, November 5, December 10, 1892; January 14, February 11 and March 18, 1893.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of Five Public Rehearsals, $3, $4 and $5, according to location, and for the series of Five Concerts, $3, $5 and $6.50, according to location.

The sale of season tickets for both series OPENS at the office of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, at CHANDLER'S MUSIC STORE, 300 Fulton st, Brooklyn, MONDAY, October 24, at 8 A. M.

To insure a fair distribution of tickets no more than ten will be sold to any one person.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE PHILHARMONIC YEAR.

The concerts of the Philharmonic society will again be given by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor. The season will consist of five public rehearsals and five concerts at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, November 4 and 5, December 9 and 10, January 13 and 14, February 10 and 11, and March 17 and 18. The orchestra will number ninety players at each performance and will be accompanied by the best available soloists. In the individual excellence of its players and the completeness of its equipment, the Boston symphony orchestra is unsurpassed. It is not possible at this early date to give the programmes of the coming concerts. Mr. Nikisch has been has secured many interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constituted the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Brooklyn programmes such of these as prove most worthy and attractive. The programme will also include standard works of the old and of the modern school. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert. Programme books will be issued for each concert, and will be mailed in advance to purchasers of season tickets. The analytical and descriptive notes of three books will be prepared by Mr. William F. Apthorp. The sale of season tickets for both series opens on Monday, October 24, at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, where circulars giving full particulars may be obtained.

SEIDL SOCIETY CONCERTS.

The absence of grand opera from the two cities during the coming winter will enlarge the opportunity for orchestral concerts. The Seidl society is promptly in the field with the announcement of seven concerts in Brooklyn—on November 14, December 19, January 12 and 19, February 9, and March 2 and 23. The Seidl society has also provided for a series of working people's concerts, the first of which will be given at the Academy of Music on the 29th of October. Arrangements have been made for the distribution of tickets through committees of churches, so that representative audiences may be secured. The cards so distributed will be exchangeable on the night of the concert for admission tickets at a nominal charge.

The arrangements made upon the departure of Theodore Thomas for the West for the continuance of the Philharmonic concerts, which have held a first place in musical affairs for a generation, proved so satisfactory last winter to the directors and the public that it has been renewed this year. Left in doubt as to the future, the managers turned to Boston and found there what was, at that day, the only permanent orchestra in the country, under the capable conductorship of Arthur Nikisch. The history of this band is familiar but remarkable. Its support was at first guaranteed by a liberal Bostonian, and it was largely maintained at his personal expense. But it passed that necessity, reaching the self sustaining period some time ago, while its latest business statistics suggest a profitable investment. If commercial prosperity were its main achievement the fact would not call for mention just now, but its success has been accompanied by the best art work, has indeed been won by precisely such instrumentalities. The season will begin within a month. Mr. Nikisch and his men control the situation, but they hold also a guarantee of the sympathetic co-operation of the directors and members of the old and honored Philharmonic society. Only one criticism is likely to be incurred, so far as this announcement has been made. It appears that there will be five concerts and as many rehearsals. The Brooklyn public has been accustomed to six of each, but we believe, five is the number of visits to New York and that limit will, therefore, promote the convenience of the orchestra, but the people will miss the sixth performance. If the public is exacting in wanting more, it is the orchestra's own fault, since it provides music of such excellence.

[18]

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave the first concert of this, their eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Haydn—Quartet in D major.
Schubert—Fragment (one movement) in C minor.
Dvorak—Sextet for strings, in A major, Opus 48.

The Haydn quartet is one of the most delightful of its family; the first movement exhibits a rather striking departure from the regular sonata form for the founder of the string quartet, but it is charming throughout in its light airy beauty. The slow movement, cantabile e mesto, is as beautiful as anything we know by Haydn. The minuet and finale are characteristically fresh and inspiring. The quartet was admirably played; indeed, there is no new thing left to say about the playing of the Kneisel Quartet, which must now be classed as one of the great quartets in the world.

The Schubert fragment is, we believe, new here; it is one of those delicious bits of alternating sentiment and humor which would be recognized at once as Schubert, in Kamschatka as readily as in Vienna. It is a real addition to our quartet repertory, one which has the advantage of brevity as well as beauty, and which may prove serviceable at any odd time. We, for one, shall always be glad to hear it again. It, too, was superbly played.

Dvorák's new sextet is a work rather difficult to write about after but a single hearing. It gets over the inherent difficulty in all string sextets—having only two violins against such a mass of low and medium tone as two violas and two 'celli—better than most sextets do; better, but still not entirely well, for one does tire of the sombreness of the general coloring after a while. The thematic material in the work seems fine throughout, notably in the first Allegretto moderato and the ensuing Dumka; the working out, too, is strong and healthy, but often far too long and beset with repetitions. There is, in especial, a place in the first movement where a certain deceptive cadence comes round for the second time, that fills one absolutely with despair. The theme of the variations in the finale is beautiful—and how wonderfully Mr. Svecenski's viola sounded in one part of it!—and the variations themselves are interesting; but we think Dvorák somewhat over-rated his own strength when he tried to imitate Beethoven in employing this form of theme and variations in the last movement of a long composition, as that great man did in the "Eroica" and ninth symphonies. The form is too taxing to the listener's attention to be welcome so far on in a work, unless treated with enormous power. Brahms's passacaglia in the last movement of his fourth symphony was a decidedly easier task, for the form of a gradual climax of contrapuntal variations on an eight-measure theme has something of excitement in itself. Upon the whole, one may call this sextet of Dvorák's a very interesting work which one will be overjoyed to hear again. The performance left nothing to be desired.

Clipping from Philad.
PRESS, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

MUSIC. 13

Announcements that Herald the Beginning of the Concert Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Arthur Nikisch as conductor, will give a series of fine concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 1, February 8, and March 15. The visits of this superb orchestra have become a welcome and important feature of each musical season. For twelve years the organization has been maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the interpretation of music of the highest class. Constant selections and improvement during this period have given it a membership which for the individual excellence of the players can hardly be equalled. There have been no changes of importance in the personnel of the orchestra since last year. It will number eighty-seven performers at each concert. Daily rehearsals have been held since October, and when the date of the first concert arrives the band will be in the best possible form.

It is impossible to give the complete programmes at this early date. Several interesting novelties are promised by Mr. Nikisch, and the usual number of standard works, both of the old and of the modern school, will be given during the season. The best available soloists will appear, although the orchestra itself is always the principal attraction of these concerts. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

The demand for tickets for the New York and Boston concerts has been unprecedented, and shows an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the Boston orchestra. Many indications justify the belief that a similar interest exists here. The sale of season tickets, covering reserved seats for the series, will open at 1221 Chestnut Street on Monday, October 24.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10/17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season was begun Saturday evening with a record-breaking audience in point of numbers and enthusiasm. The program chosen by Conductor Nikisch for the opening concert of this season consisted of the symphony in C minor, No. 5 op. 67, Beethoven; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" (prelude and "Lovedeath"), from "Iristan and Iso de." Wagner and the Kaiser Marsch, Wagner.

[17]

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-16

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of eighty-five performers, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give five grand concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 15. Miss Emma Juch and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists, and unusually fine programs will be selected. The sale of season tickets opens at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday morning, October 24.

SUN, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave the opening concert of its twelfth season in Boston Music Hall last night. The New York concerts by this organization will be given in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-16

The first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 2. The succeeding concerts will be on December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 4, all Wednesdays. The orchestra will number eighty-seven performers and it is said never to have been in more perfect form. Mr. Nikisch has secured a number of important novelties for his series of forty-eight concerts in Boston and the most successful of these will be included in the Philadelphia programme, together with the usual number of standard works, both classical and modern. Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert.

Clipping from Republican, Springfield, Mass
Date 10-16

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was a fitting selection with which to begin the opening concert of the 12th season of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music hall last night. As every seat in the house was sold for the season for the fifth consecutive year, at the auction sale in September, there was an immense audience. The conductor's stand was elaborately decorated with flowers and Mr Nikisch was given a royal welcome to assure him of a most auspicious beginning of his fourth year as the director of Boston's famous orchestra.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, opened its twelfth season in Boston Music Hall last night. Every seat for the twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals, which constitute its home season, have been taken by subscription by the music-loving Bostonians. The New York concerts by this organization will be given in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

News, Providence, R. I.
Date 10-17

Boston Symphony.

The popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city is shown by the fact that when the office was opened for the sale of seats this morning, over one hundred people were in line, some of whom had been waiting since 8:30 last evening.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA BEGINS.

Boston, Oct. 15, 1892.—Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony opened the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall tonight. Every seat in the house had been sold for the season at the auction sale in September, and there was an immense audience. The conductor's stand was elaborately decorated with flowers, and Mr Nikisch was given a royal welcome. This is his fourth year as the director of Boston's famous orchestra.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa
Date 10-16

The series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here this season will be given on the Wednesday evenings of November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 15. Emma Juch will be the soloist for the opening night. The subscription sale will begin on Monday, October 24, at 1221 Chestnut street.

CITIZEN, Lowell, Mass.
Date 10-17

The regular base ball season closed Saturday and the regular Symphony orchestra began. The Boston newspaper men who do base ball in the summer and the Symphonies in winter will get no vacation this year.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10/7

Mr. Paderewski will appear at one of the Symphony Society's concerts as well as at one of the Boston Symphomy Orchestra's. He will also play three entirely new programs in New York and Boston. He spent the summer at his retreat in Switzerland, France, studying and practic-

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCT. 19.

The first concert of the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. Mr. F. Busoni will be the soloist. The programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Beethoven's concerto, for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 50; Beethoven symphony, No. 3, "Eroica." The soloist is Ferruiccio B. Busoni.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. Leonore, No. 3.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major. op. 50. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo. (Cadenzas by BUSONI).
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 3. "Eroica." Allegro con brio.—Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).—Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—Finale.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10-18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and the right, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage and its further sides. The grouping is to be commended. It was thought in the eighteenth century that the double basses, 'cellos and bassoons should be dispersed throughout the orchestra. As Rosseau quaintly expressed it, "It is the bass that should regulate and sustain all the other parts, and all the players should hear it equally." We know how the celebrated orchestra of the Dresden opera under Hasse was arranged. The conductor was in the middle of the railed space, seated before a clavier. Behind him was a violincello as well as a double bass. The first violins were at his right hand in a line. The second violins were on the same side, but nearer the stage. The other 'cellos and double basses were at the extreme ends. The violas were between the first and second violins. All of the wind instruments, with the exception of the trumpets, were on the left of the condubtor. The oboes were nearest the stage and the bassoons were close to the conductor. The drums and the trumpets were on raised platforms at the sides.

Clipping from Journal, Providence, R. I
Date 10-18

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of six concerts in this city opened briskly at O'Connor's flower store yesterday. Messenger boys and several men who held first places all night were reinforced yesterday by over 200 citizens desirous of securing good

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1892.

The Boston Symphony at Home.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, opened the musical season at home in Boston last Saturday night, the usual public rehearsal occurring the Friday afternoon previous. The program consisted of Beethoven's third symphony; Wagner's "Liebestod" from "Tristan," and the same composer's "Kaiser Marsch." The band was never in finer fettle and local criticism was by no means as inconsiderate as at the close of last season. Next Saturday night's program includes Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saëns' concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor; Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston). Mr. Carl Stasny is to be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1892.

The programme of the first Symphony concert, to be given in Sanders Theatre tonight at 7.45, is as follows: Overture, Lenore No. 3, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte No. 4, G major, op. 50. Beethoven; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. Soloist, Ferruiccio B. Busoni.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave the first concert of this, their eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Haydn—Quartet in D major.
Schubert—Fragment (one movement) in C minor.
Dvorák—Sextet for strings, in A major, Opus 48.

The Haydn quartet is one of the most delightful of its family; the first movement exhibits a rather striking departure from the regular sonata form for the founder of the string quartet, but it is charming throughout in its light airy beauty. The slow movement, cantabile e mesto, is as beautiful as anything we know by Haydn. The minuet and finale are characteristically fresh and inspiring. The quartet was admirably played; indeed, there is no new thing left to say about the playing of the Kneisel Quartet, which must now be classed as one of the great quartets in the world.

The Schubert fragment is, we believe, new here; it is one of those delicious bits of alternating sentiment and humor which would be recognized at once as Schubert, in Kamschatka as readily as in Vienna. It is a real addition to our quartet repertory, one which has the advantage of brevity as well as beauty, and which may prove serviceable at any odd time. We, for one, shall always be glad to hear it again. It, too, was superbly played.

Dvorák's new sextet is a work rather difficult to write about after but a single hearing. It gets over the inherent difficulty in all string sextets—having only two violins against such a mass of low and medium tone as two violas and two 'celli—better than most sextets do; better, but still not entirely well, for one does tire of the sombreness of the general coloring after a while. The thematic material in the work seems fine throughout, notably in the first Allegretto moderato and the ensuing Dumka; the working out, too, is strong and healthy, but often far too long and beset with repetitions. There is, in especial, a place in the first movement where a certain deceptive cadence comes round for the second time, that fills one absolutely with despair. The theme of the variations in the finale is beautiful—and how wonderfully Mr. Svecenski's viola sounded in one part of it!—and the variations themselves are interesting; but we think Dvorák somewhat over-rated his own strength when he tried to imitate Beethoven in employing this form of theme and variations in the last movement of a long composition, as that great man did in the "Eroica" and ninth symphonies. The form is too taxing to the listener's attention to be welcome so far on in a work, unless treated with enormous power. Brahms's passacaglia in the last movement of his fourth symphony was a decidedly easier task, for the form of a gradual climax of contrapuntal variations on an eight-measure theme has something of excitement in itself. Upon the whole, one may call this sextet of Dvorák's a very interesting work which one will be overjoyed to hear again. The performance left nothing to be desired.

Clipping from Philada.
PRESS, ~~New York~~, N. Y.
Date 10-16

MUSIC.

Announcements that Herald the Beginning of the Concert Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Arthur Nikisch as conductor, will give a series of fine concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 1, February 8, and March 15. The visits of this superb orchestra have become a welcome and important feature of each musical season. For twelve years the organization has been maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the interpretation of music of the highest class. Constant selections and improvement during this period have given it a membership which for the individual excellence of the players can hardly be equalled. There have been no changes of importance in the personnel of the orchestra since last year. It will number eighty-seven performers at each concert. Daily rehearsals have been held since October, and when the date of the first concert arrives the band will be in the best possible form.

It is impossible to give the complete programmes at this early date. Several interesting novelties are promised by Mr. Nikisch, and the usual number of standard works, both of the old and of the modern school, will be given during the season. The best available soloists will appear, although the orchestra itself is always the principal attraction of these concerts. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

The demand for tickets for the New York and Boston concerts has been unprecedented, and shows an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the Boston orchestra. Many indications justify the belief that a similar interest exists here. The sale of season tickets, covering reserved seats for the series, will open at 1221 Chestnut Street on Monday, October 24.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season was begun Saturday evening with a record-breaking audience in point of numbers and enthusiasm. The program chosen by Conductor Nikisch for the opening concert of this season consisted of the symphony in C minor, No. 5 op. 67, Beethoven; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" (prelude and "Lovedeath"), from "Iristan and Iso de." Wagner and the Kaiser Marsch, Wagner.

[17]

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-16

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of eighty-five performers, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give five grand concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 15. Miss Emma Juch and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists, and unusually fine programs will be selected. The sale of season tickets opens at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday morning, October 24.

SUN, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave the opening concert of its twelfth season in Boston Music Hall last night. The New York concerts by this organization will be given in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-16

The first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, November 2. The succeeding concerts will be on December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 4, all Wednesdays. The orchestra will number eighty-seven performers and it is said never to have been in more perfect form. Mr. Nikisch has secured a number of important novelties for his series of forty-eight concerts in Boston and the most successful of these will be included in the Philadelphia programme, together with the usual number of standard works, both classical and modern. Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert.

Clipping from Republican, Springfield Mass.
Date 10/16

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was a fitting selection with which to begin the opening concert of the 12th season of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music hall last night. As every seat in the house was sold for the season for the fifth consecutive year, at the auction sale in September, there was an immense audience. The conductor's stand was elaborately decorated with flowers and Mr Nikisch was given a royal welcome to assure him of a most auspicious beginning of his fourth year as the director of Boston's famous orchestra.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.
Date 10/16

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, opened its twelfth season in Boston Music Hall last night. Every seat for the twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals, which constitute its home season, have been taken by subscription by the music-loving Bostonians. The New-York concerts by this organization will be given in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert.

Date 10-17

Boston Symphony.

The popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city is shown by the fact that when the office was opened for the sale of seats this morning, over one hundred people were in line, some of whom had been waiting since 8:30 last evening.

HERALD, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-16

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA BEGINS.

BOSTON, Oct. 15, 1892.—Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony opened the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall tonight. Every seat in the house had been sold for the season at the auction sale in September, and there was an immense audience. The conductor's stand was elaborately decorated with flowers, and Mr Nikisch was given a royal welcome. This is his fourth year as the director of Boston's famous orchestra.

Record, Philadelphia, Pa
Date 10-16

—The series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here this season will be given on the Wednesday evenings of November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 15. Emma Juch will be the soloist for the opening night. The subscription sale will begin on Monday, October 24, at 1221 Chestnut street.

CITIZEN, Lowell, Mass.
Date 10-17

The regular base ball season closed Saturday and the regular Symphony orchestra began. The Boston newspaper men who do base ball in the summer and the Symphonies in winter will get no vacation, this year.

Journal, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10/17

Mr. Paderewski will appear at one of the Symphony Society's concerts as well as at one of the Boston Symphomy Orchestra's. He will also play three entirely new programs in New York and Boston. He spent the summer at his retreat in Normandy, France, studying and practic-

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCT. 19.

The first concert of the Cambridge series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. Mr. F. Busoni will be the soloist. The programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Beethoven's concerto, for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 50; Beethoven symphony, No. 3, "Eroica." The soloist is Ferruiccio B. Busoni.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, AT 7.45 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Leonore," No. 3.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 50.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo.
Cadenzas by BUSONI.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 3, "Eroica."
Allegro con brio.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Journal, Providence, R. I.
Date 10-18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and the right, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage and its further sides. The grouping is to be commended. It was thought in the eighteenth century that the double basses, 'cellos and bassoons should be dispersed throughout the orchestra. As Rosseau quaintly expressed it, "It is the bass that should regulate and sustain all the other parts, and all the players should hear it equally." We know how the celebrated orchestra of the Dresden opera under Hasse was arranged. The conductor was in the middle of the railed space, seated before a clavier. Behind him was a violincello as well as a double bass. The first violins were at his right hand in a line. The second violins were on the same side, but nearer the stage. The other 'cellos and double basses were at the extreme ends. The violas were between the first and second violins. All of the wind instruments, with the exception of the trumpets, were on the left of the condubtor. The oboes were nearest the stage and the bassoons were close to the conductor. The drums and the trumpets were on raised platforms at the sides.

Clipping from Journal, Providence, R. I.
Date 10-18

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of six concerts in this city opened briskly at O'Connor's flower store yesterday. Messenger boys and several men who held first places all night were reinforced yesterday by over 200 citizens desirous of securing good seats.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1892.

The Boston Symphony at Home.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, opened the musical season at home in Boston last Saturday night, the usual public rehearsal occurring the Friday afternoon previous. The program consisted of Beethoven's third symphony; Wagner's "Liebestod" from "Tristan," and the same composer's "Kaiser Marsch." The band was never in finer fettle and local criticism was by no means as inconsiderate as at the close of last season. Next Saturday night's program includes Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saëns' concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor; Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston). Mr. Carl Stasny is to be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1892.

The programme of the first Symphony concert, to be given in Sanders Theatre tonight at 7.45, is as follows: Overture, Lenore No. 3, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte No. 4, G major, op. 50. Beethoven; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. Soloist, Ferruiccio B. Busoni.

CHICKERING HALL - - - NIKISCH.

. . . . . .

. . 90 . .
PERFORMERS.

. . . . . .

= Boston = Symphony Orchestra

. . . . . .

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Conductor.

. . . . . .

Five Concerts on Thursday Evenings

November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, and March 16.

FIRST CONCERT

Thursday Evening, November 3, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE FANTASIE, "Romeo and Juliet," . . . Tschaikowsky

ARIA, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon," . . . Weber

MISS JUCH.

QUEEN MAB SCHERZO, from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," . . . . . Berlioz

SONG WITH ORCHESTRA, "Loreley," . . . . . Liszt

MISS JUCH.

SYMPHONY IN D MINOR, No. 4, ... Schumann

Introduction (Adagio non troppo).
Allegro.
Romance (Adagio non troppo).
Scherzo.
Finale (Allegro).

Soloist, Miss EMMA JUCH.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $6.50. The sale of single tickets for the first concert opens Monday, October 24, at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Chickering Hall.—Nikisch

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS)

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, - - Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892–93

FIVE CONCERTS

—IN—

CHICKERING HALL

—ON—

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

NOVEMBER 3, DECEMBER 8, JANUARY 12, FEBRUARY 9 and MARCH 16.

Miss EMMA JUCH and other soloists

WILL APPEAR.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the five Concerts, $6.50, now ready at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Twelfth Season 1892-93.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

FIVE CONCERTS,

Wednesday Evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8, and March 15.

First Concert,

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Oberon." . . . . . Weber
ARIA. "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon." . Weber.
VORSPIEL und LIEBESTOD. From "Tristan und Isolde." . Wagner.
SONG with ORCHESTRA. "Loreley." . . . Liszt
SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5. . . . Tschaikowsky.

(First time.)

Soloist: Miss Emma Juch.

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series, $3.50, $5.00 and 7.00 according to location.

The sale of Season Tickets opens at 1221 Chestnut St., Monday, October 24.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1892

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first Symphony concert of the new season had not altogether an important program. A more noble symphony for an opening selection than Beethoven's C minor could not easily have been chosen, but very poor taste was shown in placing at the other end of the program the noisy Kaiser Marsch, by Richard Wagner, which contains, perhaps, the most irreverent and unscholarly arrangement of Luther's "Ein' fest Burg" that a composer of any importance could easily concoct. The enormous difficulties of the "Tristan and Isolde" voespeil and finale were ably mastered, and the reproduction of the well-known love scenes in the second act was broadly interpreted.

As it was a Beethoven-Wagner concert, Mr. Nikisch would have shown exceptional taste had he selected instead of Beethoven's No. 5 the "Heroic Symphony," as this master-piece was especially dear to Wagner. It would consume too much time to discuss the original features of Mr. Nikisch's leading of the Symphony, which furthermore were by no means so numerous as when the work was performed under his direction several years ago. Mr. Nikisch is gradually becoming a conservator, and although there was an excusable roughness and lack of precision in the performance of the opening allegro of the Symphony, the remaining movements were remarkably well played. The finale allegro was given out with extraordinary energy, strong rhythmical accentuation and telling power in the climaxes, and it was received almost rapturously by the audience.

The first symphony concert was attended by a large and appreciative audience. The music stand and the conductor's platform were decorated with flowers, and Mr. Nikisch was warmly welcomed. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis L. Amory, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, Miss Gertrude Hall, Miss Caroline Clarke and Mrs. Clarke.

CHICKERING HALL - - - NIKISCH.

. . . . . .

. . 90 . .
PERFORMERS.

. . . . . .

= Boston = Symphony Orchestra

. . . . . .

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Conductor.

. . . . . .

Five Concerts on Thursday Evenings

November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, and March 16.

FIRST CONCERT

Thursday Evening, November 3, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE FANTASIE, "Romeo and Juliet," . . . Tschaikowsky

ARIA, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon," . . . Weber

MISS JUCH.

QUEEN MAB SCHERZO, from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," . . . . . Berlioz

SONG WITH ORCHESTRA, "Loreley," . . . . . Liszt

MISS JUCH.

SYMPHONY IN D MINOR, No. 4, ... Schumann

Introduction (Adagio non troppo).
Allegro.
Romance (Adagio non troppo).
Scherzo.
Finale (Allegro).

Soloist, Miss EMMA JUCH.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $6.50. The sale of single tickets for the first concert opens Monday, October 24, at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Chickering Hall.—Nikisch

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS)

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, - - Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON. 1892 93

FIVE CONCERTS

— IN —

CHICKERING HALL

— ON —

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

NOVEMBER 3, DECEMBER 8, JANUARY 12, FEBRUARY 9 and MARCH 16.

Miss EMMA JUCH and other soloists

WILL APPEAR.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the five Concerts, $6.50, now ready at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Twelfth Season 1892-93.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

FIVE CONCERTS,

Wednesday Evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8, and March 15.

First Concert,

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Oberon." . . . . Weber
ARIA. "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon." . Weber.
VORSPIEL und LIEBESTOD. From "Tristan und Isolde." . Wagner.
SONG with ORCHESTRA. "Loreley." . . . Liszt.
SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5. . . . Tschaikowsky.
(First time.)

Soloist: Miss Emma Juch.

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series, $3.50, $5.00 and 7.00 according to location.

The sale of Season Tickets opens at 1221 Chestnut St., Monday, October 24.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1892

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first Symphony concert of the new season had not altogether an important program. A more noble symphony for an opening selection than Beethoven's C minor could not easily have been chosen, but very poor taste was shown in placing at the other end of the program the noisy Kaiser Marsch, by Richard Wagner, which contains, perhaps, the most irreverent and unscholarly arrangement of Luther's "Ein' fest Burg" that a composer of any importance could easily concoct. The enormous difficulties of the "Tristan and Isolde" voespeil and finale were ably mastered, and the reproduction of the well-known love scenes in the second act was broadly interpreted.

As it was a Beethoven-Wagner concert, Mr. Nikisch would have shown exceptional taste had he selected instead of Beethoven's No. 5 the "Heroic Symphony," as this master-piece was especially dear to Wagner. It would consume too much time to discuss the original features of Mr. Nikisch's leading of the Symphony, which furthermore were by no means so numerous as when the work was performed under his direction several years ago. Mr. Nikisch is gradually becoming a conservator, and although there was an excusable roughness and lack of precision in the performance of the opening allegro of the Symphony, the remaining movements were remarkably well played. The finale allegro was given out with extraordinary energy, strong rhythmical accentuation and telling power in the climaxes, and it was received almost rapturously by the audience.

The first symphony concert was attended by a large and appreciative audience. The music stand and the conductor's platform were decorated with flowers, and Mr. Nikisch was warmly welcomed. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis I. Amory, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, Miss Gertrude Hall, Miss Caroline Clarke and Mrs. Clarke.

[20]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 22, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The new series of Symphony concerts began with a programme of excellent and commendable brevity, although so composed otherwise as to be rather exacting upon attention and strength. It began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is in itself nearly enough for an evening's hearing and necessarily makes almost anything which can be placed after it appear weak and cold, unless this be some composition which makes a distinct contrast by its levity and pleasantry. It was very well played, except that the scherzo was some degrees too slow, Mr. Nikisch keeping himself and his men fully in hand and reading the first movement—which he has been wont to exaggerate—without any extremes of pause or emphasis. Here and there there was some superabundance of force, especially in the entrances of the obbligati, but the men kept an even swing and were in entire agreement. After this were presented the prelude and "Love's Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which seemed rambling, inconsequent and indeterminate after the ordered strength and symmetry of passion in the symphony. The growth of sound, the elaboration of instrumental volume, the restless feeling and the constant striving for something not to be attained, were splendidly shown by Mr. Nikisch, and his rendering was rewarded with long and warm applause. But the distinctly theatrical composition would have sustained itself better as expressive music had it been heard before the symphony. The only other work was Wagner's "Kaiser" march, which sublimation of massive tone and splendor was led through with immense vigor and perfect picturesqueness, and made its usual exciting impression.

The rearrangement of the orchestra appears to be a good one. By dividing the double-basses between the two wings, their occasional thickness and heaviness of compact tone will be relieved, and the wooden wind and middle strings will gain by coming into the centre. Possibly the brass may be found too resonant in its new position, with all its mouths directed straight forward; but judicious management could correct that. The kettle-drummer also comes nearer the middle of the rear line, where, let us hope, it will be easier to control his obstreperous disposition. The little platforms on which the orchestra's semicircle is built up are stained a pleasant red, and so is Mr. Nikisch's dais, over which a great white fur robe is thrown. The programme books are to be compiled by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, whose first specimen was as learned and light as an encyclopædia.

The programme for tonight begins and ends with a novelty—Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture, and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. Between these will be played the fourth pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saëns, the soloist being Mr. Stasny of the New England Conservatory, who is a strong and showy executant.

The Kneisel Quartette's first concert—on Monday evening, in Chickering Hall—was an excellent example of their standard in programme and in performance. There was no new work, unless the delightful fragment from an incomplete Schubert quartette then received its first public reading in Boston, and the largest selection was the Dvorák sextette introduced by them as a novelty in a previous season. The playing was fine throughout, for these accomplished and earnest musicians are always in practice and are wont to be of one mind in their renderings. The next concert will come early in November, when something new and some solo assistance may be expected.

The members of the Boston Singers Society, that was, have been invited to come into the choir which is to be made up for the Symphony concerts.

The Dispatch.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE:

PER YEAR, - - - $8.00.

PROVIDENCE, OC . 23, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Have lost none of their popularity in this city, judging by the throng that were seeking admission tickets at the advance sale at O'Connor's last Monday morning. Yes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a firm hold on our people and there is every prospect that it will keep it as Manager Ellis is indefatigable to please our music-loving public in every respect. Among the soloists who will appear is Miss Emma Juch, who will need no words of comment. Secure season tickets if you have not already done so.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was well attended. The programme was: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke, which was new to Boston; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C-minor; Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, Tschaikowsky, also new here. The overture by the Leipsic composer, in common with all his music, is put together in a thoroughly musicianly manner, and is faultless generally in form and treatment; but it is also, in common with all his music, of the chapel-master order, and has little, save its correctness, and its excellent workmanship to recommend it to attention. Reinecke has written much and well, but his music never has a trace of inspiration in it, and suggests the industrious and genial pedagogue rather than the tone poet; the skilled music manufacturer, who is never at a loss to say something even when he has nothing to say. This overture is made with infinite care; it joints fit into each other with the closest exactness, it is polished with a deft hand, and there is not an angle in it that will not bear the most trying examination by rule and square, but that is all. It found the audience encouragingly expectant, and left them unmoved. The Tschaikowsky symphony is a strong work in its peculiar way, vigorously Russian here and there, but, on the whole, not heavily marked by national color. It is scarcely symphonic in character, though it is in form. Dignity and vulgarity, the lofty and the trivial, are curiously, even carelessly, mingled in it. The first allegro, when its wild, Slavic harmonies are over, becomes essentially Schumaneseque. The second theme is notably warm and graceful, and is beautifully treated in its orchestration. The working out is elaborate and long sustained, but the subjects are made wearisome before the composer ceases to show how often he can present them in a new light. The andante opens with a charming theme for horn solo, and the second theme is passionately sensuous, but it has a flavor of the opera house. The movement, however, is spun out and its melodies are repeated until they almost become platitudes; but it is the most interesting portion of the work. The third movement is a waltz, dignified, yet pretty and delicate, and the instrumentation here is fascinatingly piquant. The finale is a fiery and fiercely noisy movement, with not a little that is cheap and commonplace in themes and rhythms, and more that is oppressively monotonous. It is the least attractive part of the symphony; and what it all means needs some Columbus to discover; and the discovery made, it would hardly be worth the celebrating. The work was played, throughout, brilliantly, and with fine richness of tone color. The wind instruments, especially the first horn and first bassoon, on which a severe tax is made, acquitted themselves with rare skill. The concerto, by no means a great work in its class, was interpreted in the solo part, by Carl Stasny, who played neatly, and discreetly, if not with inspiriting effect. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony in B-flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist.

CYNICISMS.

The symphony concerts are under way again, and there is rejoicing, especially among those to whom Fridays rank as red letter days, because of their afternoons. The flurry over the auction sales of the season tickets is yet fresh in the general memory, and the eager competitions and the large premiums paid for them, caused the rest of the land to open its eyes with wonder at the love of the Athens of America for music, and classical music at that; music of Brahms, and Tschaikowsky, and Dvorak, and other tuneless offskys and owskys. And yet there is something in this connection that puzzles me considerably. It is that so many of these symphony tickets are offered for sale. In some of the papers I have seen strings of fifteen or twenty advertisements at a time, whose purport is the disposal of these tickets. I see also a surprising number of cards in shop windows, announcing that tickets are for sale within. The result is that I begin to reflect whether the exciting demand for tickets at auction was owing wholly to love of music on the part of purchasers. Not only this, but I have heard of a certain ticket speculator who went into the buying business to the extent of some fourteen thousand dollars on his own account, and has found it somewhat difficult to dispose of his purchases. Of course this, I have no means of verifying, and I give it for what it is worth; but from present appearances it would seem, after all, that the ticket speculators deserve an important place among those who contribute to the financial success of the symphony concerts, and they form no insignificant element in the halo of enthusiasm that surrounds ticket sales. Be this as it may, however, there are tickets for sale and for hire in every direction; which would seem to indicate that something must be deducted from the credit we enjoy as a city, in which a musical frenzy in connection with symphony concerts prevails to so phenomenal an extent, that season tickets cannot be had for love or money after the sales are over. I am very sorry for the speculators who find themselves with so many expensive tickets unsold. If there really be a speculator with some thousands of dollars' worth of tickets on hand, I condole with him especially. And yet, if there be the wild craving for these tickets that there is said to be, I cannot understand why he should not have disposed of his stock long ago. It is true that he may want prices for them that place them out of the reach of all but the wealthy; but he should have thought of that before he bought them. It is scarcely open to question that were it not for the speculators, the prices of tickets would not be run up to so high a figure. Rich people, of course, will have the seats that they covet, at any price; but others would be able to obtain them on more reasonable terms. But here again is illustrated the old axiom which says: "What is one man's meat is another man's poison." The higher the sums that are paid for tickets, the more it enables the projector of these concerts to meet their expenses; and if the speculator finds himself with so many unsold tickets for which he has paid cash, the management finds itself with that same cash in pocket. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. Nevertheless, it is none the less a pity that where so many real music lovers in moderate circumstances would be happy to attend the concerts, so many tickets should be lying idle. Still, that fact does not detract from the speculator as a prominent music patron in a music centre.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its eighth season in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening. The audience was large and demonstrative in its expression of the pleasure the performances afforded it. The programme was: Quartet, D-minor, Haydn; Fragment (one movement) in C-minor, Schubert; Sextet for strings in A major, Dvorak, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schultz assisting in the last named work. It was a genuine pleasure to listen again to the finished and thoroughly artistic work of this fine organization, which, on this occasion, acquitted itself in a flawless manner, and with that feeling for the distinguishing and widely-varied characteristics of the different selections, which is always so delightful and satisfying an element in its interpretations. The second concert in the series will be given Monday evening, Nov. 7.

The first Symphony concert drew a large audience to Music Hall, although Mrs. Gardner is still in Europe, and Mrs. Apthorp is still in the country. The conductor's stand has been decorated in such bad taste that many of the audience were rendered uncomfortable by it. The usual habitues were present, including the B. J. Langs, Winches, Footes, Tuckers, Lamsons, Warrens, Stackpoles, Rogerses, Wesselhoefts, Hasercks, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mrs. Jenks, Miss Hersey, Miss Winslow, the Hechts, the Wheelwrights, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. Sturgis, the Watsons, Dr. Bradford, Mr. Jackson, the Howard Walkers, the Loverings, the Elliot Hubbards, the Blakes and Mr. H. W. Swift.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme performed at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Reinecke.....Overture, "King Manfred"
Saint-Saens.....Concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in C minor
Tschaikowski.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor

Mr. Apthorp, in his symphony programme notes, is correct when he says that Karl Reinecke, the composer, "has never risen above the second rank." Any well informed musician will endorse this estimate of the genial and studious Kapellmeister at Leipzig; the unrivaled performer of Mozart's sonatas, concertos, etc.; the prolific or, figuratively speaking, garrulous composer compared with whom there are thousands of musicians his superiors today whose knowledge of what really constitutes musical composition will not permit them to compose. Then wherein is the artistic consistency of performing Mr. Reinecke's music at a symphony concert given by an orchestra of world wide reputation—an orchestra that is pre-eminently "above the second rank." Mr. Reinecke may be all the greater musician for having produced a very large number of mediocre overtures, sonatas, etc.; but the principle that one good tune is worth a dozen bad overtures is an artistic one. What true art is is simply a question of quality.

Reinecke's overture "King Manford' is conspicuously void of art; it is an artificial work; its gender is feminine; it has many notes, but little music; it is a chatterbox kind of overture, having a plausible refinement, purity and dignity not at its basis but simply in the imagination of the composer. Again we ask why should Mr. Nikisch have music performed at the symphony concerts that is by a "composer who has never risen above the second rank"?

Then followed the fourth concerto in C minor by Saint-Saens. After the first movement which leaves the impression of only being preparatory to the chief business of the piece, it becomes a remarkably grotesque composition and is a characteristic example not only of the composer's familiarity with the technical possibilities of the virtuoso but the absolute mastery he has over all the elements of composition, but all this is in juxtaposition with much that is trivial and even vulgar.

The first movement breathes a poetical spirit, though somewhat heavily and in a pessimistic vein; it is by no means worthy of the composer, of whom Bulow has said "Er ist der grosste musikalische Koff der Jetztzeit." (He is the greatest of living musicians). The finale based upon an arch and piquant folk-song is a masterpiece. The concerto has little of the storm and fury, little of the virtuosic bedlam let loose in it that is the all too prevailing characteristic of the typical modern concerto, but after the first movement it is extremely lavish in passages of real beauty and a well-nigh constant flow of melody that is rendered none the less clear by the attending auxiliaries of the pianoforte part. Whatsoever question may arise as to the emotional enjoyment to be derived from its music, this is purely a question of taste. True the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat foggy and as overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any coherent relation to each other, but we have used the word "appear" trusting that a more familiar acquaintance with the work would remove the impression. The difficulties of the pianoforte part were overcome by Mr. Carl Stasny without seeming effort; with "classic calmness and accuracy," as the German critics are wont to remark. He is a pianist of the Charles Halle type, and seldom plays fortissimo, and yet without the slightest affectation in the other direction, for he is by no means a pianissimist. He exhibited a fine intellectual grasp of the music, a remarkably pliant, interesting and facile technique and held the interest of his listeners for every bar. Mr. Stasny's performance was the chief triumph of the concert. Of the Tschaikowski symphony, which was heard for the first time in Boston, more can scarcely be said than that it was listened to with curiosity and admiration by musicians in the audience and doubtless with all due appreciation of the difficulty which nowadays besets any composer who aspires to produce a work so transcendent in the demands that are made for it as a modern symphony.

The music is highly spiced, throughout sensuous and exciting. The composer is plainly an eclectic whose aim is to give his great work an investiure which shall be in keeping with its character both externally and internally. It is romantic music yet it is by no means so stimulated that like so much romanticism it either wearies the listner or makes him long for a fresher, healthier, atmosphere; quite the revers. He revels in instrumetnal color and the language of his orchestration is at all times glowing and brilliant. Of all four movements the valse makes the most unqualifiedly pleasing impression. It is fluent, fresh and vigorous, yet always refined in its rhytums, and is altogether as unique a masterpiece as has yet appeared in a modern symphony. The performance of the work was uncommonly creditable to Conductor Nikisch and the orchestra, and the most tyrannous demands of the symphony were so fully complied with that it seemed as though he had firmly inspired the musicians with an ability to render it.

C. L. C.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE'S FIRST.

The Kneisel Quartette concerts have come to be as indispensable a feature of our luxurious season of music as the Symphony concerts, which fact was attested by the houseful of music lovers at the first concert of the season by the quartette in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. It is quite in order also to note with pleasure the return of the quartette to Chickering Hall, which is a delight to the eye and ear in marked contrast with the hall in which the concerts were given last year. The works presented Monday evening were a quartette by Haydn in D major; Fragment in C minor, Schubert; and sextette in A major, Dvorak. As regards both quantity and quality the programme may be commended as a model—just the right length and surely without a dull moment to such as were intelligent listeners or who without being musical might have entertained an adequate reverence for the art-works presented. The opening number was charmingly Hadynish in spirit, albeit with an entire absence of such technical form as the genial creator of the modern symphony—who also raised the string quartette from the crude and antique examples by Gregorio Allegri to an importance and impressiveness hitherto unattained—was wont to employ. The fragment in C minor by Schubert, unless we err, was performed here for the first time; a veritable tone-poem indeed into which the unrivaled melodist has breathed his own sympathetic soul, with the more tender and naive feelings that fill the human heart, each separate, but all related, so as to form one varied and consistent whole. The Dvorak sextette is a remarkably virile composition, exuberantly Scandinavian in spirit it is true, yet a superb example of the absolute mastery that Dvorak has over all the elements of composition. In the first movement, especially, the allegretto moderato, every bar pulsates with eager, impassioned and exciting life. It easily pleases upon a single hearing, and contains nothing that might not prove perfectly agreeable and tuneful even to the least cultivated listener. Throughout the concert the playing by Mr. Kneisel and his associates was wholly admirable.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 116.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

Carl Stasny, Soloist, at the Symphony Concert.

Director Nikisch gave the Symphony concert patrons ample food for thought last evening, as he presented a programme of three works, all of which were unfamiliar to local musicians.

The overture to Reinecke's opera, "Manfred," opened the programme, and had a first hearing here. It is certainly an excellent composition in the modern style, which does not bear the imprint of Wagnerian tendencies, the ideas having in some ways the characteristics of Schumann in his clearest and most melodious mood, while the scoring is of the Mendelssohn style. The principal theme is of a beauty well worth the skilful development given it, and the composition, as a whole, is admirably suited for the concert room. It was played with splendid effect by the orchestra, and its merit was instantly recognized and applauded.

The piano concerto (or more properly fantasia with orchestra) by Saint-Saens, No. 4, in C minor, was the work selected by Mr. Carl Stasny for his first appearance here with orchestra, and the remarkable success attending his performance justified his choice of it. Only a single hearing of this concerto has been had here, and that was so many years ago that the concerto made practically a novelty. It is an admirably written work for the display of a pianist's accomplishments as well as a most enjoyable composition for all music lovers. It has some "tunes" in it that serve the composer well in supplying themes entirely worthy of the skill shown in their elaboration and development, and which give thorough satisfaction to the melodious music lover. The composer has well nigh exhausted the possibilities of the piano in this concerto, and its performance makes demands not easily met even by the most accomplished player.

In his playing Mr. Stasny showed so many good points that the concerto quite readily assumed great prominence in the evening's programme, and the opportunity for a correct estimate of the concerto was easily gained in following his reading of the work. He is a singularly clear and intelligent interpreter of this brilliant French composer, and the artistic fashion in which he performed the piano score of the concerto, instantly arrested attention and gave the player an audience in sympathy with his methods.

Mr. Stasny is a thoroughly well equipped pianist, having not only a clear musical insight but a control of his instrument which enables him to develop his ideas of the composition in hand in the most lucid manner. He has a clear, clean, and sympathetic touch, with ample and well controlled power, his technical attainments are equal to the most intricate difficulties of the modern school, and, all in all, he is a most enjoyable player. This estimate of his abilities appeared to be held by the audience, as the applause which rewarded his appearance was of the most pronounced character.

In bringing forward the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor, as one of the early novelties of the season on this occasion Conductor Nikisch added a most notable work to the orchestra's repertoire, and one which is worthy of more than a single hearing.

This masterly musician is at his best in this his most recent symphonic composition, for it displays his genius as a writer for the modern orchestra, his rare skill in the combination of instruments and his originality in producing effects which charm the listener upon even a first hearing of the work. Tschaikowsky to be sure, shows his appreciation of the fund of musical ideas to be had by a study of his national folk songs, but this source of melodic forms is so unfamiliar that his recourse to it is never ill-advised.

His fifth symphony consists of the following movement. Andante, andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza, valse (allegro moderato) and finale (andante maestoso.)

The composer has held to symphonic traditions mainly in this work, the use of the valse movement in the place of the usual scherzo being the most prominent departure from accepted forms. It is throughout a thoroughly enjoyable composition, and is so straightforward in its themes and their development that little analytical study is demanded to appreciate its full worth.

It was played in a superb style, and the mastery of the work shown by the orchestra in Mr. Nikisch's baton called out an unusual demonstration after each of the movements.

For the concert next Saturday Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, and the programme will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra, Weber's aria from "Oberon," Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen" (first time in Boston), Liszt's song with orchestra, "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B-flat major.

The Symphony concert drew out the usual large and fashionable assemblage, among whom were Col. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Zerrahn, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Miss Louisa Wells, Mr. F. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. Henry E. Mason, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Beach, Mr. Carl Baerman, Prof. John K. Paine, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot L. Hubbard, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner S. Lamson, Miss Going, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bishop, Mr. and Mrs Jacob Hecht, Dr. William P. Wesselhoeft, Mme. Edna Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale and many others.

[21]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 22, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The new series of Symphony concerts began with a programme of excellent and commendable brevity, although so composed otherwise as to be rather exacting upon attention and strength. It began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is in itself nearly enough for an evening's hearing and necessarily makes almost anything which can be placed after it appear weak and cold, unless this be some composition which makes a distinct contrast by its levity and pleasantry. It was very well played, except that the scherzo was some degrees too slow, Mr. Nikisch keeping himself and his men fully in hand and reading the first movement —which he has been wont to exaggerate—without any extremes of pause or emphasis. Here and there there was some superabundance of force, especially in the entrances of the obbligati, but the men kept an even swing and were in entire agreement. After this were presented the prelude and "Love's Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which seemed rambling, inconsequent and indeterminate after the ordered strength and symmetry of passion in the symphony. The growth of sound, the elaboration of instrumental volume, the restless feeling and the constant striving for something not to be attained, were splendidly shown by Mr. Nikisch, and his rendering was rewarded with long and warm applause. But the distinctly theatrical composition would have sustained itself better as expressive music had it been heard before the symphony. The only other work was Wagner's "Kaiser" march, which sublimation of massive tone and splendor was led through with immense vigor and perfect picturesqueness, and made its usual exciting impression.

The rearrangement of the orchestra appears to be a good one. By dividing the double-basses between the two wings, their occasional thickness and heaviness of compact tone will be relieved, and the wooden wind and middle strings will gain by coming into the centre. Possibly the brass may be found too resonant in its new position, with all its mouths directed straight forward; but judicious management could correct that. The kettle-drummer also comes nearer the middle of the rear line, where, let us hope, it will be easier to control his obstreperous disposition. The little platforms on which the orchestra's semicircle is built up are stained a pleasant red, and so is Mr. Nikisch's dais, over which a great white fur robe is thrown. The programme books are to be compiled by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, whose first specimen was as learned and light as an encyclopædia.

The programme for tonight begins and ends with a novelty—Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture, and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. Between these will be played the fourth pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saëns, the soloist being Mr. Stansy of the New England Conservatory, who is a strong and showy executant.

The Kneisel Quartette's first concert —on Monday evening, in Chickering Hall— was an excellent example of their standard in programme and in performance. There was no new work, unless the delightful fragment from an incomplete Schubert quartette then received its first public reading in Boston, and the largest selection was the Dvorák sextette introduced by them as a novelty in a previous season. The playing was fine throughout, for these accomplished and earnest musicians are always in practice and are wont to be of one mind in their renderings. The next concert will come early in November, when something new and some solo assistance may be expected.

The members of the Boston Singers Society, that was, have been invited to come into the choir which is to be made up for the Symphony concerts.

The Dispatch.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE:

PER YEAR, - - - $3.00.

PROVIDENCE, OC . 23, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Have lost none of their popularity in this city, judging by the throng that were seeking admission tickets at the advance sale at O'Connor's last Monday morning. Yes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a firm hold on our people and there is every prospect that it will keep it as Manager Ellis is indefatigable to please our music-loving public in every respect. Among the soloists who will appear is Miss Emma Juch, who will need no words of comment. Secure season tickets if you have not already done so.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was well attended. The programme was: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke, which was new to Boston; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C-minor; Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, Tschaikowsky, also new here. The overture by the Leipsic composer, in common with all his music, is put together in a thoroughly musicianly manner, and is faultless generally in form and treatment; but it is also, in common with all his music, of the chapel-master order, and has little, save its correctness, and its excellent workmanship to recommend it to attention. Reinecke has written much and well, but his music never has a trace of inspiration in it, and suggests the industrious and genial pedagogue rather than the tone poet; the skilled music manufacturer, who is never at a loss to say something even when he has nothing to say. This overture is made with infinite care; its joints fit into each other with the closest exactness, it is polished with a deft hand, and there is not an angle in it that will not bear the most trying examination by rule and square, but that is all. It found the audience encouragingly expectant, and left them unmoved. The Tschaikowsky symphony is a strong work in its peculiar way, vigorously Russian here and there, but, on the whole, not heavily marked by national color. It is scarcely symphonic in character, though it is in form. Dignity and vulgarity, the lofty and the trivial, are curiously, even carelessly, mingled in it. The first allegro, when its wild, Slavic harmonies are over, becomes essentially Schumaneesque. The second theme is notably warm and graceful, and is beautifully treated in its orchestration. The working out is elaborate and long sustained, but the subjects are made wearisome before the composer ceases to show how often he can present them in a new light. The andante opens with a charming theme for horn solo, and the second theme is passionately sensuous, but it has a flavor of the opera house. The movement, however, is spun out and its melodies are repeated until they almost become platitudes; but it is the most interesting portion of the work. The third movement is a waltz, dignified, yet pretty and delicate, and the instrumentation here is fascinatingly piquant. The finale is a fiery and fiercely noisy movement, with not a little that is cheap and commonplace in themes and rhythms, and more that is oppressively monotonous. It is the least attractive part of the symphony; and what it all means needs some Columbus to discover; and the discovery made, it would hardly be worth the celebrating. The work was played, throughout, brilliantly, and with fine richness of tone color. The wind instruments, especially the first horn and first bassoon, on which a severe tax is made, acquitted themselves with rare skill. The concerto, by no means a great work in its class, was interpreted in the solo part, by Carl Stasny, who played neatly, and discreetly, if not with inspiriting effect. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, P. Scharwenka; "Lorelei," Liszt; and Symphony in B-flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist.

CYNICISMS.

The symphony concerts are under way again, and there is rejoicing, especially among those to whom Fridays rank as red letter days, because of their afternoons. The flurry over the auction sales of the season tickets is yet fresh in the general memory, and the eager competitions and the large premiums paid for them, caused the rest of the land to open its eyes with wonder at the love of the Athens of America for music, and classical music at that; music of Brahms, and Tschaikowsky, and Dvorak, and other tuneless offskys and owskys. And yet there is something in this connection that puzzles me considerably. It is that so many of these symphony tickets are offered for sale. In some of the papers I have seen strings of fifteen or twenty advertisements at a time, whose purport is the disposal of these tickets. I see also a surprising number of cards in shop windows, announcing that tickets are for sale within. The result is that I begin to reflect whether the exciting demand for tickets at auction was owing wholly to love of music on the part of purchasers. Not only this, but I have heard of a certain ticket speculator who went into the buying business to the extent of some fourteen thousand dollars on his own account, and has found it somewhat difficult to dispose of his purchases. Of course this, I have no means of verifying, and I give it for what it is worth; but from present appearances it would seem, after all, that the ticket speculators deserve an important place among those who contribute to the financial success of the symphony concerts, and they form no insignificant element in the halo of enthusiasm that surrounds ticket sales. Be this as it may, however, there are tickets for sale and for hire in every direction; which would seem to indicate that something must be deducted from the credit we enjoy as a city, in which a musical frenzy in connection with symphony concerts prevails to so phenomenal an extent, that season tickets cannot be had for love or money after the sales are over. I am very sorry for the speculators who find themselves with so many expensive tickets unsold. If there really be a speculator with some thousands of dollars' worth of tickets on hand, I condole with him especially. And yet, if there be the wild craving for these tickets that there is said to be, I cannot understand why he should not have disposed of his stock long ago. It is true that he may want prices for them that place them out of the reach of all but the wealthy; but he should have thought of that before he bought them. It is scarcely open to question that were it not for the speculators, the prices of tickets would not be run up to so high a figure. Rich people, of course, will have the seats that they covet, at any price; but others would be able to obtain them on more reasonable terms. But here again is illustrated the old axiom which says: "What is one man's meat is another man's poison." The higher the sums that are paid for tickets, the more it enables the projector of these concerts to meet their expenses; and if the speculator finds himself with so many unsold tickets for which he has paid cash, the management finds itself with that same cash in pocket. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. Nevertheless, it is none the less a pity that where so many real music lovers in moderate circumstances would be happy to attend the concerts, so many tickets should be lying idle. Still, that fact does not detract from the speculator as a prominent music patron in a music centre.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its eighth season in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening. The audience was large and demonstrative in its expression of the pleasure the performances afforded it. The programme was: Quartet, D-minor, Haydn; Fragment (one movement) in C-minor, Schubert; Sextet for strings in A major, Dvorak, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schultz assisting in the last named work. It was a genuine pleasure to listen again to the finished and thoroughly artistic work of this fine organization, which, on this occasion, acquitted itself in a flawless manner, and with that feeling for the distinguishing and widely-varied characteristics of the different selections, which is always so delightful and satisfying an element in its interpretations. The second concert in the series will be given Monday evening, Nov. 7.

—— The first Symphony concert drew a large audience to Music Hall, although Mrs. Gardner is still in Europe, and Mrs. Apthorp is still in the country. The conductor's stand has been decorated in such bad taste that many of the audience were rendered uncomfortable by it. The usual habitues were present, including the B. J. Longs, Winches, Footes, Tuckers, Lamsons, Warrens, Stackpoles, Rogerses, Wesselhoefts, Haserickes, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mrs. Jenks, Miss Hersey, Miss Winslow, the Hechts, the Wheelwrights, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. Sturgis, the Watsons, Dr. Bradford, Mr. Jackson, the Howard Walkers, the Loverings, the Eliot Hubbards, the Blakes and Mr. H. W. Swift.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme performed at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Reinecke.....Overture, "King Manfred"
Saint-Saens.....Concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in C minor
Tschaikowski.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor

Mr. Apthorp, in his symphony programme notes, is correct when he says that Karl Reinecke, the composer, "has never risen above the second rank." Any well informed musician will endorse this estimate of the genial and studious Kapellmeister at Leipzig; the unrivaled performer of Mozart's sonatas, concertos, etc.; the prolific or, figuratively speaking, garrulous composer compared with whom there are thousands of musicians his superiors today whose knowledge of what really constitutes musical composition will not permit them to compose. Then where in is the artistic consistency of performing Mr. Reinecke's music at a symphony concert given by an orchestra of world wide reputation—an orchestra that is pre-eminently "above the second rank." Mr. Reinecke may be all the greater musician for having produced a very large number of mediocre overtures, sonatas, etc.; but the principle that one good tune is worth a dozen bad overtures is an artistic one. What true art is is simply a question of quality.

Reinecke's overture "King Manford' is conspicuously void of art; it is an artificial work; its gender is feminine; it has many notes, but little music; it is a chatterbox kind of overture, having a plausible refinement, purity and dignity not at its basis but simply in the imagination of the composer. Again we ask why should Mr. Nikisch have music performed at the symphony concerts that is by a "composer who has never risen above the second rank"?

Then followed the fourth concerto in C minor by Saint-Saens. After the first movement which leaves the impression of only being preparatory to the chief business of the piece, it becomes a remarkably grotesque composition and is a characteristic example not only of the composer's familiarity with the technical possibilities of the virtuoso but the absolute mastery he has over all the elements of composition, but all this is in juxtaposition with much that is trivial and even vulgar.

The first movement breathes a poetical spirit, though somewhat heavily and in a pessimistic vein; it is by no means worthy of the composer, of whom Bulow has said "Er ist der grosste musikalische Koff der Jetztzeit." (He is the greatest of living musicians). The finale based upon an arch and piquant folk-song is a masterpiece. The concerto has little of the storm and fury, little of the virtuosic bedlam let loose in it that is the all too prevailing characteristic of the typical modern concerto, but after the first movement it is extremely lavish in passages of real beauty and a well-nigh constant flow of melody that is rendered none the less clear by the attending auxiliaries of the pianoforte part. Whatsoever question may arise as to the emotional enjoyment to be derived from its music, this is purely a question of taste. True the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat foggy and as overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any coherent relation to each other, but we have used the word "appear" trusting that a more familiar acquaintance with the work would remove the impression. The difficulties of the pianoforte part were overcome by Mr. Carl Stasny without seeming effort; with "classic calmness and accuracy," as the German critics are wont to remark. He is a pianist of the Charles Halle type, and seldom plays fortissimo, and yet without the slightest affectation in the other direction, for he is by no means a pianissimist. He exhibited a fine intellectual grasp of the music, a remarkably pliant, interesting and facile technique and held the interest of his listeners for every bar. Mr. Stasny's performance was the chief triumph of the concert. Of the Tschaikowski symphony, which was heard for the first time in Boston, more can scarcely be said than that it was listened to with curiosity and admiration by musicians in the audience and doubtless with all due appreciation of the difficulty which nowadays besets any composer who aspires to produce a work so transcendent in the demands that are made for it as a modern symphony.

The music is highly spiced, throughout sensuous and exciting. The composer is plainly an eclectic whose aim is to give his great work an investiture which shall be in keeping with its character both externally and internally. It is romantic music yet it is by no means so stimulated that like so much romanticism it either wearies the listner or makes him long for a fresher, healthier, atmosphere; quite the revers. He revels in instrumetnal color and the language of his orchestration is at all times glowing and brilliant. Of all four movements the valse makes the most unqualifiedly pleasing impression. It is fluent, fresh and vigorous, yet always refined in its rhytums, and is altogether as unique a masterpiece as has yet appeared in a modern symphony. The performance of the work was uncommonly creditable to Conductor Nikisch and the orchestra, and the most tyrannous demands of the symphony were so fully complied with that it seemed as though he had firmly inspired the musicians with an ability to render it.

C. L. C.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE'S FIRST.

The Kneisel Quartette concerts have come to be as indispensable a feature of our luxurious season of music as the Symphony concerts, which fact was attested by the houseful of music lovers at the first concert of the season by the quartette in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. It is quite in order also to note with pleasure the return of the quartette to Chickering Hall, which is a delight to the eye and ear in marked contrast with the hall in which the concerts were given last year. The works presented Monday evening were a quartette by Haydn in D major; Fragment in C minor, Schubert; and sextette in A major, Dvorak. As regards both quantity and quality the programme may be commended as a model—just the right length and surely without a dull moment to such as were intelligent listeners or who without being musical might have entertained an adequate reverence for the art-works presented. The opening number was charmingly Haydnish in spirit, albeit with an entire absence of such technical form as the genial creator of the modern symphony—who also raised the string quartette from the crude and antique examples by Gregorio Allegri to an importance and impressiveness hitherto unattained—was wont to employ. The fragment in C minor by Schubert, unless we err, was performed here for the first time; a veritable tone-poem indeed into which the unrivaled melodist has breathed his own sympathetic soul, with the more tender and naive feelings that fill the human heart, each separate, but all related, so as to form one varied and consistent whole. The Dvorak sextette is a remarkably virile composition, exuberantly Scandinavian in spirit it is true, yet a superb example of the absolute mastery that Dvorak has over all the elements of composition. In the first movement, especially, the allegretto moderato, every bar pulsates with eager, impassioned and exciting life. It easily pleases upon a single hearing, and contains nothing that might not prove perfectly agreeable and tuneful even to the least cultivated listener. Throughout the concert the playing by Mr. Kneisel and his associates was wholly admirable.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 115.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

Carl Stasny, Soloist, at the Symphony Concert.

Director Nikisch gave the Symphony concert patrons ample food for thought last evening, as he presented a programme of three works, all of which were unfamiliar to local musicians.

The overture to Reinecke's opera, "Manfred," opened the programme, and had a first hearing here. It is certainly an excellent composition in the modern style, which does not bear the imprint of Wagnerian tendencies, the ideas having in some ways the characteristics of Schumann in his clearest and most melodious mood, while the scoring is of the Mendelssohn style. The principal theme is of a beauty well worth the skilful development given it, and the composition, as a whole, is admirably suited for the concert room. It was played with splendid effect by the orchestra, and its merit was instantly recognized and applauded.

The piano concerto (or more properly fantasia with orchestra) by Saint-Saens, No. 4, in C minor, was the work selected by Mr. Carl Stasny for his first appearance here with orchestra, and the remarkable success attending his performance justified his choice of it. Only a single hearing of this concerto has been had here, and that was so many years ago that the concerto made practically a novelty. It is an admirably written work for the display of a pianist's accomplishments as well as a most enjoyable composition for all music lovers. It has some "tunes" in it that serve the composer well in supplying themes entirely worthy of the skill shown in their elaboration and development, and which give thorough satisfaction to the melodious music lover. The composer has well nigh exhausted the possibilities of the piano in this concerto, and its performance makes demands not easily met even by the most accomplished player.

In his playing Mr. Stasny showed so many good points that the concerto quite readily assumed great prominence in the evening's programme, and the opportunity for a correct estimate of the concerto was easily gained in following his reading of the work. He is a singularly clear and intelligent interpreter of this brilliant French composer, and the artistic fashion in which he performed the piano score of the concerto, instantly arrested attention and gave the player an audience in sympathy with his methods.

Mr. Stasny is a thoroughly well equipped pianist, having not only a clear musical insight but a control of his instrument which enables him to develop his ideas of the composition in hand in the most lucid manner. He has a clear, clean, and sympathetic touch, with ample and well controlled power, his technical attainments are equal to the most intricate difficulties of the modern school, and, all in all, he is a most enjoyable player. This estimate of his abilities appeared to be held by the audience, as the applause which rewarded his appearance was of the most pronounced character.

In bringing forward the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor, as one of the early novelties of the season on this occasion Conductor Nikisch added a most notable work to the orchestra's repertoire, and one which is worthy of more than a single hearing.

This masterly musician is at his best in this his most recent symphonic composition, for it displays his genius as a writer for the modern orchestra, his rare skill in the combination of instruments and his originality in producing effects which charm the listener upon even a first hearing of the work. Tschaikowsky to be sure shows his appreciation of the fund of musical ideas to be had by a study of his national folk songs, but this source of melodic forms is so unfamiliar that his recourse to it is never ill-advised.

His fifth symphony consists of the following movement. Andante, andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza, valse (allegro moderato) and finale (andante maestoso.)

The composer has held to symphonic traditions mainly in this work, the use of the valse movement in the place of the usual scherzo being the most prominent departure from accepted forms. It is throughout a thoroughly enjoyable composition, and is so straightforward in its themes and their development that little analytical study is demanded to appreciate its full worth.

It was played in a superb style, and the mastery of the work shown by the orchestra in Mr. Nikisch's baton called out an unusual demonstration after each of the movements.

For the concert next Saturday Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, and the programme will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra, Weber's aria from "Oberon," Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen" (first time in Boston), Liszt's song with orchestra, "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B-flat major.

The Symphony concert drew out the usual large and fashionable assemblage, among whom were Col. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Zerrahn, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Miss Louisa Wells, Mr. F. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. Phœbe Jenks, Mr. Henry E. Mason, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Beach, Mr. Carl Baermann, Prof. John K. Paine, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot L. Hubbard, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner S. Lamson, Miss Going, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bishop, Mr. and Mrs Jacob Hecht, Dr. William P. Wesselhoeft, Mme. Edna Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale and many others.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE UNIQUE PROGRAMME OF SATURDAY.

Every Number a Novelty and Greatly Enjoyed by all Connoisseurs Present—Fine Distinctions in the Musical Demands of Beethoven's Time as Compared With Today.

The programme of Saturday was one made up entirely of novelties, and it is pleasant to be able to add that these novelties were all worth the doing. Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture headed the list. The hasheesh-eaters of modern music may declaim against such shapely works as much as they please, and may cry "Kapellmeister-musik" to their heart's content, but such an overture is enjoyable in almost every measure, and is a most effectual protest against the formlessness of much of the music of the present. It was in the main well played, and its combat and strife was not exaggerated in the reading. The brasses were not forced, as they were at the first concert, and the harp was not obliterated, but was sometimes audible. The horn was insecure, as it was at the first concert, but made ample amends by superb playing in the last number of the programme. The lesson of the work was that one is not obliged to rush through the entire 24 keys in order to express passion, but can keep within the architectural lines and still present contrast and emotion adequately.

St. Saens' C minor concerto was practically new to concert goers, and also served to introduce a new man to the audience in its solo part. Mr. Carl Stasny had been heard in small piano-recitals in Boston last year but this was the first time that he essayed a large musical task before a Boston audience. He succeeded even better than the previous recitals seemed to promise. His chief faults on the former occasions amid an excellent musicianly reading were a too muscular style, and an overuse of the pedal. In this concerto he thoroughly curbed his strength, and gave a degree of delicacy and shading that was as welcome as it was unexpected. The second fault is not yet entirely overcome, and there were a few blurs that were caused by obtrusive use of the damper pedal. The surety of the player was commendable and the ensemble was never disturbed. Mr. Stasny's record in Europe is a high one, and he has played this very work to the satisfaction of rigid German criticism. He was twice recalled with hearty applause which he deserved. The concerto is brilliant in spite of its many touches of gloom. It is too vague in form, but presents much ingenuity of development, in fact in this field, St. Saens may be regarded as the greatest of living French composers. There are plenty of reminiscent touches in the first movement, and even Gounod's "Marche Funebre d'une Marionnette" came to the surface too palpably. The final treatment of a theme of popular character, half development, half variation, was the most musicianly part of the work. It is, however, not a concerto that one grows enthusiastic over at a first hearing.

We had Beethoven's fifth symphony at the preceding concert, this time came the fifth of Tschaikowsky. The works resembled each other only in the numeral; the modern tendency cannot be better illusted than by comparing two such works; on the one side clearness, on the other turgescence; on the one side rugged power, on the other frenzy. Yet Tschaikowsky is a splendid example of the best side of modern musical treatment; it is the trend of the entire school which is wrong; the suaviter in modo seems to be abolished; repose in action is unknown.

Tschaikowsky is a master of the orchestra and of orchestral development. He lays on the colors with a sure hand, and his combinations are always interesting and sometimes entirely original. He draws royally from the folk-music of his native land, and this imparts a vigor and a characteristic style to his work that can scarcely be overestimated. It is one of the most hopeful signs in our present music, that some of the masters are beginning to draw from the great well of popular music. It was this custom that originally nourished the German school, and Luther, Bach and all the pioneers in the foundation of it, used the folk-music freely.

This symphony is strong in its use of folk-themes. But the musician since Haydn's day demands more than a mere set of tunes, he requires that the melodies presented shall be carried to logical afterthoughts and conclusions; the themes may represent the emotional side of music, but their development must add the intellectual element, and in this combination of the intellectual and emotional lies the power of the symphony. And here we find the weak spot of this work, the development (which is always chiefly in the first movement) is very prolix, but never so clear as with the older masters; the logic of music is not so well represented as of yore. There is more reliance placed on tone-color and on quaintness. The first movement is intentionally odd from first to last. A ghostly character is imparted by weird wood-wind phases. The clarinet is used in the deep, or chalumeau, register, and imparts a gloom that reminds of the spectral effects that Mendelssohn brought forth in the same manner in his Scotch symphony and Weber in the incantation scene of "Der Freischuetz." Every part of the movement is exciting in one way or other; fierce use of empty fifths is made, and there is a revelry in dissonance of audacious boldness; the bassoon is employed (and it was excellently played) in a march theme which at once recalls Berlioz's famous bassoon figure in the "March to Execution." Spite of the reminiscences, there is nothing like plagiarism in the work. So much has been done by the moderns of a generation ago, that it is impossible to avoid occasionally treading on their ground in the matter of instrumentation. Had the symphony ended with the first movement (it would then have been a noble overture) all might have been well, but the succeeding movement brought more Muscovite gloom, and the last one added such a thoroughly Russian finale that the whole feast began to take the flavor of Caviare, and become monotonous in its bizarrerie. There were many good contrapuntal touches, however, as in the imitations of the chief theme of the second movement (nobly played by the first horn) and in the coda of the finale. After the sadness of the second movement had been [illegible] of the first [illegible] it was as well to use a waltz movement as the third movement of the work. It is unusual to use this in symphony, but since the waltz is the daughter of the minuet, and the minuet is admitted freely into classical forms, the employment of this rhythm is justifiable, and as intimated, it served as a good contrast. The finale seemed almost akin to a Hungarian rhapsody. It began with a slow and mournful introduction, like a lassan, and then dashed of into a wildly hilarious movement, as the Hungarian gypsy rushes into a Friska. The movement had a frenzy that reminded of the men's dance of which the Russian is so fond—the Kamarinskaia. And so the folk flavor was carried to the very end. It was too much of one school for a single hearing, and while paying all tribute to Tschaikowsky for his deftness of instrumentation, while recognizing his skill in the modern vein of development, his counterpoint, and the inherent power of his native music, one could not but find the atmosphere of the work heavy-laden and oppressive, and wish for the purer air of the older masters. The performance was almost a perfect one; a little more repression of the brass in the finale, and it would have been quite so. The conductor seemed to delight in the wild character of the symphony, and brought out the points with skilful hand. The woodwind played finely and had much work to do, and the violins played their scale runs at the end with wonderful effect. Next Saturday the pendulum will swing back to the gentler measures of Gade.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE BOSTON TIMES

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 23, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The programme at last evening's Symphony concert at Music hall, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, the second concert of the season, was: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Tschaikowsky. Mr. Carl Stasny, soloist.

At the first concert the improvement in the new seating of the orchestra was apparent. The general effect was strengthened, particularly in the wind instruments. The season opened auspiciously, with a well-played programme, the usual enthusiasm, and the usual audience.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel quartette's first concert of the season in Chickering hall last Monday evening was most delightful. The programme was; Haydn—Quartette in D major; Schubert—Fragment (one movement) in C minor; Dvorak—Sextette for strings, in A major, op. 48. Not only were the selections very pleasing in themselves, but they were played with that perfection of technique and clearness of interpretation which make the Kneisel indisputably among the finest string quartettes in the world.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co., Limited.

R. Friedlander.....President

608 NORTH FOURTH STREET

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, or $5 per annum.

Samstag, 22. Okt. 1892.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Diese berühmte Organisation unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch wird in diesem Winter hier in der Academy of Music fünf große Konzerte veranstalten und zwar am 2. November, 5. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8. Februar und 15. März. Es ist nicht erst nöthig auf die Vorzüglichkeit der Leistungen des berühmten Orchesters einzugehen. Frl. Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden während des Winters als Solisten in den Konzerten mitwirken. Am nächsten Montage beginnt der Verkauf der Tickets für die Saison von 5 Konzerten bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

Academy of Music. Nikisch.

Boston Boston Symphonie Orchester — 85 Instrumente.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Dirigent.
Fünf große Konzerte.

Am Mittwoch Abend, den 2. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8 Februar und 15. März.

Miß Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden als Solisten auftreten. Saison-Tickets einschließlich reservirten Sitzen für die Serie von fünf Konzerten für $3.50, $5 und $7, je nach der Lage.

Der Verkauf der Saison-Tickets beginnt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str., Montag Morgen, den 24. Okt.

g17okt C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1892.

The Second of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The programme of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "King Manfred".....Reinecke
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

***

The appearance of the overture to "King Manfred," an opera by Karl Reinecke, in a concert hall that is frequented in the year 1892, may be likened unto the visit of an esteemed gentleman, past the zenith of life, at the house of his kinsfolk. He is greeted warmly, and is then submitted to the inspection that follows a return after the separation of years. The old gentleman is well preserved. His locks may be scanty, but they are pleasingly combed. His eyes are bright and his step is firm. His hearing and his appetite are unimpaired. The shirt collar is perhaps not of the latest device, but its whiteness and its rigidity are irreproachable. His manners in conversation and at table are distinguished. He is always amiable. He does not interrupt; he never contradicts. He does not advance positive or extravagant opinions of his own. In fact he has no opinions, and his talk is enlivened by liberal quotations from the good fellows whom he knew in his youth, and by statements of scholars and philosophers who were of great repute when he put on man's estate. All are delighted at first. The elder members of the family revive old recollections. They commend their guest as an example to the youths of the household, who are inclined to be forward, opinionated, vehement in expression. The irreverent youngsters consider him to be a bore; they laugh in secret. They are tired of hearing him repeat tales told by Mendelssohn and Schumann. They are tempted to ask him if he never thought for himself. His very suavity irritates them. Even the elder members of the family after a week begin to think that he is too polite. So they leave him alone one evening by the fire and attend a lecture given by a Russian Nihilist named Peter Tschaikowsky. They hear many things that startle and shock them; yet they are at times fascinated in spite of themselves by the conviction and the passion of the revolutionist. On their return they find the old man awaiting them. His kindly talk seems slow. They yawn in his face. The next day the guest departs, unruffled, in fact with Chesterfieldian composure. Strange to say, they miss his never-failing courtesy, his gentle voice, his self-control. They forget speedily the noisy threats of the Russian; but they remember the wise conversation of Schumann and Mendelssohn as repeated pleasantly by good Mr. Reinecke. And the young people, who follow Tschaikowsky about with a curiosity that is nigh impertinence, begin to think that the Russian may be something of a poseur, and they appreciate in moderate degree the self-effacement of the quondam guest.

***

"By the side of the Blue Sea is a great and green oak tree, girt with a golden chain.

"Day and night, a marvelous and learned cat crawls around this oak.

"When he crawls to the right, he sings a song. When he crawls to the left, he tells a story.

"It is there that you must sit down and learn the understanding of Russian legends. * * * There the spirit of Russia and the fantasy of our ancestors come to life again."

***

So runs the beginning of the prologue of a story by Pouchkine. It is not improbable that he who wishes to enter fully into the spirit of Tschaikowsky must listen to the cat who dwells by the chain-girt oak which looks out on the water of the Blue Sea.

***

Although the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky was heard last week for the first time in this city, it is not a composition of this year. Its first performance was in St. Petersburg during the season of '88-'89 and March 5, 1889; it was played in New York under the direction of Theodore Thomas. It was played again in New York in 1890. Brooklyn and Chicago heard it that same year. It was played in Baltimore and Cincinnati in 1892.

***

This symphony is kept pretty well in traditional symphonic form, except that the first part of the first allegro is not repeated, and a waltz movement takes the place of the scherzo. Few are now inclined to regret the tendency to omit the orthodox repetition. Nearly a century ago Gretry, in speaking of the sonata form, put the following question: "What do you think of a man who cuts his speech in two and repeats twice each half? 'I was at your house this morning; yes, I was at your house this morning to consult you in a matter of business, to consult you in a matter of business.' Reprises in music affect me in this way. Let us not confound, however, useless repetitions with a charming phrase that occurs three or four times, or with the repetitions of a few measures of a delightful air. Just as one may say to his sweetheart ten times in the same visit 'I love you,' so one may repeat a phrase that is full of emotion. I spoke of the long repetition that forms the half of a musical discourse."

***

Tschaikowsky is a name not to be mentioned without a raising of the hat; and yet it is doubtful if this fifth symphony will add to his reputation or alone carry him to the consideration of posterity. It abounds in that which is known currently as Russian color. The themes are often Russian, whether they are derived from folk melodies, and through them from the plain song of the national church, or merely influenced by such associations. Furthermore, the presentation of the themes in harmonic and instrumental setting is characteristic of the members of the modern radical school of Russia. At the same time there is a skill in elaboration, seen particularly in the first movement, that is not often remarked in compositions by the colleagues of Tschaikowsky. This elaboration in the first movement becomes over-elaboration, and fatigue is induced thereby. The slow movement is of a more popular nature. If there is again a Slavic character, there is also proof of the strong influence of the melodious Italians. The sentiment of the opening solo approaches sentimentality, but the theme is undeniably effective and is treated with rare technical skill, as is the passionate second theme of the same movement. So pleased is Tschaikowsky with his invention that he insists on calling attention to it until the hearer begins to doubt the worth of that which at first charmed him. The waltz is free from vulgarity. It is indeed dainty, and the instrumentation is delicate and piquant without any suspicion of the bizarre. In strong contrast to the refinement of this movement is the hurly-burly of the finale. Such music is unworthy of the symphony or the serious opera. It might not be out of place in pantomimic scenes where the clown is pursued by an infuriated populace, and it would undoubtedly foment the rage of Howling Dervishes. In its dignity and in its madness, in its piquancy and in its passion, this symphony was played admirably by the orchestra.

Perhaps this symphony cannot be better described than by the words of Cesar Cui in his summing up of the merits and the faults of the Tschaikowsky of 1880. It will be seen at once that Cui uses freely the peculiar and traditional privilege of a sincere friend. "His orchestral music is distinguished by wealth of melody, development, harmony and instrumentation. These precious gifts are not always employed discreetly. He is, for instance, not fastidious enough in his choice of melodic ideas. One finds ordinary and even vulgar tunes jostling exquisite melodies. Depth and real vigor are sometimes missed. He delights in tripping and pleasing melodies; he is fond of danse-rhythms; or he is sentimental to the point of monotony. He is prolix in the development; on the other hand his themes are at times contrasted too abruptly. He has not learned the necessity of rigid self-inspection. Therefore his symphonic style degenerates sometimes into the merely dramatic and melodramic."

***

And yet much may be forgiven in the case of the man who sang in that great cantibile with throbbing accompaniment the time-and-space-defying passion of the lovers of Verona; and who invoked with unearthly strains the awful Majesty of Denmark.

***

There are other pianoforte concertos in the catalogue of Saint-Saens, but to the musician there is but one, the famous one in G minor. Yet there are passages in the C minor concerto that show the ingenuity of the composer, and the pianoforte is treated in a distinguished manner. As a work of the distinctively modern school, it requires a player of the modern school, a player with virtuoso blood in his veins. It is true that Mr. Stasny showed Saturday a marked improvement in his appreciation of rhythm and accentuation. He has more self-control than was seen in his performance early in November of last year. While his touch is still apparently dry and without genuine sympathy, he did not force the tone, and, in fact, he played throughout the concerto with care and with discretion.

But it seemed as though he interpreted the work in the conscientious spirit of a professor expounding to his class the structure of a sonata by Clementi. He was applauded loudly and he was twice recalled.

***

The programme of the concerts of next Friday and Saturday is as follows:

Suite, Dvorak; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt, and symphony in B flat, Gade.

Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 23, 1892.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Presents Two Musical Novelties.

Mr. Nikisch offered two compositions new to Boston at the symphony concert last evening at Music Hall, Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred," and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5 in E minor.

In addition to these numbers Mr. Carl Stasny was heard in Saint-Saens's concerto No. 4 in C minor.

The programme was particularly interesting from the element of novelty it contained, and entertaining probably as much from the excellent interpretation of the numbers as from their quality.

Reinecke's overture is a sober composition, opening with peculiar passages played by the brasses and wood-winds alternately, and well played they were, too, last evening, and ending with a tumultuous finale.

The difficult sustained measures in unison on the E strings by the violins were admirably executed, and were perhaps the most pronounced and original feature of the work.

Mr. Stasny was fully equal to the digital dexterity required for the performance of the Saint-Saens number, which bristles with ornamental work.

It was a brilliant performance, and the pianist gave the "tricksy" concerto with artistic color and dash.

Tschaikowsky's Slavonic symphony bears the stamp of strong, effective and, often to musical ears, harsh originality.

The whole composition is elaborately worked out, and departs somewhat from the prescribed symphonic form, a waltz movement replacing the scherzo form.

Contrasting themes are used, and many of the effects are dissonant and typical of Cossack fire and energy.

The work of the orchestra was very fine. The piccolos and clarinets fairly shrieked out the weird, allegro vivace, and the swinging waltz measures were delicately given by the strings.

The hall was filled, and the audience was quite enthusiastic.

The concert programme for Friday and Saturday will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen," Philip Scharwenka; song with orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt, and Gade's symphony in B flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

—At the second Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, although less fully attended on account of the holiday, there were a number of new season subscribers of the society contingent who were not in town for the opening performance. Among them were Mrs. Lindall Winthrop and daughter, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, Mr. Nathaniel W. Curtis, Miss Florence Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn, Miss Gertrude Rice, Mrs. George Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, the Misses Fairchild, and Mr. and Mrs. Eliott Pratt.

[22]

POST.
OF NEW ENGLAND.
...DAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1892.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The second Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, comprised Reinecke's overture to "King Manfred" for the first time in this city, Saint-Saens' concerto No. 4 in C minor for the pianoforte, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, the latter being also given for the first time in Boston.

The overture proved to be a delightful creation in that the leading theme is very attractive and is worked up with marked skill and effect. The type of the composition, while of the modern school, has more of the familiar characteristics of the older composers. Its rendering by the orchestra was in every way excellent, the number being specially adapted to the work of the organization and is a worthy addition to its repertory.

Mr. Carl Stasny was the soloist, and his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra may certainly be counted most successful. It is some years since this concerto of Saint-Saens has been heard in Boston, and it was therefore almost a novelty. The brilliant music was admirably interpreted with a skill and intelligence that won instant appreciation from the audience.

Mr. Stasny has a marvellous execution, a fine, sympathetic touch and a skill that should prove abundant for any composition.

The symphony in E minor by Tschaikowsky was received with much enthusiasm for a new production, and it is hoped that this attractive work may be heard more frequently this season. This talented composer combines many rare traits that show his musical skill as well as the power of affording much pleasure to the music-loving public. The theme is ambitious, but is handled gracefully and with excellent taste and judgment. The work of the orchestra in this number was especially fine. Next week Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, and the programme will include Dvorak's suite for the orchestra, Weber's aria from "Oberon," Philip Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen" (first time in Boston), Liszt's song with orchestra, "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B-flat major.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.
10-23
Date.....

—The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Chickering Hall on Nov. 3. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

—A students' concert of the New-York College of Music, 128 and 130 East Fifty-eighth Street, will be held Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock at the college hall. Mr. Alexander Lambert, the director, has arranged a very interesting programme.

—Miss Margaret Reid, whose contract with Messrs. Abbey & Grau was canceled on account of the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, has closed an engagement with L. M. Ruben for grand opera in Trieste.

—Signor Natale de Sperati, a young Italian tenor, has arrived in this city. Signor Sperati's special claim to consideration is his ability to sing high F.

—The Schmidt-Herbert String Quartet will give chamber music concerts at Music Hall on Fridays, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 16, and March 24.

—The Italian Orchestra will give a concert at the Lenox Lyceum to-night. The soloists will be Miss Ida Klein, soprano, and Victor Clodio, tenor.

—Mr. Frederic Dean's first lecture on the programmes of the New-York Symphony Society will be given at Music Hall on Nov. 10, at 11 A. M.

—"Puritania" has two weeks more to run at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. The company is a good one.

—Sousa's New Marine Band will give a concert at the Broadway Theatre next Sunday evening.

News, Providence R. I.
10-22

MUSIC NOTES.

The sale of season tickets for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been very large and ensures for the organization a series of brilliant audiences. The first concert will be given in Infantry Hall on next Wednesday evening. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Mr. Nikisch has arranged the following programme:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
Miss Juch.
Scherzo, "Queen Mab".....Berlioz
Song, with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor.....Schumann

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.
10-2
Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, whose fine performances have won for it hosts of admirers in this city, will give a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 30, December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 8. No events of the year possess greater interest for the musical public or attract audiences more representative of the best social elements of the community. The orchestra will number sixty-five players at each concert, and will be accompanied by the best available soloists. Miss Emma Juch, who has long been missed from the concert stage, will be the singer at the opening concert. The sale of season tickets for the reserved seats for the series of five concerts will open at 1221 Chestnut street on [23]

Boston Courier
MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Reinecke: Overture to "King Manfred."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor.
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.
Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

Carl Reinecke's overture proved itself to be one of those works which can easily stand in the first rank of Kapellmeister-Musik; indeed, it takes quite an enormous amount of musical knowledge to write anything so good. Naturally, when a man like Reinecke allows himself to write as nearly in the Schumann vein as he does here, he inevitably weakens the impression produced by his work—if only from the amount of water he puts into his (or Schumann's) wine being the more easily detected. But, Kapellmeister-Musik though it be, it is admirably well-written music; the themes are flowing and natural, if without especial distinction; the construction is stout and finely organized; some clever passages in the working-out just fall short of showing inspiration. Still, it must be owned that a commonplace man in the fine arts is, in general, a dangerous customer to count with; where native nobility of feeling is lacking, acquired elegance of expression is not always to be relied on. A composer who has not genius cannot invariably be trusted to have even artistic good taste. Reinecke could not let his overture go without one serious blemish; at one point he really allows himself to get worked up to red heat, and so lets himself do what second-rate men usually do when they dare to throw off self-consciousness—he becomes downright vulgar. In that glowing apotheosis of a sentimental second theme, near the close of his overture, he well cuts his Schumann and Mendelssohn moorings and drifts into the vein of Flotow's overture to "Martha." The orchestra played the overture (it was its first performance in Boston) splendidly.

Of the new Tschaikowsky symphony one hardly knows what to say. It is an immensely long and elaborate work, the first movement of which one might almost venture to describe as masterly. Nowhere else have we found Tschaikowsky so thoroughly imbued with the true spirit of symphonic writing as in this first movement, the only apparent blemish in which is that the coda adds nothing new either in style or essence, nothing that we have not already heard in the working-out. For elaboration, for the amount of solid work there is in it, this movement compares well with the first movement of the composer's B-flat minor concerto; but it is less untamed in spirit, less recklessly harsh in its polyphonic writing, less indicative of the composer's disposition to swear a theme's way through a stone wall. It is none the less evidently Slavic in spirit, however, and is brilliant as it is stoutly built and coherent. The slow movement we like less; the themes are melodious, if you will, but seem rather weak and merely Goldmarkian-sensuous; the working-out is tediously protracted, and the general impression tiresome. The waltz, which takes the place of the traditional scherzo (third movement), shows nothing in its intrinsic character nor workmanship to make good its claim to a place in a symphony. In the finale, we find Tschaikowsky at his old tricks again; here we have all the untamed fury of the Cossack whetting itself for deeds of atrocity against all the sterility of the Russian steppes. The furious peroration sounds like nothing so much as a horde of demons struggling in a torrent of brandy, the music growing drunker and drunker, until it gradually forgets what it is trying to do. Pandemonium, delirium tremens, raving, and above all, noise worse confounded! The instrumentation in the whole symphony is vigorous, but, as it struck us, tending too often toward coarseness. But the first movement is something to take off one's hat to.

Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto can hardly be placed upon a level with his second, in G minor; but it is, nevertheless, an admirably written, clear, human and delightful work. Its singular economy in thematic material never amounts to poverty; if it never show great depth of feeling, it gives evidence of no little poetic imaginativeness and beauty; the means employed are always adequate to the end striven after. It is a wonder of artistic savoir faire. Mr. Stasny played it creditably, with good self-reliance and energy, if without any especially striking display of brilliancy or warmth of sentiment. But his playing was simple, straightforward, and free from all unworthy trickery. He was warmly applauded at the end.

The next programme is: Dvorák, suite for orchestra; Weber, aria from "Oberon;" Philipp Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen;" Liszt, song with orchestra, "Die Loreley;" Gade, symphony in B-flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

Music Hall,
Boston, October 24, 1892.

As a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chorus at the performance of the Ninth Symphony in 1888, you are invited to become a member of the Chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

It is expected that the Chorus will appear at several Concerts in the regular series, and at two extra performances.

Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote, in Bumstead Hall, on Tuesday evenings, beginning punctually at 7.30, and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal.

The works to be studied are:—

Te Deum, - - - - - -	Bruckner.
Ninth Symphony, - - - -	Beethoven.
Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus, - - - - -	Brahms.
Schicksalslied, - - - - -	Brahms.
Faust Symphony for male chorus,	Liszt.
Vintage Chorus from Prometheus,	Liszt.

The last rehearsal before each Concert in which the Chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall, on Thursday evening, and will be with Orchestra and Soloists. Four tickets for this rehearsal will be given to each member of the Chorus.

It is my earnest desire that the choral and orchestral parts of the proposed performances shall be of the same standard of excellence, and I shall be very grateful for your assistance.

Kindly send your reply by enclosed postal card within three days, and oblige,

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, October 26, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5.00, and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster Street. . . .

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1892.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The second Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, comprised Reinecke's overture to "King Manfred" for the first time in this city, Saint-Saens' concerto No. 4 in C minor for the pianoforte, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, the latter being also given for the first time in Boston.

The overture proved to be a delightful treat in that the leading theme is very attractive and is worked up with marked skill and effect. The type of the composition, while of the modern school, has more of the familiar characteristics of the older composers. Its rendering by the orchestra was in every way excellent, the number being specially adapted to the work of the organization and is a worthy addition to its repertory.

Mr. Carl Stasny was the soloist, and his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra may certainly be counted most successful. It is some years since this concerto of Saint-Saens has been heard in Boston, and it was therefore almost a novelty. The brilliant music was admirably interpreted with a skill and intelligence that won instant appreciation from the audience.

Mr. Stasny has a marvellous execution, a fine, sympathetic touch and a skill that should prove abundant for any composition.

The symphony in E minor by Tschaikowsky was received with much enthusiasm for a new production, and it is hoped that this attractive work may be heard more frequently this season. This talented composer combines many rare traits that show his musical skill as well as the power of affording much pleasure to the music-loving public. The theme is ambitious, but is handled gracefully and with excellent taste and judgment. The work of the orchestra in this number was especially fine. Next week Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, and the programme will include Dvorak's suite for the orchestra, Weber's aria from "Oberon," Philip Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen" (first time in Boston), Liszt's song with orchestra, "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B-flat major.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date..... 10-23

—The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Chickering Hall on Nov. 3. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

—A students' concert of the New-York College of Music, 128 and 130 East Fifty-eighth Street, will be held Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock at the college hall. Mr. Alexander Lambert, the director, has arranged a very interesting programme.

—Miss Margaret Reid, whose contract with Messrs. Abbey & Grau was canceled on account of the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, has closed an engagement with L. M. Ruben for grand opera in Trieste.

—Signor Natale de Sperati, a young Italian tenor, has arrived in this city. Signor Sperati's special claim to consideration is his ability to sing high F.

—The Schmidt-Herbert String Quartet will give chamber music concerts at Music Hall on Fridays, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 16, and March 24.

—The Italian Orchestra will give a concert at the Lenox Lyceum to-night. The soloists will be Miss Ida Klein, soprano, and Victor Clodio, tenor.

—Mr. Frederic Dean's first lecture on the programmes of the New-York Symphony Society will be given at Music Hall on Nov. 10, at 11 A. M.

—"Puritania" has two weeks more to run at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. The company is a good one.

—Sousa's New Marine Band will give a concert at the Broadway Theatre next Sunday evening.

News, ...

.....10-22

MUSIC NOTES.

The sale of season tickets for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been very large and ensures for the organization a series of bril iant audiences. The first concert will be given in Infantry Hall on next Wednesday evening. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Mr. Nikisch has arranged the following program:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
Miss Juch.
Scherzo, "Queen Mab".....Berlioz
Song, with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor.....Schumann

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date..... 10-2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arth Nikisch, conductor, whose fine performanc have won for it hosts of admirers in this cit will give a series of five concerts at the Acaden of Music on Wednesday evenings, November December 7, January 11, February 8 and Marc 15. No events of the year possess greater inte est for the musical public or attract audience more representative of the best social elemen of the community. The orchestra will numbe eighty-five players at each concert, and will be accompanied by the best available soloists. Miss Emma Juch, who has long been missed from the concert stage, will be the singer at the opening concert. The sale of season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of five concerts will open at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday, October 24.

[23]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Reinecke: Overture to "King Manfred."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor.
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.
Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

Carl Reinecke's overture proved itself to be one of those works which can easily stand in the first rank of Kapellmeister-Musik; indeed, it takes quite an enormous amount of musical knowledge to write anything so good. Naturally, when a man like Reinecke allows himself to write as nearly in the Schumann vein as he does here, he inevitably weakens the impression produced by his work—if only from the amount of water he puts into his (or Schumann's) wine being the more easily detected. But, Kapellmeister-Musik though it be, it is admirably well-written music; the themes are flowing and natural, if without especial distinction; the construction is stout and finely organized; some clever passages in the working-out just fall short of showing inspiration. Still, it must be owned that a commonplace man in the fine arts is, in general, a dangerous customer to count with; where native nobility of feeling is lacking, acquired elegance of expression is not always to be relied on. A composer who has not genius cannot invariably be trusted to have even artistic good taste. Reinecke could not let his overture go without one serious blemish; at one point he really allows himself to get worked up to red heat, and so lets himself do what second-rate men usually do when they dare to throw off self-consciousness—he becomes downright vulgar. In that glowing apotheosis of a sentimental second theme, near the close of his overture, he well cuts his Schumann and Mendelssohn moorings and drifts into the vein of Flotow's overture to "Martha." The orchestra played the overture (it was its first performance in Boston) splendidly.

Of the new Tschaikowsky symphony one hardly knows what to say. It is an immensely long and elaborate work, the first movement of which one might almost venture to describe as masterly. Nowhere else have we found Tschaikowsky so thoroughly imbued with the true spirit of symphonic writing as in this first movement, the only apparent blemish in which is that the coda adds nothing new either in style or essence, nothing that we have not already heard in the working-out. For elaboration, for the amount of solid work there is in it, this movement compares well with the first movement of the composer's B-flat minor concerto; but it is less untamed in spirit, less recklessly harsh in its polyphonic writing, less indicative of the composer's disposition to swear a theme's way through a stone wall. It is none the less evidently Slavic in spirit, however, and is brilliant as it is stoutly built and coherent. The slow movement we like less; the themes are melodious, if you will, but seem rather weak and merely Goldmarkian-sensuous; the working-out is tediously protracted, and the general impression tiresome. The waltz, which takes the place of the traditional scherzo (third movement), shows nothing in its intrinsic character nor workmanship to make good its claim to a place in a symphony. In the finale, we find Tschaikowsky at his old tricks again; here we have all the untamed fury of the Cossack whetting itself for deeds of atrocity against all the sterility of the Russian steppes. The furious peroration sounds like nothing so much as a horde of demons struggling in a torrent of brandy, the music growing drunker and drunker, until it gradually forgets what it is trying to do. Pandemonium, delirium tremens, raving, and above all, noise worse confounded! The instrumentation in the whole symphony is vigorous, but, as it struck us, tending too often toward coarseness. But the first movement is something to take off one's hat to.

Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto can hardly be placed upon a level with his second, in G minor; but it is, nevertheless, an admirably written, clear, human and delightful work. Its singular economy in thematic material never amounts to poverty; if it never show great depth of feeling, it gives evidence of no little poetic imaginativeness and beauty; the means employed are always adequate to the end striven after. It is a wonder of artistic savoir faire. Mr. Stasny played it creditably, with good self-reliance and energy, if without any especially striking display of brilliancy or warmth of sentiment. But his playing was simple, straightforward, and free from all unworthy trickery. He was warmly applauded at the end.

The next programme is: Dvorák, suite for orchestra; Weber, aria from "Oberon;" Philipp Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen;" Liszt, song with orchestra, "Die Loreley;" Gade, symphony in B-flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

Music Hall,
Boston, October 24, 1892.

As a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chorus at the performance of the Ninth Symphony in 1888, you are invited to become a member of the Chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

It is expected that the Chorus will appear at several Concerts in the regular series, and at two extra performances.

Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote, in Bumstead Hall, on Tuesday evenings, beginning punctually at 7.30, and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal.

The works to be studied are:

Te Deum,	Bruckner.
Ninth Symphony,	Beethoven.
Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus,	Brahms.
Schicksalslied,	Brahms.
Faust Symphony for male chorus,	Liszt.
Vintage Chorus from Prometheus,	Liszt.

The last rehearsal before each Concert in which the Chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall, on Thursday evening, and will be with Orchestra and Soloists. Four tickets for this rehearsal will be given to each member of the Chorus.

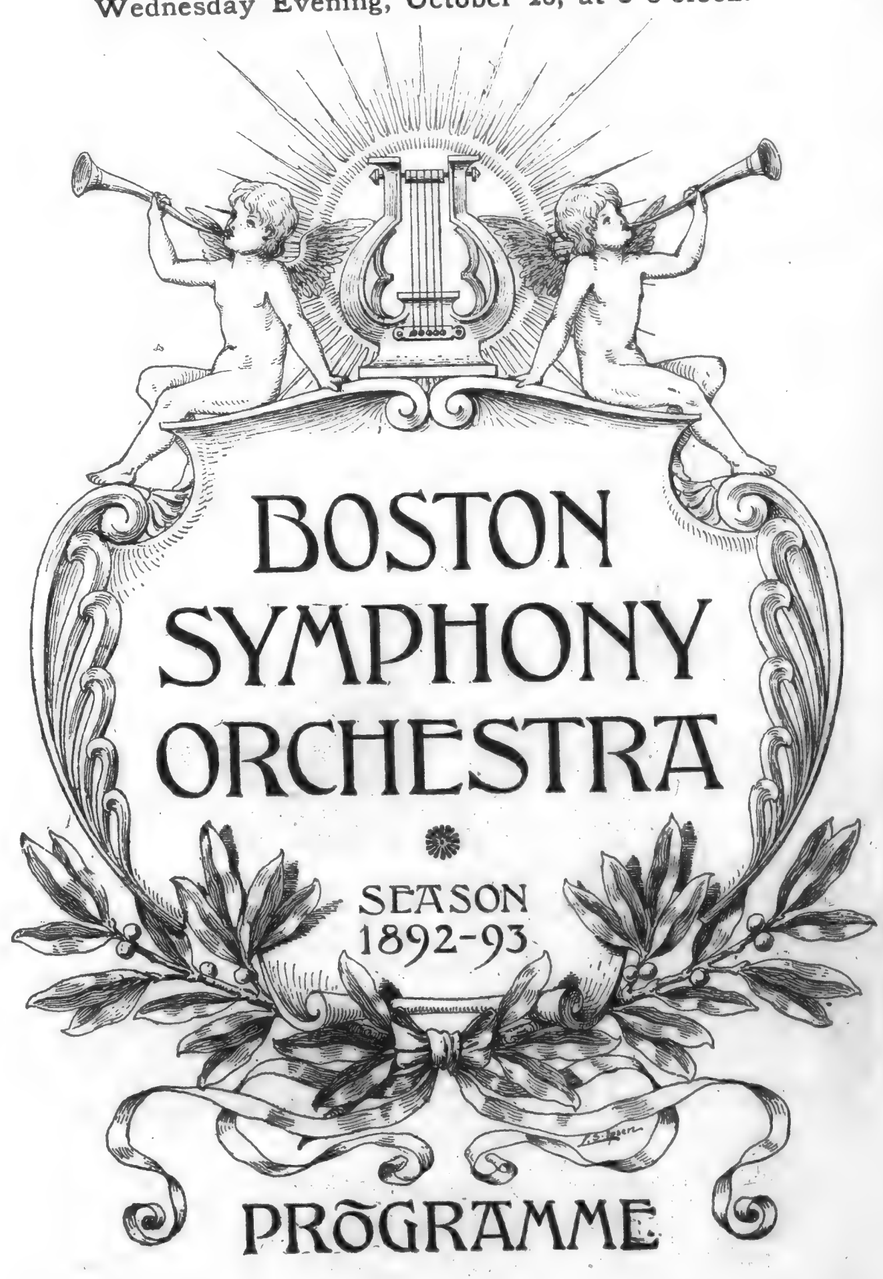
It is my earnest desire that the choral and orchestral parts of the proposed performances shall be of the same standard of excellence, and I shall be very grateful for your assistance.

Kindly send your reply by enclosed postal card within three days, and oblige,

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, October 26, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5.00, and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

The Telegram.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL, - - NIKISCH

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

Twelfth Season.

SIX GRAND CONCERTS

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

Miss Emma Juch

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5, now on sale at No. 170 Westminster street, O'Connor's Flower Store, opposite Boston Store. Single tickets on sale tomorrow, Monday.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Music.

EMMA JUCH.

Just four short and speeding days more and the people will be treading the well-worn ways leading toward Infantry hall with tickets for the Boston Sympony orchestra course in their pockets and on their faces glowing expectation written in every lineament of the rapture they are to feel during the succeeding hour or two. It is on Wednesday night that the orchestra will make the first of its six visits to Providence, and that the public will put all the warmth and heartiness possible into the welcome accorded to Conductor Nikisch and his force there is no reason to doubt.

As is always the provision for the convenience of patrons at these entertainments, books containing short explanatory stories of the music for each evening, prepared by one of Boston's most cultured critics, will be furnished gratuitously. This arrangement involves trouble and expense for the managers, but it is a source of great assistance to people who desire to know about the compositions the musicians are playing, more in detail than any conception can be formed from the style in which the selections are interpreted.

The celerity with which season tickets were purchased last week was something almost beyond anticipation. The first forenoon the demand was exceedingly sharp, and since the plat has been decorated with marks indicating the possession of seats on the part of scores of later buyers.

As to the programs, which will be sterling features of this winter's series, they will consist largely of works by the most popular of European composers new to this division of the world, works which were decided upon by Mr. Nikisch in his quest for fresh and palatable material for the diversion of his audiences. Some of these creations are beautiful specimens of magnificent musical idealizing, and with such a body of artists as this orchestra to perform them, they will be heard with soul ravishing pleasure.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 24, 1892.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. NIKISCH.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY

ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

FIVE PUBLIC REHEARSALS:

On FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, November 4, December 9, 1892; January 13, February 10 and March 17, 1893.

FIVE CONCERTS:

On SATURDAY EVENINGS, November 5, December 10, 1892; January 14, February 11 and March 18, 1893.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of five Public Rehearsals, $3, $4 and $5, according to location, and for the series of Five Concerts, $3, $5 and $6.50, according to location, now on sale at the office of the SOCIETY, at CHAS. D. KIDDER'S MUSIC

Clipping from Commonwealth
Boston, Mass.
Date 10-22

MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season has opened brilliantly and satisfactorily. Mr. Nikisch was heartily welcomed and the reception of his first programme was gratifying. It was a familiar programme—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and all the rest Wagner, the wonderful Kaiser-Marsch and the Prelude and 'Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolde.' These call for no comment. They were given as they have been given before; and if the change in the seating arrangement of the orchestra made any difference, it was discernible only by technically trained ears. This new seating brings all the heavy brass in the middle at the back with the double-basses divided, four on a side. It is thought that the blending of the wind tone is better by this arrangement. For the concert today, the programme is: Reinecke: overture to 'König Manfred;' Saint-Saëns pianoforte concerto No. 4, in C minor, op. 93; Tschaikowsky; symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. Mr. Carl Stasny will be the pianist.

The Kneisel Quartet is a benefactor of true music-lovers. For seven years past, this organization of artists has given Boston the privilege of hearing that which is highest and best in chamber music, played with exquisite perfection. The eighth season opened with the concert at Chickering Hall on Monday evening, at which were played Haydn's quartet in D major, a fragment, in C minor, by Schubert, and a sextet for strings by Dvorák, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schulz being added to the quartet as second viola and second 'cello respectively. These selections commend themselves, although none are entire novelties to these concerts, and the pleasure of listening to the finished and thoughtful performance of the artists of the Kneisel Quartet is always fresh. The second concert of this delightful series will be given on Monday evening, November 7.

News, Baltimore, Md.
Date 10-23

CONCERTS THAT ARE TO BE.

The Interest in the Coming Boston Symphony Orchestra—The Programme.

Unusual interest is felt in the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as it will probably be the only one this organization will be able to give in Baltimore this season, on account of the lack of a suitable hall. The sale of seats commences to-morrow morning at Albert's.

A very fine programme will be presented, including the goldmark overture to Sokuntala, Wagner, Vorspiel and Liebestod, from Triston and Iseide, and the Beethoven symphony in C minor. No. 5—Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, who will sing the Weber grand aria from Oberon, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and the Liszt song-poem, "The Loreley."

In Boston the premiums on this season's tickets exceeded those of any former year by more than $20,000.

The Kneisel Quartet Club will give its first concert at the Peabody on Tuesday afternoon, November 1, at 4 o'clock.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10-24

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Chickering Hall on Nov. 3d. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

Journal, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-23

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's unrivalled orchestra, the Boston Symphony, opened its home season a week ago yesterday. The orchestra was in splendid form, did splendid work, and was, as usual, enthusiastically received.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10-24

Carl Stansy, the pianist, was soloist at the Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Concert. It was a thorough satisfaction to the public.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1892.

The Symphony Program.—At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Chickering Hall, next Thursday week, the following program will be given, with Mrs. Emma Juch as soloist:

Overture, fantaisie, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
"Queen Mab Scherzo," from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great and well deserved success, both for the orchestra and the soloist, Mr. Carl Stasny, professor of piano at the New England Conservatory. Nikisch brought out two novelties for Boston—the overture to "King Manfred," by Reinecke, and the E minor (fifth) symphony of the great Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, which proved a huge success. But the chief feature of the concert was Mr. Carl Stasny, a pianist of first rank. In his performance he showed many good points—that the C minor concerto of Saint-Säens he played quite readily assumed great prominence in the evening's program, and the opportunity of a correct estimate of the concerto was easily gained in following his reading of the work. He is a singularly clear and intelligent interpreter of this brilliant French composer, and the artistic fashion in which he performed the piano score instantly arrested the attention and gave the player an audience in sympathy with his methods.

Mr. Stasny was recalled several times after the performance, and his success has been such a genuine one that we hope to hear him very often in this season.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10-25

Damariscotta is elated over the prospects of a musical festival on Oct. 26th in that ancient and historic town. Their grand tour de force will be in the first appearance there of that long-haired impressionist Mons. Alfred de Sève whose musical tourney, it is needless to say, will be a victory and whose resonant and tricksy bow will play strange and mystic fancies into the heads of them who sit under its spell. This gentleman is announced by the local Damariscotta papers as, "the leading violinist of America just on his way home from the Columbus celebration at Chicago." How they will love and admire him when he shakes that byronic forelock, brushes back the raven ringlets from his marble brow and all the time chases the elusive intonation of the E string as though it were a little bird in the wood. More than ever will they forget that there is a concertmeister of the Boston Symphony or that a Joachim lives in his native land. At this concert, Mme. Wyse-Fournier will sing; John P. Welch the Portland baritone will sing and Prof. Dennett of Lewiston will read.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, OCT. 27.

TO A PROVIDENCE AUDIENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins a Series of Concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. Oct. 26.—The first of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Infantry Hall this evening before an audience which filled the house. The programme was a most brilliant one, and the appearance of Conductor Nikisch was the signal for a burst of applause. The programme was as follows:

Overture-fantasy, Romeo and Juliet..Tschaikowsky
Andante non tanto quassi moderato (F-sharp minor), 4-4.
Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
Aria, Ocean! thou mighty monster, from Oberon. Weber
Miss Juch.
Queen Mab scherzo, from the symphony Romeo and Juliet.....Berlios
Song with orchestra, Loreley.....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schuman
I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
Lively (D minor), 2-4.
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
Trio the same tempo (B-flat major), 3-4.
IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
Lively (D major), 4-4.
Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 10-25

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, of next Friday and Saturday is as follows: Suite, Dvorak; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt, and symphony in B flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-28

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Five Concerts This Season.

The first of five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music during the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch will take place on Wednesday evening, November 2, when a programme comprising three instrumental and two vocal numbers will be rendered. The overture will be Weber's lovely prelude to "Oberon," the symphony that by Tschaikowsky in E minor No. 5, which has not yet been heard here, and in addition the orchestra will play the "Vorspiel and liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. She will sing Weber's aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting with orchestral accompaniments of the "Loreley" legend. The sale of season tickets will open on Monday morning at 1221 Chestnut street.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Emma Juch, Paderewski, and Other Famous Soloists Announced.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give a series of five concerts at Metzerott's Music Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7, and March 14. The visits of this superb orchestra have become a welcome and important feature of each musical season. For twelve years the organization has been maintained exclusively for concert purposes, and the interpretation of music of the highest class. Constant selection and improvement during this period have given it a membership which for the individual excellence of the players can hardly be equalled. The personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as last year. Daily rehearsals have been held since October 1, and when the date of the first concert arrives the band will be in the best possible form. It is impossible to give the complete programmes at this early date. Several interesting novelties are promised by Mr. Nikisch, and the usual number of of standard works, both of the old and modern school, will be given during the season. The best available soloists will appear, although the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction of these concerts. Miss Emma Juch, who has long been missed from the concert stage, will be the singer at the first concert. The management has been fortunate in securing for a later concert M. Paderewski, whose only appearance in this city will be with the Boston Orchestra. The sale of season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of five concerts will open at Metzerott's music store on Monday, October 24.

Sunday Herald
Oct 16 [illegible]

[24]

The Telegram.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL, - - NIKISCH

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

Twelfth Season.

SIX GRAND CONCERTS

On WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 26, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 1 and April 5.

Miss Emma Juch

and other distinguished soloists will appear.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5, now on sale at No. 170 Westminster street, O'Connor's Flower Store, opposite Boston Store. Single tickets on sale tomorrow, Monday. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Music.

EMMA JUCH.

Just four short and speeding days more and the people will be treading the well-worn ways leading toward Infantry hall with tickets for the Boston Sympony orchestra course in their pockets and on their faces glowing expectation written in every lineament of the rapture they are to feel during the succeeding hour or two. It is on Wednesday night that the orchestra will make the first of its six visits to Providence, and that the public will put all the warmth and heartiness possible into the welcome accorded to Conductor Nikisch and his force there is no reason to doubt.

As is always the provision for the convenience of patrons at these entertainments, books containing short explanatory stories of the music for each evening, prepared by one of Boston's most cultured critics, will be furnished gratuitously. This arrangement involves trouble and expense for the managers, but it is a source of great assistance to people who desire to know about the compositions the musicians are playing, more in detail than any conception can be formed from the style in which the selections are interpreted.

The celerity with which season tickets were purchased last week was something almost beyond anticipation. The first forenoon the demand was exceedingly sharp, and since the plat has been decorated with marks indicating the possession of seats on the part of scores of later buyers.

As to the programs, which will be sterling features of this winter's series, they will consist largely of works by the most popular of European composers new to this division of the world, works which were decided upon by Mr. Nikisch in his quest for fresh and palatable material for the diversion of his audiences. Some of these creations are beautiful specimens of magnificent musical idealizing, and with such a body of artists as this orchestra to perform them, they will be heard with soul ravishing pleasure.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 24, 1892.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. NIKISCH.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(90 PERFORMERS.)

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

FIVE PUBLIC REHEARSALS:

On FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, November 4, December 9, 1892; January 13, February 10 and March 17, 1893.

FIVE CONCERTS:

On SATURDAY EVENINGS, November 5, December 10, 1892; January 14, February 11 and March 18, 1893.

MISS EMMA JUCH

and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of Five Public Rehearsals, $3, $4 and $5, according to location, and for the series of Five Concerts, $3, $5 and $6.50, according to location, now on sale at the office of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, at CHANDLER'S MUSIC STORE, 300 Fulton st.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Clipping from Commonwealth Boston, Mass.

Date 10-22

MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season has opened brilliantly and satisfactorily. Mr. Nikisch was heartily welcomed and the reception of his first programme was gratifying. It was a familiar programme—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and all the rest Wagner, the wonderful Kaiser-Marsch and the Prelude and 'Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolde.' These call for no comment. They were given as they have been given before; and if the change in the seating arrangement of the orchestra made any difference, it was discernible only by technically trained ears. This new seating brings all the heavy brass in the middle at the back with the double-basses divided, four on a side. It is thought that the blending of the wind tone is better by this arrangement. For the concert today, the programme is: Reinecke: overture to 'König Manfred;' Saint-Saëns: pianoforte concerto No. 4, in C minor, op. 93; Tschaikowsky; symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. Mr. Carl Stasny will be the pianist.

The Kneisel Quartet is a benefactor of true music-lovers. For seven years past, this organization of artists has given Boston the privilege of hearing that which is highest and best in chamber music, played with exquisite perfection. The eighth season opened with the concert at Chickering Hall on Monday evening, at which were played Haydn's quartet in D major, a fragment, in C minor, by Schubert, and a sextet for strings by Dvorák, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schulz being added to the quartet as second viola and second 'cello respectively. These selections commend themselves, although none are entire novelties to these concerts, and the pleasure of listening to the finished and thoughtful performance of the artists of the Kneisel Quartet is always fresh. The second concert of this delightful series will be given on Monday evening, November 7.

Name Baltimore Md.

Date 10 23

CONCERTS THAT ARE TO BE.

The Interest in the Coming Boston Symphony Orchestra—The Programme.

Unusual interest is felt in the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as it will probably be the only one this organization will be able to give in Baltimore this season, on account of the lack of a suitable hall. The sale of seats commences to-morrow morning at Albert's.

A very fine programme will be presented, including the goldmark overture to Sokuntala, Wagner, Vorspiel and Liebestod, from Triston and Isolde, and the Beethoven symphony in C minor. No. 5—Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, who will sing the Weber grand aria from Oberon, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and the Liszt song-poem, "The Loreley."

In Boston the premiums on this season's tickets exceeded those of any former year by more than $20,000.

The Kneisel Quartet Club will give its first concert at the Peabody on Tuesday afternoon, November 1, at 4 o'clock.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me. 10 2

Date

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Chickering Hall on Nov. 3d. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

Journal, New York, N.Y 10 23

Date

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's unrivalled orchestra, the Boston Symphony, opened its home season a week ago yesterday. The orchestra was in splendid form, did splendid work, and was, as usual, enthusiastically received.

* * *

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me. 10-24

Date

Carl Stansy, the pianist, was soloist at the Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Concert. It was a thorough satisfaction to the public.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1892.

The Symphony Program.—At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Chickering Hall, next Thursday week, the following program will be given, with Mrs. Emma Juch as soloist:

Overture, fantaisie, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
"Queen Mab Scherzo," from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a great and well deserved success, both for the orchestra and the soloist, Mr. Carl Stasny, professor of piano at the New England Conservatory. Nikisch brought out two novelties for Boston—the overture to "King Manfred," by Reinecke, and the E minor (fifth) symphony of the great Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, which proved a huge success. But the chief feature of the concert was Mr. Carl Stasny, a pianist of first rank. In his performance he showed many good points—that the C minor concerto of Saint-Säens he played quite readily assumed great prominence in the evening's program, and the opportunity of a correct estimate of the concerto was easily gained in following his reading of the work. He is a singularly clear and intelligent interpreter of this brilliant French composer, and the artistic fashion in which he performed the piano score instantly arrested the attention and gave the player an audience in sympathy with his methods.

Mr. Stasny was recalled several times after the performance, and his success has been such a genuine one that we hope to hear him very often in this season.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me. 10 25

Date

Damariscotta is elated over the prospect of a musical festival on Oct. 26th in that ancient and historic town. Their grand tour de force will be in the first appearance there of that long-haired impressionist Mons. Alfred de Sève whose musical tourney, it is needless to say, will be a victory and whose resonant and tricksy bow will play strange and mystic fancies into the heads of them who sit under its spell. This gentleman is announced by the local Damariscotta papers as, "the leading violinist of America just on his way home from the Columbus celebration at Chicago." How they will love and admire him when he shakes that byronic forelock, brushes back the raven ringlets from his marble brow and all the time chases the elusive intonation of the E string as though it were a little bird in the wood. More than ever will they forget that there is a concertmeister of the Boston Symphony or that a Joachim lives in his native land. At this concert, Mme. Wyse-Fournier will sing; John P. Welch the Portland baritone will sing and Prof. Dennett of Lewiston will read.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, OCT. 27.

TO A PROVIDENCE AUDIENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins a Series of Concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. Oct. 26.—The first of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Infantry Hall this evening before an audience which filled the house. The programme was a most brilliant one, and the appearance of Conductor Nikisch was the signal for a burst of applause. The programme was as follows:

Overture-fantasy, Romeo and Juliet..Tschaikowsky
Andante non tanto quassi moderato (F-sharp minor), 4-4.
Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
Aria, Ocean! thou mighty monster, from Oberon. Weber
Miss Juch.
Queen Mab scherzo, from the symphony Romeo and Juliet.....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, Loreley.....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schuman
I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
Lively (D minor), 2-4.
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
Trio the same tempo (B-flat major), 3-4.
IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
Lively (D major), 4-4.
Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 10-25

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, of next Friday and Saturday is as follows: Suite, Dvorak; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt, and symphony in B flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 10 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Five Concerts This Season.

The first of five concerts to be given at the Academy of Music during the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch will take place on Wednesday evening, November 2, when a programme comprising three instrumental and two vocal numbers will be rendered. The overture will be Weber's lovely prelude to "Oberon," the symphony that by Tschaikowsky in E minor No. 5, which has not yet been heard here, and in addition the orchestra will play the "Vorspiel and liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. She will sing Weber's aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting with orchestral accompaniments of the "Loreley" legend. The sale of season tickets will open on Monday morning at 1221 Chestnut street.

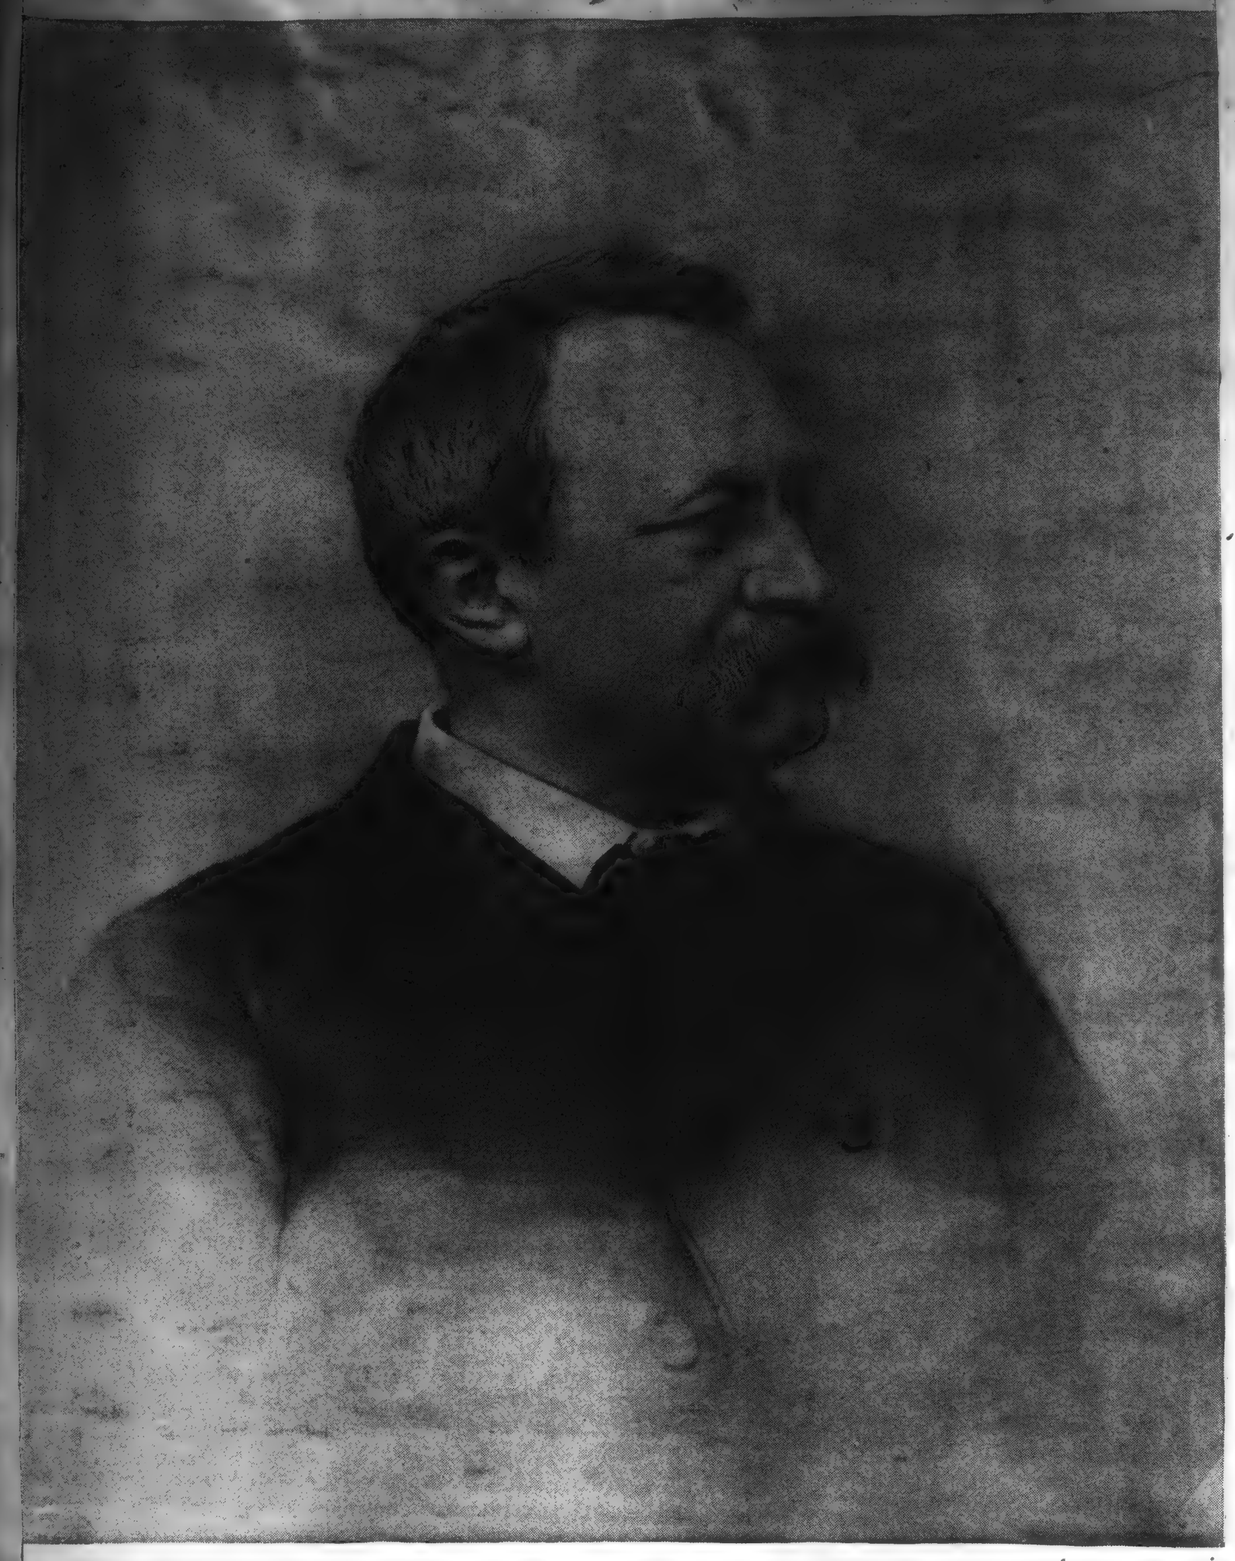
THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Emma Juch, Paderewski, and Other Famous Soloists Announced.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give a series of five concerts at Metzerott's Music Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7, and March 14. The visits of this superb orchestra have become a welcome and important feature of each musical season. For twelve years the organization has been maintained exclusively for concert purposes, and the interpretation of music of the highest class. Constant selection and improvement during this period have given it a a membership which for the individual excellence of the players can hardly be equalled. The personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as last year. Daily rehearsals have been held since October 1, and when the date of the first concert arrives the band will be in the best possible form. It is impossible to give the complete programmes at this early date. Several interesting novelties are promised by Mr. Nikisch, and the usual number of of standard works, both of the old and modern school, will be given during the season. The best available soloists will appear, although the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction of these concerts. Miss Emma Juch, who has long been missed from the concert stage, will be the singer a the first concert. The management has been fortunate in securing for a later concert M. Paderewski, whose only appearance in this city will be with the Boston Orchestra. The sale of season tickets covering reserved seats for the series of five concerts will open at Metzerott's music store on Monday, October 24.

Sunday Herald Oct 16 Washington

[24]



THEODORE THOMAS, MUSICAL DIRECTOR, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION, CHICAGO.

MISS HARRIET MONROE, AUTHOR OF THE DEDICATORY ODE.

MRS. LE MOYNE,

READER OF THE ODE.

WILLIAM L. TOMLIN, CHORAL DIRECTOR, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

JOHN K. PAINE, COMPOSER OF THE MARCH AND HYMN, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

THEODORE THOMAS, MUSICAL DIRECTOR, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION, CHICAGO.

WILLIAM L. TOMLIN, CHORAL DIRECTOR, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

MISS HARRIET MONROE, AUTHOR OF THE DEDICATORY ODE.

MRS. LE MOYNE,

READER OF THE ODE.

JOHN K. PAINE, COMPOSER OF THE MARCH AND HYMN, COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

The Beacon.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

THE FIRST OF THE SERIES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has a Very Large Audience.

Miss Juch, as the Soloist, Given a Very Hearty Greeting.

The dedication of the series of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts scheduled for the season in Providence was an occasion which accumulated in Infantry hall last night a throng of people, representing the highest tone and intelligence of the city. An audience finer in appearance or quality has never been mustered in the old amusement chamber. But few places on the settees were vacant, and it is believed that these will be filled at the next concert.

The orchestral program was as follows:

Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet,"
.....Tschaikowsky.
Andante non tanto quassi moderato (F-sharp minor).
Allegro guisto (B minor).
Moderato assai (B major).
"Queen Mab," scherzo, from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet."
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann.
I. Rather slow (D minor).
Lively (D minor).
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorion mode).
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor).
Trio: The same tempo (B flat major).
IV. Slow (D minor).
Lively (D major).

Conductor Nikisch could hardly have offered a group of selections more happily suited for the delectation of a gathering of the intellectual characteristics of this one. Which work was productive of the greatest enjoyment, it would tax the analytical skill of a connoisseur to say, and then his opinion might be at variance with that of the multitude. In the scherzo, by Berlioz, the music was bewitchingly filmy and delicate, and almost fragile in its daintiness and easiness. The composer sought to delineate, so far as notes will permit, the passage of Mab in her wee chariot, drawn by infinitesimal steeds, over such uneven routes as the human countenance, and it may be calculated how deftly he needed to shape his creation that it should aptly and truly suggest the curious theme he has chosen to enlarge upon. The style in which the whole piece was performed was beyond the widest expansion of the most critical flaw-picking. Nikisch seemed to have every instrument in the band at the end of his fingers, so instantly was the response to each succeeding gesture and so complete, concurrent and harmonious was the tone effect resulting. The violins did some deliciously fanciful dancing up and down the scales, and one of the trombones was made to emit a run of lively sounds which showed the player on that horn to be a remarkable artist.

The "Romeo-Juliet" overture was given magnificently and all of its changing measures exhibited in their bright and original beauty. Shumann's symphony, with its many soul touching minor melodies and its exhilarating close, gave rich pleasure to the assemblage.

Emma Juch, as the evening's soloist, sang the aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from the opera, "Oberon," by Weber, and imparted to her interpretation a color and sentiment none but so trained a songstress could have done. At the conclusion of her second solo, "Lovely," by Liszt, she was encored, the audience almost raising blisters on its hands in the effort to give its exuberance expression. In response the always sweet and taking violet song was rendered, Mr. Nikisch acting as accompanist for the two selections.

The second concert will take place Wednesday night, Nov. 16.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening of the Season by the Famous Boston Orchestra with Miss Emma Juch as Soloist.

The series of concerts given in this city every winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra fill the same prominent place in our musical season which they have long occupied at home. This is conclusively shown by the marked increase in the attendance during the past two or three years, which has now reached a point that is at once creditable to the musical intelligence of the city and remunerative to the superb organization to which we are indebted for so many interesting and educational programmes. If, as many claim, the highest development of music comes through its instrumental forms, their adequate presentation by a thoroughly equipped orchestra is essential to an intelligent understanding of the meaning of the message the world's great tone-masters have striven to convey. It goes without saying that nothing more perfect of the kind could be asked for than is to be found in the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony, and it is equally certain that the world to-day possesses few conductors who equal Mr. Nikisch in the sure and easy control of his forces and the unerring insight and refined taste of his readings.

The programme given last night was one of more than ordinary interest. It began with Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," a work which, while not falling strictly within the lines of what is known as "programme music," is dominated in its progression and treatment by the varying sentiment of the tragedy. In works of this class much must necessarily be left to the imagination. To one who had never read Shakspeare's play, the music would carry nothing of suggestion save that of its own intrinsic musical beauty. But, possessing the key, it is easy to follow the varying emotions aroused by the progress of the story, and certain well-known musical devices serve to sufficiently indicate the character who for the moment "holds the stage." Tschaikowsky is one of the most brilliant of the Slavic school of composers. His originality is no less marked than his power of contrast and fertility of resource in orchestral writing. Like Rubinstein and Grieg, he occasionally betrays a fondness for wood-wind combinations of doubtful utility, and frequent use of the muted strings for purposes of accompaniment, but succeeds generally in avoiding the colorless heaviness of the one and the bizarre extravagance of the other. This "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy contains three effectively contrasted movements, in which are to be found a wealth of original melody, a skill in combination and "working out" and a power of climax which prove it at once the work of a master hand. It is hardly necessary to add that it received a thoroughly satisfactory interpretation.

The vocalist of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, who gave for her first selection the aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon." Miss Juch brought to the performance of this dramatic and difficult scena the same vocal skill and thorough musical taste which she usually manifests, and scored another success, despite the fact that the music demands a voice of the largest calibre. Through some misunderstanding, the orchestral parts for her second song, Liszt's "Loreley," were not at hand, and she was compelled to sing it to accompaniment of piano. The audience did not seem to find anything lacking, and rewarded her most excellent singing with a triple recall, to which she replied with Mozart's charming song "The Violet." Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments in the finished style for which he has become famous.

The orchestra's second number was the "Queen Mab" scherzo, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, a sort of thing which probably nobody but Berlioz could have written. It was aptly described in the annotated programme as "cobweb" music. Nothing could well be imagined more full of elfin witchery as suggested by cunningly devised orchestration. It is also of immense technical difficulty, a fact which probably escaped most of the listeners, as the ease and certainty with which it was played gave no outward indication that anything unusual was going on. The concert closed with Schumann's symphony, No. 4, in D-minor. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the relative value of Schumann's orchestral works, there can be no doubt that in this symphony he displays more clearly than in any of the others his peculiar and original genius. It is less formal, and contains more of the romantic flavor of his piano works and songs, notably in the trio of the third movement. The work as a whole is somewhat fragmentary for the true symphony form, but abounds in melody and skillful contrast of rhythm and color. The old but effective device of returning to the theme of the first movement for the finale is employed, with heightened effect by the change from minor to major. A strong and sympathetic rendering of the whole work was given, and so ended a concert thoroughly enjoyable from beginning to end. The orchestra's next appearance here will be on the evening of November 16.

THE PROVIDENCE [illegible]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

For the third season Mr. Nikish made his bow to a PROVIDENCE audience at Infantry Hall last evening, and, certainly there can be no doubt as to the welcome and appreciation with which he and his orchestra were received. Unlike most conductors Mr. Nikish has the delightful faculty of keeping himself in the background while maintaining a subtle but firm hold over his players. Musical conductors, like poets, are born, not made. "Romance" was the prevailing "color scheme" of the program last evening, the first number being the harmoniously discordant Overture Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, while this composition is interesting from a professional standpoint, its lack of melody and peculiar phrasings must prove "caviare to the general." Tschaikowsky certainly shows perfect familiarity with the modern orchestral instruments as was markedly demonstrated by his handling of the wood-wind in the final movements.

How deliciously entrancing was Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, so weirdly elfish was it, one could fancy oneself witnessing a midnight revel of Titania and her elves. The tremendous technical difficulties of this work are such that it is rarely heard, few orchestras daring to attempt it, but under Mr. Nikish's skilful baton it was hard to realize that such difficulties existed. Mendelssohn in his incidental music for "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" uses this same text, and might it not be a pleasing experiment to hear them both in one program? Certainly nothing would better illustrate the enormous strides which have been made in the possibilities of the orchestra.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, which was the final number on the program, was really his second, and opens with a somewhat melancholy theme for violas and 'cellos and after a brief development the allegro enters with a theme used with masterly effect, despite its unmelodious nature. There is a second theme, more pleasing in style, although the first dominates this movement. The second movement is treated in the style of a free fantasie, in which respect it is a wide departure from the established forms. The Romanza opens with a simple plaintive and exquisitely refined melody given out by the oboes and 'cellos with the strings pizzicato which was delightfully rendered, as was also the trio, in the Scherzo, which was soft and dreamy. In the final movement he shows one of his characteristic whimsicalities known as "Schumann's short measures." Mr. Nikish in his reading of the symphony took a slower tempo than is customary, and thereby greatly added to the effect of the different movements.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist of the evening and probably no one could have been selected who is more of a favorite with PROVIDENCE audiences. Miss Juch was in fine form last night and sang the grand aria from Weber's "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," with a dramatic fire and abandon which was delightful. She seemed at times somewhat overweighted by the quantity of the full orchestral accompaniment.

By accident or design the "Loreley," Liszt, was sung without the orchestra, Mr. Nikish presiding at the piano. The audience was apparently unconscious of any shortcomings and in response to an enthusiastic encore, Miss Juch responded by singing "The Violet," by Mozart. One of Miss Juch's many charms is her distinct enunciation as was demonstrated by this and the preceding number. The next concert will be Nov. 16.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 29, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second Symphony concert was of agreeable brevity and considerable interest, offering, as it did, two compositions and one artist new to these series. There was something in each of the new works for criticism to pass upon, more particularly in regard to matters of form and taste, but the evening's provision was still enjoyable and wholesome. Reinecke's overture to his opera, "King Manfred," which was first played, belongs to a good standard class, and Mr. Apthorp's note really accords it real praise in saying that it has "made good its claim to a respectable place,"—for a deal of music which one has to hear nowadays is not entitled to respect, for all the amazement, excitement and perturbation which it causes and the ingenious elaboration of its demonstrations. There are two phases in it—a gloomy and dramatic introduction (which suggested to us rather the influence of Weber in the "Freischü z" than that of Schumann, which others seemed to feel) and a gay and brilliant subsequent theme, wrought out in customary fashion, but with no lack of spirit and suggesting a stirring and showy drama. The other novelty was Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony, in E-minor. That this man is bent upon being himself, thinking his own thoughts and enforcing them in his own way, is surely not so reprehensible as it seems to some of his critics, who censure him for his occasional carelessness, roughness, unconventionality and rudeness. Can we scratch even a musical Russian without touching upon some flowing vein of Tartar blood? And if we could extract those coarser and less tractable drops, might we not withdraw the very essence of strong and ardent individuality? In Tschaikowsky's music one feels by turns the influence of the wild wastes, the massive nature, the loneliness, the gloom and the brooding space or the wild, erratic determination of humanity to bear up and rebel against impassive constraint and to be reckless, defiant and even immensely jubilant in the face of them. His pages may tempt the pencil of the reviser and provoke the strictures of the critic of form and proportion—perhaps even merit the censure of the stickler for musical good manners; but they represent strong personality and purpose and they cannot be heard by unmoved listeners. The first movement of this symphony begins sombrely and distantly in the brooding wooden wind, and as it grows into form there enters its structure one of those dull, scarcely heard, beating rhythms which suggest the fatality that seems elemental in all vast solitary lands. There is some sweet singing by the 'cello and frequently the mysterious voice of the bassoon is heard in undercurrents. The andante is based upon two characteristic and appealing themes, which are expressly assigned to the most touching instruments; this movement, like the first, dies away gradually into silence. The third movement is of unusual character, for it is cast into the form of a waltz—a sufficiently strong and well-knit one to command attention, yet hardly consistent with the stability and dignity of the place it occupies. The finale, less solid and worthy of attention in its thematic material than the first and second movements, is full of abandon, fire and demonstrativeness, emphasizing its periods with great vehemence, and stirring the listener up almost to enthusiasm of response. Between these works was placed Saint-Saëns's fourth pianoforte concerto, the solo part of which was played with commendable fluency and correctness by Mr. Carl Stasny of the N. E. Conservatory of Music, but without brilliancy or earnestness of manner, and not always with sufficient solidity and strength of tone to fill the hall. Mr. Nikisch conducted carefully and with regard to the differing dramatic qualities of the overture and symphony, and the orchestra was in good trim.

Tonight's programme includes Gade's B-flat major symphony, a Dvoràk suite, and a symphonic poem, called "Frülergswogen," new to Boston, by Philipp Scharwenka. Miss Juch has been engaged as the soloist, and will sing (with orchestra) Liszt's "Loreley" and a scene from "Oberon."

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 26. Okt. 1892.

Academy of Music. Nikisch.

Boston Symphonie Orchester — 85 Instrumente.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Dirigent.

Fünf große Konzerte.

Am Mittwoch Abend, den 2. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8. Februar und 15. März.

Miß Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden als Solisten auftreten. Saison-Tickets einschließlich reservirten Sitzen für die Serie von fünf Konzerten für $3.50, $5 und $7, je nach der Lage.

Der Verkauf der Saison-Tickets beginnt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str., Montag Morgen, den 24. Okt.

217okt C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Diese berühmte Organisation unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch wird in diesem Winter hier in der Academy of Music fünf große Konzerte veranstalten und zwar am 2. November, 5. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8. Februar und 15. März. Es ist nicht erst nöthig auf die Vorzüglichkeit der Leistungen des berühmten Orchesters einzugehen. Frl. Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden während des Winters als Solisten in den Konzerten mitwirken. Am nächsten Montage beginnt der Verkauf der Tickets für die Saison von 5 Konzerten bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

The Hebrew Journal

124 EAST 14th STREET,

ORK, OCTOBER 28, 1892.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert this season occurs at Chickering Hall next Thursday evening. The programme comprises Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" and Liszt's "Loreley."

JACQUES MAYER.

Telegram, New York, N.Y.

10-25

Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will [redacted] five public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, November 4, December 9, January 13, February 10 and March 17, and five concerts on Saturday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 11 and March 18 at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. Miss Emma Juch, Xaver Scharwenka and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

The announcement of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be read with interest by thousands of admirers of the organization in this city, where they have become an important and welcome feature of each musical season. Five concerts are to be given at Metzerott's Music Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7, and March 14. The orchestra will number seventy-five performers at each concert. Its membership is practically the same as last year. Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where out few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of its players and the completeness of its equipment the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. The programmes for the coming concerts will be chosen with great care. Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Washington programmes such of these as prove most worthy and attractive. The usual number of standard works, both of the old and of the modern school, will, of course, have a hearing. While the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction of these concerts, the management has endeavored to secure the greatest solo artists available. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer on November 1. A very notable engagement for one of the later concerts is that of Mr. Paderewski, the great piano virtuoso, who will be heard for the only time in this city in these concerts. The sale of season tickets, covering reserved seats for the series of five concerts, will open at Metzerott's music store on Monday, October 24.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in town on Friday arranging for the coming series of concerts by the orchestra. The seats for the home concerts were all sold on the first days of the sale, the first choice going by auction for $380, so that the seats bought by the successful bidder cost him $304 each, or over $16 a concert. The next choice went at $150. The high price paid for first choice was caused by the rivalry of two gentlemen, each determined to have certain choice seats. It must be remembered, also, that the price was not for concert tickets, but to be first in one of Boston's great social functions, the Friday afternoon symphonies. The personnel of the orchestra is nearly the same as last year. Mr. Novacek, the first viola, goes with Damrosch, and Mr. Svecenski, first violin, who has played at the second desk with Adamowski, but who has always played viola with the Kneisel Quartet, takes his place. The vacancy in the first violins is filled by Mr. Schultyler, formerly with Mr. Ryan in the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. The orchestra will give only one concert in Baltimore during the season, owing to the lack of a suitable place. They were fortunate enough to find one open date at Ford's. The new music hall is promised for the season of 1893-'94.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcements made last week have awakened great interest in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and there are many indications that the coming series will be more successful than any past series has been. The organization began its season in Boston a week ago under the most favorable auspices, the usual record of recent years, every seat sold for the entire season, having been made. All accounts agree that the orchestra was never in better condition. Five concerts will be given in this city at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8, and March 15. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert. The pregamme in full is as follows:—

OVERTURE, "Oberon".....Weber
ARIA, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
VORSPIEL und LIEBESTOD, from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
SONG with ORCHESTRA, "Loreley".....Liszt
SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
(First time.)

The sale of season tickets with reserved seats for the series of five concerts opens to-morrow morning at 1221 Chestnut Street.

[26]

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

THE FIRST OF THE SERIES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has a Very Large Audience.

Miss Juch, as the Soloist, Given a Very Hearty Greeting.

The dedication of the series of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts scheduled for the season in Providence was an occasion which accumulated in Infantry hall last night a throng of people, representing the highest tone and intelligence of the city. An audience finer in appearance or quality has never been mustered in the old amusement chamber. But few places on the settees were vacant, and it is believed that these will be filled at the next concert.

The orchestral program was as follows:

Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet,"
.....Tschaikowsky.
Andante non tanto quassi moderato (F-sharp minor).
Allegro guisto (B minor).
Moderato assai (B major).
"Queen Mab," scherzo, from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet."
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann.
I. Rather slow (D minor).
Lively (D minor).
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorion mode).
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor).
Trio: The same tempo (B flat major).
IV. Slow (D minor).
Lively (D major).

Conductor Nikisch could hardly have offered a group of selections more happily suited for the delectation of a gathering of the intellectual characteristics of this one. Which work was productive of the greatest enjoyment, it would tax the analytical skill of a connoisseur to say, and then his opinion might be at variance with that of the multitude. In the scherzo, by Berlioz, the music was bewitchingly filmy and delicate, and almost fragile in its daintiness and easiness. The composer sought to delineate, so far as notes will permit, the passage of Mab in her wee chariot, drawn by infinitesimal steeds, over such uneven routes as the human countenance, and it may be calculated how deftly he needed to shape his creation that it should aptly and truly suggest the curious theme he has chosen to enlarge upon. The style in which the whole piece was performed was beyond the widest expansion of the most critical flaw-picking. Nikisch seemed to have every instrument in the band at the end of his fingers, so instantly was the response to each succeeding gesture and so complete, concurrent and harmonious was the tone effect resulting. The violins did some deliciously fanciful dancing up and down the scales, and one of the trombones was made to emit a run of lively sounds which showed the player on that horn to be a remarkable artist.

The "Romeo-Juliet" overture was given magnificently and all of its changing measures exhibited in their bright and original beauty. Shumann's symphony, with its many soul touching minor melodies and its exhilarating close, gave rich pleasure to the assemblage.

Emma Juch, as the evening's soloist, sang the aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from the opera, "Oberon," by Weber, and imparted to her interpretation a color and sentiment none but so trained a songstress could have done. At the conclusion of her second solo, "Lovely," by Liszt, she was encored, the audience almost raising blisters on its hands in the effort to give its exuberance expression. In response the always sweet and taking violet song was rendered, Mr. Nikisch acting as accompanist for the two selections.

The second concert will take place Wednesday night, Nov. 16.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 26. Okt. 1892.

Academy of Music. Nikisch.

Boston Boston Symphonie Orchester 85 Instrumente.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Dirigent.
Fünf große Konzerte.
Am Mittwoch Abend, den 2. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8. Februar und 15. März.
Miß Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden als Solisten auftreten. Saison-Tickets einschließlich reservirten Sitzen für die Serie von fünf Konzerten für $3.50, $5 und $7, je nach der Lage.
Der Verkauf der Saison-Tickets beginnt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str., Montag Morgen, den 24. Okt.
§17okt C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Diese berühmte Organisation unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch wird in diesem Winter hier in der Academy of Music fünf große Konzerte veranstalten und zwar am 2. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 8. Februar und 15. März. Es ist nicht erst nöthig auf die Vorzüglichkeit der Leistungen des berühmten Orchesters einzugehen. Frl. Emma Juch und andere hervorragende Künstler werden während des Winters als Solisten in den Konzerten mitwirken. Am nächsten Montage beginnt der Verkauf der Tickets für die Saison von 5 Konzerten bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße. Näheres besagt die Anzeige.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening of the Season by the Famous Boston Orchestra with Miss Emma Juch as Soloist.

The series of concerts given in this city every winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra fill the same prominent place in our musical season which they have long occupied at home. This is conclusively shown by the marked increase in the attendance during the past two or three years, which has now reached a point that is at once creditable to the musical intelligence of the city and remunerative to the superb organization to which we are indebted for so many interesting and educational programmes. If, as many claim, the highest development of music comes through its instrumental forms, their adequate presentation by a thoroughly equipped orchestra is essential to an intelligent understanding of the meaning of the message the world's great tone-masters have striven to convey. It goes without saying that nothing more perfect of the kind could be asked for than is to be found in the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony, and it is equally certain that the world to-day possesses few conductors who equal Mr. Nikisch in the sure and easy control of his forces and the unerring insight and refined taste of his readings.

The programme given last night was one of more than ordinary interest. It began with Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," a work which, while not falling strictly within the lines of what is known as "programme music," is dominated in its progression and treatment by the varying sentiment of the tragedy. In works of this class much must necessarily be left to the imagination. To one who had never read Shakspeare's play, the music would carry nothing of suggestion save that of its own intrinsic musical beauty. But, possessing the key, it is easy to follow the varying emotions aroused by the progress of the story, and certain well-known musical devices serve to sufficiently indicate the character who for the moment "holds the stage." Tschaikowsky is one of the most brilliant of the Slavic school of composers. His originality is no less marked than his power of contrast and fertility of resource in orchestral writing. Like Rubinstein and Grieg, he occasionally betrays a fondness for wood-wind combinations of doubtful utility, and frequent use of the muted strings for purposes of accompaniment, but succeeds generally in avoiding the colorless heaviness of the one and the bizarre extravagance of the other. This "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy contains three effectively contrasted movements, in which are to be found a wealth of original melody, a skill in combination and "working out" and a power of climax which prove it at once the work of a master hand. It is hardly necessary to add that it received a thoroughly satisfactory interpretation.

The vocalist of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, who gave for her first selection the aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon." Miss Juch brought to the performance of this dramatic and difficult scena the same vocal skill and thorough musical taste which she usually manifests, and scored another success, despite the fact that the music demands a voice of the largest calibre. Through some misunderstanding, the orchestral parts for her second song, Liszt's "Loreley," were not at hand, and she was compelled to sing it to accompaniment of piano. The audience did not seem to find anything lacking, and rewarded her most excellent singing with a triple recall, to which she replied with Mozart's charming song "The Violet." Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments in the finished style for which he has become famous.

The orchestra's second number was the "Queen Mab" scherzo, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, a sort of thing which probably nobody but Berlioz could have written. It was aptly described in the annotated programme as "cobweb" music. Nothing could well be imagined more full of elfin witchery as suggested by cunningly devised orchestration. It is also of immense technical difficulty, a fact which probably escaped most of the listeners, as the ease and certainty with which it was played gave no outward indication that anything unusual was going on. The concert closed with Schumann's symphony, No. 4, in D-minor. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the relative value of Schumann's orchestral works, there can be no doubt that in this symphony he displays more clearly than in any of the others his peculiar and original genius. It is less formal, and contains more of the romantic flavor of his piano works and songs, notably in the trio of the third movement. The work as a whole is somewhat fragmentary for the true symphony form, but abounds in melody and skillful contrast of rhythm and color. The old but effective device of returning to the theme of the first movement for the finale is employed, with heightened effect by the change from minor to major. A strong and sympathetic rendering of the whole work was given, and so ended a concert thoroughly enjoyable from beginning to end. The orchestra's next appearance here will be on the evening of November 16.

THE PROVIDENCE NEWS

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

For the third season Mr. Nikish made his bow to a PROVIDENCE audience at Infantry Hall last evening, and certainly there can be no doubt as to the welcome and appreciation with which he and his orchestra were received. Unlike most conductors Mr. Nikish has the delightful faculty of keeping himself in the background while maintaining a subtle but firm hold over his players. Musical conductors, like poets, are born, not made. "Romance" was the prevailing "color scheme" of the program last evening, the first number being the harmoniously discordant Overture Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, while this composition is interesting from a professional standpoint, its lack of melody and peculiar phrasings must prove "caviare to the general." Tschaikowsky certainly shows perfect familiarity with the modern orchestral instruments as was markedly demonstrated by his handling of the wood-wind in the final movements.

How deliciously entrancing was Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, so weirdly elfish was it, one could fancy oneself witnessing a midnight revel of Titania and her elves. The tremendous technical difficulties of this work are such that it is rarely heard, few orchestras daring to attempt it, but under Mr. Nikish's skillful baton it was hard to realize that such difficulties existed. Mendelssohn in his incidental music for "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" uses this same text, and might it not be a pleasing experiment to hear them both in one program? Certainly nothing would better illustrate the enormous strides which have been made in the possibilities of the orchestra.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, which was the final number on the program, was really his second, and opens with a somewhat melancholy theme for violas and 'cellos and after a brief development the allegro enters with a theme used with masterly effect, despite its unmelodious nature. There is a second theme, more pleasing in style, although the first dominates this movement. The second movement is treated in the style of a free fantasie, in which respect it is a wide departure from the established forms. The Romanza opens with a simple plaintive and exquisitely refined melody given out by the oboes and 'cellos with the strings pizzicato which was delightfully rendered, as was also the trio, in the Scherzo, which was soft and dreamy. In the final movement he shows one of his characteristic whimsicalities known as "Schumann's short measures." Mr. Nikish in his reading of the symphony took a slower tempo than is customary, and thereby greatly added to the effect of the different movements.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist of the evening and probably no one could have been selected who is more of a favorite with PROVIDENCE audiences. Miss Juch was in fine form last night and sang the grand aria from Weber's "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," with a dramatic fire and abandon which was delightful. She seemed at times somewhat overweighted by the quantity of the full orchestral accompaniment.

By accident or design the "Loreley," Liszt, was sung without the orchestra, Mr. Nikish presiding at the piano. The audience was apparently unconscious of any shortcomings and in response to an enthusiastic encore, Miss Juch responded by singing "The Violet," by Mozart. One of Miss Juch's many charms is her distinct enunciation as was demonstrated by this and the preceding number. The next concert will be Nov. 16.

The Hebrew Journal

124 EAST 14th STREET,

ORK, OCTOBER 28, 1892.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert this season occurs at Chickering Hall next Thursday evening. The programme comprises Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony and Schumann's D minor symphony. Miss Emma Juch will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" and Liszt's "Loreley."

JACQUES MAYER.

The announcement of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be read with interest by thousands of admirers of the organization in this city, where they have become an important and welcome feature of each musical season. Five concerts are to be given at Metzerott's Music Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 1, December 6, January 10, February 7, and March 14. The orchestra will number seventy-five performers at each concert. Its membership is practically the same as last year. Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where out few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of its players and the completeness of its equipment the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. The programmes for the coming concerts will be chosen with great care. Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Washington programmes such of these as prove most worthy and attractive. The usual number of standard works, both of the old and of the modern school, will, of course, have a hearing. While the orchestra itself must always be the principal attraction of these concerts, the management has endeavored to secure the greatest solo artists available. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer on November 1. A very notable engagement for one of the later concerts is that of Mr. Paderewski, the great piano virtuoso, who will be heard for the only time in this city in these concerts. The sale of season tickets, covering reserved seats for the series of five concerts, will open at Metzerott's music store on Monday, October 31.

Herald New York, N.Y.
10-20
Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give a series of five public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, November 4, December 9, January 13, February 10 and March 17, and five concerts on Saturday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 11 and March 18 at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. Miss Emma Juch, Xaver Scharwenka and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

[26]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 29, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second Symphony concert was of agreeable brevity and considerable interest, offering, as it did, two compositions and one artist new to these series. There was something in each of the new works for criticism to pass upon, more particularly in regard to matters of form and taste, but the evening's provision was still enjoyable and wholesome. Reinecke's overture to his opera, "King Manfred," which was first played, belongs to a good standard class, and Mr. Apthorp's note really accords it real praise in saying that it has "made good its claim to a respectable place,"—for a deal of music which one has to hear nowadays is not entitled to respect, for all the amazement, excitement and perturbation which it causes and the ingenious elaboration of its demonstrations. There are two phases in it—a gloomy and dramatic introduction (which suggested to us rather the influence of Weber in the "Freischü z" than that of Schumann, which others seemed to feel) and a gay and brilliant subsequent theme, wrought out in customary fashion, but with no lack of spirit and suggesting a stirring and showy drama. The other novelty was Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony, in E-minor. That this man is bent upon being himself, thinking his own thoughts and enforcing them in his own way, is surely not so reprehensible as it seems to some of his critics, who censure him for his occasional carelessness, roughness, unconventionality and rudeness. Can we scratch even a musical Russian without touching upon some flowing vein of Tartar blood? And if we could extract those coarser and less tractable drops, might we not withdraw the very essence of strong and ardent individuality? In Tschaikowsky's music one feels by turns the influence of the wild wastes, the massive nature, the loneliness, the gloom and the brooding space or the wild, erratic determination of humanity to bear up and rebel against impassive constraint and to be reckless, defiant and even immensely jubilant in the face of them. His pages may tempt the pencil of the reviser and provoke the strictures of the critic of form and proportion—perhaps even merit the censure of the stickler for musical good manners; but they represent strong personality and purpose and they cannot be heard by unmoved listeners. The first movement of this symphony begins sombrely and distantly in the brooding wooden wind, and as it grows into form there enters its structure one of those dull, scarcely heard, beating rhythms which suggest the fatality that seems elemental in all vast solitary lands. There is some sweet singing by the 'cello and frequently the mysterious voice of the bassoon is heard in undercurrents. The andante is based upon two characteristic and appealing themes, which are expressly assigned to the most touching instruments; this movement, like the first, dies away gradually into silence. The third movement is of unusual character, for it is cast into the form of a waltz—a sufficiently strong and well-knit one to command attention, yet hardly consistent with the stability and dignity of the place it occupies. The finale, less solid and worthy of attention in its thematic material than the first and second movements, is full of abandon, fire and demonstrativeness, emphasizing its periods with great vehemence, and stirring the listener up almost to enthusiasm of response. Between these works was placed Saint-Saëns's fourth pianoforte concerto, the solo part of which was played with commendable fluency and correctness by Mr. Carl Stasny of the N. E. Conservatory of Music, but without brilliancy or earnestness of manner, and not always with sufficient solidity and strength of tone to fill the hall. Mr. Nikisch conducted carefully and with regard to the differing dramatic qualities of the overture and symphony, and the orchestra was in good trim.

Tonight's programme includes Gade's B-flat major symphony, a Dvoràk suite, and a symphonic poem, called "Frü'ergswogen," new to Boston, by Philipp Scharwenka. Miss Juch has been engaged as the soloist, and will sing (with orchestra) Liszt's "Loreley" and a scene from "Oberon."

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in town on Friday arranging for the coming series of concerts by the orchestra. The seats for the home concerts were all sold on the first days of the sale, the first choice going by auction for $380, so that the seats bought by the successful bidder cost him $392 each, or over $16 a concert. The next choice went at $150. The high price paid for first choice was caused by the rivalry of two gentlemen, each determined to have certain choice seats. It must be remembered, also, that the price was not for concert tickets, but to be first in one of Boston's great social functions, the Friday afternoon symphonies. The personnel of the orchestra is nearly the same as last year. Mr. Novacek, the first viola, goes with Damrosch, and Mr Svecenski, first violin, who has played at the second desk with Adamowski, but who has always played viola with the Kneisel Quartet, takes his place. The vacancy in the first violins is filled by Mr. Schultyler, formerly with Mr. Ryan in the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. The orchestra will give only one concert in Baltimore during the season, owing to the lack of a suitable place. They were fortunate enough to find one open date at Ford's. The new music hall is promised for the season of 1893–'94.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcements made last week have awakened great interest in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and there are many indications that the coming series will be more successful than any past series has been. The organization began its season in Boston a week ago under the most favorable auspices, the usual record of recent years, every seat sold for the entire season, having been made. All accounts agree that the orchestra was never in better condition. Five concerts will be given in this city at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 8, and March 15. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist at the first concert. The progamme in full is as follows:—

OVERTURE, "Oberon".....Weber
ARIA, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
VORSPIEL und LIEBESTOD, from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
SONG with ORCHESTRA, "Loreley".....Liszt
SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
(First time.)

The sale of season tickets with reserved seats for the series of five concerts opens to-morrow morning at 1221 Chestnut Street.

...vertising columns have already an... the coming of Nikisch and the Bos... Symphony Orchestra, who will give five ... rehearsals and five concerts, under the ...spices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic. ...d-minded musicians and music lovers ...ight in Arthur Nikisch. There is ...othing small, narrow-minded about ...his gifted Hungarian. As he said when in... terviewed last year, he believed all the civil... ized nations had produced some good music, ... and that he would not be restricted to the ... music of one or two countries, and he kept ... his word. At his first appearance in Brook... lyn last year, he at once captured the most ... thoughtful and cultivated in the musical quar... ters of this town. This season a series of ... five public rehearsals and five concerts will ... be given at the Academy of Music. The pub... lic rehearsals will take place on Friday after... noons, Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and ... March 17. The concerts will be held on ... Saturday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, ... Feb. 11 and March 18. At the first public ... rehearsal and concert Miss Emma Juch and ... Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloists. Miss ... Emma Eames, it is expected, will sing at one ... of the concerts. Mr. Nikisch has secured a ... great number of interesting novelties for his ... performances, and the programmes, of course, ... will contain the usual number of sterling ... works, both of the old and of the modern ... school.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by William F. Apthorp, of the Boston "Evening Transcript." These notes are of benefit to the educated musician, and a real blessing to the earnest seeker after higher and better musical culture. As was the custom last year, programme books, containing these notes will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets for the rehearsals and concerts will open at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, Monday morning, Oct. 24, at 8 o'clock. The sale will be personally conducted by Oscar J. Murray. To insure a fair distribution of tickets, Mr. Murray will not sell more than ten tickets to one person. The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of forty-eight performances in that city, and the very large sale for the New York series, indicate an extraordinary interest in the orchestra this coming season. The indications are that the demand for tickets in Brooklyn will be greater than it was last year. In connection right here with the concerts of the Choral Society, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts of the Euterpe Chorus and Orchestra, it may be well to repeat that the Academy of Music has a complete new set of scenery. "It never rains but it pours." We are not only to have more and better music than ever in Brooklyn this fall, winter and spring, but a renovated Academy of Music, a thing for which Brooklyn people have sighed lo these many years.

THE LEADER.

[ESTABLISHED, 1875.]

NOVEMBER, 1892.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been busy during his summer abroad, and announces some of the novelties, for Boston, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as follows:—Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint Saëns, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvořák, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poeme "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, opp. 55; Cæsar Culpetite suite, opp. 43 (in mode populara); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier; Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen." Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season will be distinguished by a chorus which according to official announcement will "add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts." Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski and others to be expected are Joseffy, Mac Dowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin, probably Miss Emma Eames and the German tenor Raimond von Zur Muhlen. As will be seen the list is not startling either in novelty or attractiveness.

Col. Henry Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have added a codicil to his will, that leaves an investment of ene million dollars, as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is faintly whispered that Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a piano soloist during the coming season. Paderewski appears later.

Miss Emma Juch is engaged as soloist, at the Boston Symphony concerts, October 28 and 29.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Chesvan 7, 5653, October 28, 1892

As already announced the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor, will give five concerts in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert. The programme in full will be as follows: Overture Fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Aria "Ocean, thou mighty monster," Weber; Queen Mab Scherzo; from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Song with Orchestra "Loreley," Liszt; Symphony in D minor No. 4, Schumann. Tickets and programmes at Schuberth's.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Public Rehearsals and five Concerts at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan. 13 and 14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18. The programme for the first rehearsal and concert is as follows:

Overture "Sakuntata," Goldmark; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Vorspiel und Liebestod, from Tristan und Isolde, Wagner; Song with Orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt; Symphony in E minor No. 5, Tschaikowsky; Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Tickets, etc., at Chandler's, 300 Fulton St.

The Independent

114 NASSAU STREET.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 27th, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra (its twelfth season in its own city has just reached its third week with the usual success) will give its series of Thursday evening concerts in this city on the dates November 3d, December 8th, January 12th, February 9th and March 16th; and in Brooklyn, under the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society's auspices, its rehearsal and concert dates will be the Friday afternoons and Saturday nights, November 4th-5th, December 9th-10th, January 13th-14th, February 10th-11th, March 17th-18th. Mr. Nikisch's first New York program will be Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Weber's "Oberon" aria "Ocean, thou monster"; Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo; Liszt's "Lorelei" song and, Schumann's Fourth Symphony. Brooklyn's opening program will include Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor, two "Tristan" excerpts for orchestra, and the same vocal numbers. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist here and in Brooklyn. By the by, this orchestra has accepted the invitation of the World's Fair, and will give several Chicago concerts during it.

[27]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

November Itinerary--1892.

Leave Boston Sunday, October 30, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Breakfast at Philadelphia Monday, October 31, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R. Twenty minutes for breakfast.

Arrive Baltimore 9.37 A. M.

—CARROLLTON HOTEL.—

Concert at Ford's Opera House, 8 P.M.

Rehearsal at Ford's Opera House, 11.30 A.M. Tuesday, November 1.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.

Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, Nov. 2.

Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.

—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—

Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, Nov. 3, 9.30 A.M.

Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.

—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 4, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 5, at 8.15 P.M.

Leave New York Saturday, November 5, midnight. Grand Central Depot.

Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 6, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, October 29, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

HOTEL LIST.

A. Nikisch.	E. Loeffler.	D. Hannemann. F. Muller.
F. R. Comee. C. M. Loeffler.	J. Edw. Eichler. W. Krafft.	H. Heindl. W. Rietzel.
Fr. Kneisel.	E. N. Lafricain. W. A. Field.	E. M. Heindl. Jul. E. Eichler.
T. Adamowski. J. Adamowski.	M. Tischer-Zeitz. E. Golde.	C. Schumann.
A. Schroeder.	H. Schuecker. J. Hoffman.	G. Bareither. L. Jennewein.
C. Mole.	I. Schnitzler. M. Kaestl.	G. Gerhardt. H. Hoyer.
L. Svecenski. M. Zach.	F. Mahn. H. Berger.	L. Demuth. C. Reibl.
O. Roth.	G. Strube. F. E. Hahn.	Paul Fox. C. Dietsch.
W.W. Swornsbourne. F. E. Schuchmann.	G. Goldschmidt. A. Gutter.	Th. Gordon. O. Taubert.
D. Kuntz. H. Eichheim.	J. Knecht. E. Rose.	H. J. Butler. R. Kurth.
J. Akeroyd. H. A. Greene.	A. Goldstein. S. Goldstein.	Fr. Hein. H. Lorbeer.
G. Campanari. P. Fiumara.	P. Metzger. A. Hackebarth	A. Rigg. Jos. Mann.
H. D. Simpson. E. B. Marble.	A. Kolster. L. Post.	A. Heindl.
E. Fiedler. A. Moldauer.	M. Kluge. J. Michael.	T. B. Senia.

The advertising columns have already announced the coming of Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will give five public rehearsals and five concerts, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic. Broad-minded musicians and music lovers delight in Arthur Nikisch. There is nothing small, narrow-minded about this gifted Hungarian. As he said when interviewed last year, he believed all the civilized nations had produced some good music, and that he would not be restricted to the music of one or two countries, and he kept his word. At his first appearance in Brooklyn last year, he at once captured the most thoughtful and cultivated in the musical quarters of this town. This season a series of five public rehearsals and five concerts will be given at the Academy of Music. The public rehearsals will take place on Friday afternoons, Nov. 4, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 17. The concerts will be held on Saturday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 11 and March 18. At the first public rehearsal and concert Miss Emma Juch and Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloists. Miss Emma Eames, it is expected, will sing at one of the concerts. Mr. Nikisch has secured a great number of interesting novelties for his performances, and the programmes, of course, will contain the usual number of sterling works, both of the old and of the modern school.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by William F. Apthorp, of the Boston "Evening Transcript." These notes are of benefit to the educated musician, and a real blessing to the earnest seeker after higher and better musical culture. As was the custom last year, programme books, containing these notes will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets for the rehearsals and concerts will open at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, Monday morning, Oct. 24, at 8 o'clock. The sale will be personally conducted by Oscar J. Murray. To insure a fair distribution of tickets, Mr. Murray will not sell more than ten tickets to one person. The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of forty-eight performances in that city, and the very large sale for the New York series, indicate an extraordinary interest in the orchestra this coming season. The indications are that the demand for tickets in Brooklyn will be greater than it was last year. In connection right here with the concerts of the Choral Society, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the concerts of the Euterpe Chorus and Orchestra, it may be well to repeat that the Academy of Music has a complete new set of scenery. "It never rains but it pours." We are not only to have more and better music than ever in Brooklyn this fall, winter and spring, but a renovated Academy of Music, a thing for which Brooklyn people have sighed lo these many years.

THE LEADER.

[ESTABLISHED, 1875.]

NOVEMBER, 1892.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been busy during his summer abroad, and announces some of the novelties, for Boston, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as follows:—Liszt, Faust symphony (with chorus); Eugene D'Albert, symphony (new); Tschaikowsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5; Saint Saëns, symphony, A minor, op. 55; Rudorff, symphony, G minor, No. 2; Dvořák, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis;" Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Tempest;" Wagner, scene I. from "Das Rheingold" (Alberch and the Rhine Daughters); Thierot, symphonietta, opp. 55; Cæsar Culpetite suite, opp. 43 (in mode populara); Bazzini, overture, "King Lear;" Riemenschneider, symphonic poem, "Todtentanz;" Cherubini, overture, "Ali Baba;" Reinecke, overture, "King Manfred;" Raff, symphonietta for wind instruments; Charpentier; Impressions d'Italie; Philip Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Fruhlingswagen." Heuberger, Nachtmusik for string orchestra; Brahms, rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus; Liszt, vintage chorus from "Prometheus;" Brahms, schickalslied for chorus and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season will be distinguished by a chorus which according to official announcement will "add enormously to the attractiveness and popularity of the concerts." Of the soloists, an engagement has been closed with Paderewski and others to be expected are Joseffy, Mac Dowell, Stasny, Newell, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Amy Sherwin, probably Miss Emma Eames and the German tenor Raimond von Zur Muhlen. As will be seen the list is not startling either in novelty or attractiveness.

Col. Henry Higginson, the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have added a codicil to his will, that leaves an investment of ene million dollars, as an endowment fund, the interest of which is to be used for the permanent maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is faintly whispered that Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as a piano soloist during the coming season. Paderewski appears later.

Miss Emma Juch is engaged as soloist, at the Boston Symphony concerts, October 28 and 29.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Chesvan 7, 5653, October 28, 1892

As already announced the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor, will give five concerts in Chickering Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 3, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 16. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer at the first concert. The programme in full will be as follows: Overture Fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky: Aria "Ocean, thou mighty monster," Weber; Queen Mab Scherzo; from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Song with Orchestra "Loreley," Liszt; Symphony in D minor No. 4, Schumann. Tickets and programmes at Schuberth's.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Public Rehearsals and five Concerts at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan. 13 and 14, Feb. 10 and 11 and March 17 and 18. The programme for the first rehearsal and concert is as follows:

Overture "Sakuntata," Goldmark: Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Vorspiel und Liebestod, from Tristan und Isolde, Wagner: Song with Orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt: Symphony in E minor No. 5, Tschaikowsky; Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Tickets, etc., at Chandler's, 300 Fulton St.

The Independent

114 NASSAU STREET.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 27th, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra (its twelfth season in its own city has just reached its third week with the usual success) will give its series of Thursday evening concerts in this city on the dates November 3d, December 8th, January 12th, February 9th and March 16th; and in Brooklyn, under the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society's auspices, its rehearsal and concert dates will be the Friday afternoons and Saturday nights, November 4th-5th, December 9th-10th, January 13th-14th, February 10th-11th, March 17th-18th. Mr. Nikisch's first New York program will be Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Weber's "Oberon" aria "Ocean, thou monster"; Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo; Liszt's "Lorelei" song and, Schumann's Fourth Symphony. Brooklyn's opening program will include Goldmark's "Sakuntalà" Overture and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor, two "Tristan" excerpts for orchestra, and the same vocal numbers. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist here and in Brooklyn. By the by, this orchestra has accepted the invitation of the World's Fair, and will give several Chicago concerts during it.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

November Itinerary--1892.

Leave Boston Sunday, October 30, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.

Breakfast at Philadelphia Monday, October 31, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R. Twenty minutes for breakfast.

Arrive Baltimore 9.37 A. M.

—CARROLLTON HOTEL.—

Concert at Ford's Opera House, 8 P.M.

Rehearsal at Ford's Opera House, 11.30 A.M. Tuesday, November 1.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.

Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.

Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.

Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.

Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, Nov. 2.

Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.

—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—

Concert at Academy of Music. 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, Nov. 3, 9.30 A.M.

Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.

—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.

Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.

Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 4, at 3 P.M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 5, at 8.15 P.M

Leave New York Saturday, November 5, midnight. Grand Central Depot.

Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 6, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, October 29, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

HOTEL LIST.

A. Nikisch.	E. Loeffler.	D. Hannemann. F. Muller.
F. R. Comee. C. M. Loeffler.	J. Edw. Eichler. W. Krafft.	H. Heindl. W. Rietzel.
Fr. Kneisel.	E. N. Lafricain. W. A. Field.	E. M. Heindl. Jul. E. Eichler.
T. Adamowski. J. Adamowski.	M. Tischer-Zeitz. E. Golde.	C. Schumann.
A. Schroeder.	H. Schuecker. J. Hoffman.	G. Bareither. L. Jennewein.
C. Mole.	I. Schnitzler. M. Kaestl.	G. Gerhardt. H. Hoyer.
L. Svecenski. M. Zach.	F. Mahn. H. Berger.	L. Demuth. C. Reibl.
O. Roth.	G. Strube. F. E. Hahn.	Paul Fox. C. Dietsch.
W. W. Swornsbourne. F. E. Schuchmann.	G. Goldschmidt. A. Gutter.	Th. Gordon. O. Taubert.
D. Kuntz. H. Eichheim.	J. Knecht. E. Rose.	H. J. Butler. R. Kurth.
J. Akeroyd. H. A. Greene.	A. Goldstein. S. Goldstein.	Fr. Hein. H. Lorbeer.
G. Campanari. P. Fiumara.	P. Metzger. A. Hackebarth	A. Rigg. Jos. Mann.
H. D. Simpson. E. B. Marble.	A. Kolster. L. Post.	A. Heindl.
E. Fiedler. A. Moldauer.	M. Kluge. J. Michael.	T. B. Senia.

[27]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch is progressive. For example the erratic and disloyal spirit that so desecrated the performance of the C minor symphony of Beethoven three years ago could not be discovered in the well nigh orthodox interpretation of the great work this season and although further tests of Mr. Nikisch's loyalty in interpreting the older classics have not thus far been offered, yet it is largely to his credit that the orchestral playing is decidedly superior to that of last year. The fortissimi are healthier and the wood-wind and brass departments of the orchestra bear a more artistic ratio than formerly to the violins, celli, etc., As regards programmes, it is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch with his increased facilities does not do more to foster music by American composers in a department in which native creations are not only worthy of dignified consideration but actually challenge it. Who indeed is Philip Scharwenka, whose stupid symphonic poem was performed last evening, that his music should be admitted to the symphony concerts when there are scores of composers like Paine, Chadwick, McDowell, Buck, Whiting and others whom Mr. Nikisch so persistently ignores? Recall, too, that mediocre overture by schoolmaster Reinecke, that the orchestra played last week, and tell us, if possible, the artistic why and wherefore that has any bearing upon Mr. Nikisch's taste in the make-up of his programmes? It is high time that the conductor of the symphony orchestra should appreciate the fact that a foreign label is not necessarily a proof of excellence or a native label of inferiority, and that native composers in the field of music should receive from him, who awoke first in this country to find himself famous, the same respect and attention that contemporaneous composers in the field of literature do. The Dvorak suite, with which the concert began last evening, while perhaps not representing the composer at his worthiest, is a thoroughly individual piece of music, mostly scored for string band, with charming oboe effects in the opening pastorale, the full orchestra only being employed in the last movement. The composer having an intuitive predilection for musical piquancy lets it run riot throughout the suite which in the Finale furiant is wondrously vivid and fascinating. Against a large portion of the music it might be urged with some force that it is somewhat too Slavonic in thought, but considerable of it, notably the Minnett and Romanze is nevertheless very beautiful and very impressive. It especially reflects credit upon the composor's command of the technics of composition and instrumentation. The soloist for the concert was Miss Emma Juch, who was heard in the recitative and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," Act II, No. 13, and in the song with orchestra, "Die Lorely," by Franz Liszt.

That Miss Juch was quite unequal to the eloquent demands of the Weber aria seemed a foregone conclusion. There was no disappointment. Miss Juch is conspicuously a lyric soprano and wholly irregardless of her vocal limitations she attempted to interpret a scene which only a Titjens or a Neilson could hope to present with adequate success. The tones of her voice which cover a wide range, are inherently pure and pregnant with charm, were often strained beyond their normal timbre, and with the logical result of a pantomimic kind of vocalism that seemed to divert the attention of of all present from the aria itself to the always fascinating personality of the gifted Miss Juch. With the song by Liszt "The Loseley" the artiste was more successful, and sang with no inconsiderable formancy and depth of expression yet as in the Weber aria with an uncertain intonation that was neither offensively false nor exactly true, but that nevertheless deviated beyond cavil from the correct pitch. Miss Juch was loudly applauded and many times recalled. The concert ended with Gade's charming symphony in B-flat. Of recent years, notably since the time when the Harvard Musical Association gave their Symphony Concerts, the music of Neils Gades has been repeatedly neglected here, yet it was a musician of no less rank than Mendlesohn who once referred to Gade as "the only thoroughly original apparition in the musical life of the day." The Composer's Symphony in b flat major is an uncommonly well-written, scholarly and effective work, concice in statement, pure in style, and full of melody. The orchestral performance of it was all that one would wish, the reading of the work being no less unimpeachable than was the invariably prompt unanimous and sympathetic response to the interpreter's baton. At the next concert Saturday evening, Nov. 12, the soloists will be Mr. T. Adamwoski; two symphonies will be performed, one by Saint Saeus in a minor, and Beethoven's second symphony; the violin concerto in F sharp minor by Ernst, and a Humoresque (new) for orchestra by E. Humferdink.

C. L. C.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the second Symphony concert of the present season, in Music hall, the programme was:

Reinecke: Overture to "King Manfred."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor.
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.
Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

The Reinecke Overture is a musicianly composition, and was well received. It was its first production here, and the orchestra did excellent work.

Mr. Carl Stasny played with painstaking care Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, and was heartily recalled.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony, given for the first time in Boston, is an elaborate work and a fine example of symphonic writing. It shows its slavic origin most markedly, and is an interesting composition. It was in striking contrast to the Reinecke Overture.

The programme last evening was:

Dvorak, suite for orchestra; Weber, aria from "Oberon"; Philipp Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen"; Liszt, song, with orchestra, "Die Loreley"; Gade, symphony in B-flat major. Miss Emma Juch was the singer

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 30.

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was listened to by a very large audience. The programme was: Suite, by Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, "Fruehlingswogen," P. Scharwenka (first time here); Song, "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony, B-flat, Gade. The soloist was Miss Emma Juch. The Dvorak suite was originally brought out here by Mr. Gericke. It is a piquant work, original, brilliant and interesting, and improves on acquaintance. By the way, the programme was very edifying in its notice of Dvorak, especially in connection with the pronunciation of his name, which, we learn, might be phonetically spelled in English, "Dvwhor-zhack," the r being silent. To achieve the phonetic English for Dvw will make exceedingly entertaining practice for those who are at a loss for some amusement to wile away an idle hour. We learn, also, that it is divided: Dvo-rak. This is important, because there would naturally be a tendency to divide them: Dv-ora-k. The suite was exceedingly well played. The Scharwenka Symphonic poem is an industrious if not wholly lucid bit of trifling about nothing in particular. It is not quite clear what it is all about, and there is over much groping after cheap thematic development. It is long, but all that it says could have been said in half the space of time without making it any more interesting. There is throughout, a strong suggestion of parlor pianoforte pieces of the "By the Sea," "On the Lake," "Fluttering Leaves" and "Summer Breezes" order. Now and then there is an ambitious outburst of deeper sentiment, but it destroys the general balance. When a thing is essentially and consistently inane, it is scarcely judicious to disturb it by brief, incongruous flights in the direction of comparative sense. As a painful aberration, the music is not without a certain melancholy interest; but as a mixture it becomes unsatisfactory from any point of view. There were some pleasing moments in it, devoted to welcome reminiscences of Wagner, Schumann, Raff, Gounod and Ambroise Thomas. The depressing feature of the work was the apparent unwillingness of the composer to bring it to an end. The elegant, polished and always delightful Gade symphony was heard again with genuine delight. Here the composer knew when he had said all that it was necessary to say, and, artist-like, ended when he had said it. The work of the orchestra was the best of the season thus far. The selection from "Oberon" was the noble scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster." Miss Juch sang it with a full appreciation of its broad dramatic character. The artist's voice sounded worn, and was hardly of the large quality suited to the demands of the work, but the interpretation was wholly intelligent. Curiously enough Miss Juch sang it in German. As it was written to English words and was originally sung in English, it is not easy to understand why it should have been given in any other tongue, especially as the singer is perfectly at home in our language. She was three times recalled at the close of the aria. In "The Loreley" song, she was not as successful as she was in the other. Here, oddly enough, again, she sang in English, when the original is in German. As the translation is miserably bad, there was a good excuse for abandoning it in favor of Heine's own words. The ways of prima donnas, however, are inscrutable. Miss Juch was twice recalled for this song. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in A minor, op. 55, Saint-Saëns (first time); Concerto for violin, Ernst; Humoresque, E. Humperdink, and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 15, Miss Marguerite Hall assisting. The programme is: Quartet, G-major, Mozart; Songs; and Quartet D-major, op. 63, Gade. Tickets for the season and for single concerts may now be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1892.

The programme of the Symphony concert on Saturday evening comprised Dvorak's suite for orchestra in D major; recitative and aria from "Oberon"; Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen"; Liszt's "Die Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B flat major.

The musical public was first introduced to Dvorak's suite by Mr. Gericke, and the favorable impression created at the first hearing was only increased under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. It is a thoroughly interesting as well as enjoyable work, full of quaint movements and brilliant ideas, and was rendered with excellent taste.

Scharwenka's symphonic poem was interesting from its oddity. In was in many ways unlike this singular composer's other works, and while pleasing in fragments, left rather an unsatisfactory effect as a whole.

Gade's symphony is familiar to the patrons of these concerts, and is always acceptable, especially when so admirably rendered, not only as far as the orchestra is concerned, but by the judicious taste of the conductor.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. She gave the aria from "Oberon" with fine effect, although at times the orchestral accompaniment was too powerful and overpowered the efforts of the singer. "Die Loreley" was also well given, the fault on the part of the orchestra being less noticeable. The programme for the next concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 12, will be: Saint-Saëns, symphony in A minor, op. 55; E. W. Ernst, concerto for violin in F sharp minor; E. Humperdink, humoresque for orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2; soloist, T. Adamowski.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Penn.

ate 10/24

The symphony to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Academy of Music, next Wednesday evening, is that by Tschaikowsky, No. 5, in E minor, which has not yet been heard in Philadelphia. It is in four movements, allegro, andante cantabile, valse (allegro moderato) and finale (andante maestoro), and is said to be an interesting and characteristic work. One will here notice the substitution of a valse movement for the usual scherzo. Other orchestral numbers at the concert will be the "Oberon" overture and "Parsifal" vorspeil. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, her selections being Weber's aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1892.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A Singular Preference Shown by Miss Emma Juch.

The Secret Choice of Charles Baudelaire, Wagnerite.

The programme of the third symphony concert was as follows:

Suite for orchestra, op. 39.....Dvorak
"Ocean! thou mighty monster".....Weber
Symphonic Poem, "Fruehlingswogen"....P. Scharwenka
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony No. 4, B flat.....Gade

Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

There is a spontaneity in the suite by Dvorak that is thoroughly delightful; that is sought for in vain in later and more ambitious works by him. There is here no groping after an effect, no vague oracular shriek from a Bohemian tripod. The different numbers are not unlike cabinet pictures of folk life. The people are presented frankly in their simplicity and jollity. Such fresh and melodious music is welcome in the close air of Music Hall. The Dvorak polka makes more for musical righteousness than symphonic-poems "in eight mystic devices and three paraphrases" or symphonies that are said to represent the struggle of Man with the Infinite. Nor is the furiant, known of old as the furie, to be despised. Perhaps in time we may become acquainted with the chodovska, the husitska, the Umriec, the skakava, the strasak, and the baborak; for the Bohemians are a people of many steps, and Afred Waldan, in his "Bohemian National Dances," writes of 136 distinct varieties in the manner of stamping, gliding and leaping into the air.

***

It was a pleasure to hear again the severe and beautiful symphony of Gade. To be sure it is not great music in the modern sense of the term. Gade is here simply a maker of music; he is not a "tone poet," nor a "seer," nor a "revolutionary." He is a man of musical temperament, who learned the art of expressing himself clearly and often with grace. He has no startling story to shock or confound the hearer; he is agreeable, sympathetic, at times eloquent in speech. In his eloquence he rarely raises his voice, and he never screams. He does not linger, hat in hand, with idle repetitions. His leave taking is neither abrupt, nor is it like unto that peculiar parting of two women busied in a social function, the parting that assumes the importance of the death-bed, although it is only for a day. And in this symphony Gade is not so cruelly choked by Mendelssohn as in certain of his other works.

***

Ten years ago Mr. Philipp Scharwenka was a good-natured man who lived in Berlin, where he relished a jest and was persuaded occasionally by an impatient pupil to give him a lesson in composition. His laziness was then as traditional as his good nature. He still lives in Berlin. That he is still lazy and fond of jesting is revealed by his symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen," for he shuns the labor of original thinking and plays a musical joke on the hearer. We are informed that the composer has taken "a single, simple idea, the general upheaving or 'allowing' of animate nature at the arrival of spring," but to illustrate this idea he has taken many ideas from predecessors and contemporaries. Nor is he fastidious in his choice—Richard Wagner and Albert Jungmann are held by him in equal esteem. "Siegfried" yeast excites the musical fermentation of Scharwenka; and when he feels himself possessed and gives vent to his own exuberance he sings a saccharine melody that might have been written by Oesten or Chas. Morley. Then he is so garrulous after he has inserted firmly a finger in the button hole! It is possible, after all, that Scharwenka was serious in his intent and felt a personal interest in his interminable platitudes and incongruous quotations, "just as a drunkard who cannot articulate supposes himself oracular."

***

This symphonic poem was played last week for the first time in Boston. New York listened to it in December, 1891. Chicago wondered at it in the January of this year.

***

Miss Emma Juch sang the celebrated scene and air of Rezia from "Oberon" in German. Now Weber wrote the music to an English text for an English singer and an English audience. The German translation by Th. Hell was not made until the composer had finished the opera with sole view to the musical illustration of the lines of Planche. Mary Anne Paton was the name of the singer who created the part at the Covent Garden Theatre—the beautiful Miss Paton, who was happier afterward as Mrs. Joseph Wood (under which name she was known to Bostonians of a former generation) than when she enjoyed the doubtful honor of a Scotch marriage with Lord William Pitt Lennox. Nor did Weber complain of her nationality, nor did he sigh for the sound of the German guttural. On the contrary, he wrote his wife that Miss Paton "sang divinely." There was not a German in the cast that memorable night of the 12th of April, 1826. (Not until late in December of that year was the opera sung in German, and then at Leipzig.) Furthermore, the patriotic Weber, who worked so earnestly for German art, was loud in his praises of the English singers. And why? Because "they were masters of the Italian school." But this was long before the opinion prevailed that the art of song was merely an affair of the intellect, only to be fully understood by German men and women.

***

Miss Juch cannot plead in excuse a lack of familiarity with our language. She sings it with rare beauty of enunciation and pronunciation. She has been identified prominently with English opera. She sang last Saturday evening "Die Loreley" in English. The superb opening of the great scene with the setting of the words "Ocean, thou mighty monster," is known to all. Are the following words to be preferred for power of expression or charm of euphony: "Ocean, Du Ungeheuer! Schlangen gleich naeltst du umschlungen rund die ga..ze Welt!" Miss Juch perhaps found a meaning in them that appealed to her, some meaning mystic, wonderful, for she chose them although she sang before an English-speaking audience.

***

She sang the scene and air with vocal skill and dramatic intelligence, so that she was applauded deservedly and twice recalled. In Liszt's elaborate setting of Heine's verses she was less successful. It is true that at times during the evening her voice showed the wear and tear that follow, unfortunately, faithful and long-continued work. But in these days when half-taught or ignorant declaimers disdain the

The performance of the orchestral members was worthy of undiluted praise. In solo work and in ensemble it was fully up to the old and the established reputation of the organization.

***

Attention is called frequently by the more inflamed disciples of Richard Wagner to the case of Charles Baudelaire, the poet of "Fleurs du Mal." It is true that in 1861 the "sleepless heart and sombre soul" of Mr. Baudelaire were moved mightily by the theories and the music of Wagner, and he achieved a pamphlet, entitled "Richard Wagner et Tannhauser à Paris," which is now quoted in second-hand book catalogues at seven or eight francs. The world, however, was ignorant of any other views of Mr. Baudelaire concerning music, which, by the way, he treated only from the standpoint of the layman, until Mr. Jules Claretie lately revealed the inner soul of the poet-critic. This revelation deserves a separate paragraph.

***

"I hear him still telling us, with a grimace not to be forgotten: 'I adore Wagner. But the music I prefer is that of a cat hung up by his tail outside of a window and trying to stick to the panes of glass with its claws. There is an odd grating on the glass which I find at the same time strange, irritating and singularly harmonious.'"

PHILIP HALE.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartette will take place in Chickering Hall, Tuesday afternoon, November 15. The programme will include Quartette, G major, Mozart, and Quartette, D major, op. 63, Gade. Miss Marguerite Hall will sing a group of songs. Tickets for the season and for single concerts may now be had at Music Hall.

The second concert of the Knepel Quartette will be given in Chickering Hall Monday evening, Nov. 7. The programme will be as follows: Quartette, E flat Lalo (first time); Schuman's Sonata, for pianoforte and violin, A minor; Quartette, D minor, Schubert. Mr. Clayton Johns will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 122.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1892.

Miss Emma Juch, Soloist at the Symphony Concert—Cyril Tyler's Farewell Tonight—Rice's Popular at the Park This Evening—Other Attractions, News Notes and Gossip.

An admirably varied programme was performed at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening under the direction of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, the soloist being Miss Emma Juch, soprano.

The selections of the evening included Dvorak's suite for orchestra; Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon"; Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen"; Liszt's song (with orchestra), "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B flat major.

The appearance of Miss Juch gave her many admirers in this city a welcome pleasure, and she has seldom made a more emphatic success than on this occasion. The great dramatic aria from "Oberon," which so severely tests the abilities of the best equipped soprano, was given with splendid breadth and artistic finish, its contrasting movements displaying the admirable vocal gifts of the artist to the best advantage. Miss Juch's delivery of the number was well calculated to call out the commendation of the most critical, and a well merited ovation rewarded the singer as she concluded the selection. Liszt's beautiful "Loreley" is a composition which is seldom heard with full satisfaction, as the demands it makes upon the musical intelligence of the singer are rarely met. Miss Juch is singularly gifted in the intellectual attainments demanded in the proper interpretation of this song, and last evening she fairly disarmed criticism by the admirable fashion in which she realized all its beauties. The sentiment, feeling and intelligence shown in the delivery of the number, the artistic grace which characterized its phrasing, and the purity and correctness of the tones of the singer, combine to make the song a source of keen enjoyment, and to win for the singer another grand demonstration.

The novelty of the evening consisted of the spring poem by Philipp Scharwenka, which was given its first hearing here on this occasion. The composition appeals with rare success to the poetic and sentimental characteristics of the music loving public, the fanciful idea of depicting in true colors the opening of spring being carried out with artistic grace and singularly pleasing realism. The principal theme is elaborated with admirable skill, and the instrumental combination, as well as the working out, gives evidence of the master's hand. Mr. Nikisch brought all his great talents for the successful interpretation of this class of writings to the reading of this true poem, and his performance of the composition gave entire satisfaction.

The sharp contrasting movements of the Dvorak suite were given a delightful interpretation and Mr. Nikisch was also particularly happy in his reading of the Gade symphony, which has never had a more pleasing production than on this occasion.

The orchestra makes its first occasional tour during the coming week and resumes its home concerts on the 11th of November, when Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

How it would have delighted the heart of any true Bostonian to have been present at the welcome extended Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the brilliant opening of the Providence season. The sale, to begin with, was a floral one, and the genial Mr. Comee, who manages the Providence series, disbursed the tickets amid a beautiful chrysanthemum display. The floral idea was next tendered to Mr. Nikisch, as, upon entering Infantry Hall, he found his stand converted into a support for smilax and roses. The applause which greeted his entrance came from an audience which included the wealth and musical culture of Providence, and was in size the largest that has ever greeted the Symphony, the sale even for the opening concert exceeding by $1000 any sale of previous seasons. This appreciation of an orchestra of which Boston is so justly proud has extended to Washington, where the opening sale of seats was a test for the ingenuity and urbanity of Mr. Comee to satisfy everybody's demand for the best seats obtainable.

[28]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch is progressive. For example the erratic and disloyal spirit that so desecrated the performance of the C minor symphony of Beethoven three years ago could not be discovered in the well nigh orthodox interpretation of the great work this season and although further tests of Mr. Nikisch's loyalty in interpreting the older classics have not thus far been offered, yet it is largely to his credit that the orchestral playing is decidedly superior to that of last year. The fortissimi are healthier and the wood-wind and brass departments of the orchestra bear a more artistic ratio than formerly to the violins, celli, etc., As regards programmes, it is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch with his increased facilities does not do more to foster music by American composers in a department in which native creations are not only worthy of dignified consideration but actually challenge it. Who indeed is Philip Scharwenka, whose stupid symphonic poem was performed last evening, that his music should be admitted to the symphony concerts when there are scores of composers like Paine, Chadwick, McDowell, Buck, Whiting and others whom Mr. Nikisch so persistently ignores? Recall, too, that mediocre overture by schoolmaster Reinecke, that the orchestra played last week, and tell us, if possible, the artistic why and wherefore that has any bearing upon Mr. Nikisch's taste in the make-up of his programmes? It is high time that the conductor of the symphony orchestra should appreciate the fact that a foreign label is not necessarily a proof of excellence or a native label of inferiority, and that native composers in the field of music should receive from him, who awoke first in this country to find himself famous, the same respect and attention that contemporaneous composers in the field of literature do. The Dvorak suite, with which the concert began last evening, while perhaps not representing the composer at his worthiest, is a thoroughly individual piece of music, mostly scored for string band, with charming oboe effects in the opening pastorale, the full orchestra only being employed in the last movement. The composer having an intuitive predilection for musical piquancy lets it run riot throughout the suite which in the Finale furiant is wondrously vivid and fascinating. Against a large portion of the music it might be urged with some force that it is somewhat too Slavonic in thought, but considerable of it, notably the Minnett and Romanze is nevertheless very beautiful and very impressive. It especially reflects credit upon the composor's command of the technics of composition and instrumentation. The soloist for the concert was Miss Emma Juch, who was heard in the recitative and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," Act II, No. 13, and in the song with orchestra, "Die Lorely," by Franz Liszt.

That Miss Juch was quite unequal to the eloquent demands of the Weber aria seemed a foregone conclusion. There was no disappointment. Miss Juch is conspicuously a lyric soprano and wholly irregardless of her vocal limitations she attempted to interpret a scene which only a Titjens or a Neilson could hope to present with adequate success. The tones of her voice which cover a wide range, are inherently pure and pregnant with charm, were often strained beyond their normal timbre, and with the logical result of a pantomimic kind of vocalism that seemed to divert the attention of of all present from the aria itself to the always fascinating personality of the gifted Miss Juch. With the song by Liszt "The Loseley" the artiste was more successful, and sang with no inconsiderable formancy and depth of expression yet as in the Weber aria with an uncertain intonation that was neither offensively false nor exactly true, but that nevertheless deviated beyond cavil from the correct pitch. Miss Juch was loudly applauded and many times recalled. The concert ended with Gade's charming symphony in B-flat. Of recent years, notably since the time when the Harvard Musical Association gave their Symphony Concerts, the music of Neils Gades has been repeatedly neglected here, yet it was a musician of no less rank than Mendlesohn who once referred to Gade as "the only thoroughly original apparition in the musical life of the day." The Composer's Symphony in b flat major is an uncommonly well-written, scholarly and effective work, concice in statement, pure in style, and full of melody. The orchestral performance of it was all that one would wish, the reading of the work being no less unimpeachable than was the invariably prompt unanimous and sympathetic response to the interpreter's baton. At the next concert Saturday evening, Nov. 12, the soloists will be Mr. T. Adamwoski; two symphonies will be performed, one by Saint Saeus in a minor, and Beethoven's second symphony; the violin concerto in F sharp minor by Ernst, and a Humoresque (new) for orchestra by E. Humferdink.

C. L. C.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the second Symphony concert of the present season, in Music hall, the programme was:

Reinecke: Overture to "King Manfred."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor.
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.
Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

The Reinecke Overture is a musicianly composition, and was well received. It was its first production here, and the orchestra did excellent work.

Mr. Carl Stasny played with painstaking care Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, and was heartily recalled.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony, given for the first time in Boston, is an elaborate work and a fine example of symphonic writing. It shows its slavic origin most markedly, and is an interesting composition. It was in striking contrast to the Reinecke Overture.

The programme last evening was:

Dvorak, suite for orchestra; Weber, aria from "Oberon"; Philipp Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen"; Liszt, song, with orchestra, "Die Loreley"; Gade, symphony in B-flat major. Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 30.

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was listened to by a very large audience. The programme was: Suite, by Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, "Fruehlingswogen," P. Scharwenka (first time here); Song, "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony, B-flat, Gade. The soloist was Miss Emma Juch. The Dvorak suite was originally brought out here by Mr. Gericke. It is a piquant work, original, brilliant and interesting, and improves on acquaintance. By the way, the programme was very edifying in its notice of Dvorak, especially in connection with the pronunciation of his name, which, we learn, might be phonetically spelled in English, "Dvwhor-zhack," the r being silent. To achieve the phonetic English for Dvw will make exceedingly entertaining practice for those who are at a loss for some amusement to wile away an idle hour. We learn, also, that it is divided: Dvo-rak. This is important, because there would naturally be a tendency to divide them: Dv-ora-k. The suite was exceedingly well played. The Scharwenka Symphonic poem is an industrious if not wholly lucid bit of trifling about nothing in particular. It is not quite clear what it is all about, and there is over much groping after cheap thematic development. It is long, but all that it says could have been said in half the space of time without making it any more interesting. There is throughout, a strong suggestion of parlor pianoforte pieces of the "By the Sea," "On the Lake," "Fluttering Leaves" and "Summer Breezes" order. Now and then there is an ambitious outburst of deeper sentiment, but it destroys the general balance. When a thing is essentially and consistently inane, it is scarcely judicious to disturb it by brief, incongruous flights in the direction of comparative sense. As a painful aberration, the music is not without a certain melancholy interest; but as a mixture it becomes unsatisfactory from any point of view. There were some pleasing moments in it, devoted to welcome reminiscences of Wagner, Schumann, Raff, Gounod and Ambroise Thomas. The depressing feature of the work was the apparent unwillingness of the composer to bring it to an end. The elegant, polished and always delightful Gade symphony was heard again with genuine delight. Here the composer knew when he had said all that it was necessary to say, and, artist-like, ended when he had said it. The work of the orchestra was the best of the season thus far. The selection from "Oberon" was the noble scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster." Miss Juch sang it with a full appreciation of its broad dramatic character. The artist's voice sounded worn, and was hardly of the large quality suited to the demands of the work, but the interpretation was wholly intelligent. Curiously enough Miss Juch sang it in German. As it was written to English words and was originally sung in English, it is not easy to understand why it should have been given in any other tongue, especially as the singer is perfectly at home in our language. She was three times recalled at the close of the aria. In "The Loreley" song, she was not as successful as she was in the other. Here, oddly enough, again, she sang in English, when the original is in German. As the translation is miserably bad, there was a good excuse for abandoning it in favor of Heine's own words. The ways of prima donnas, however, are inscrutable. Miss Juch was twice recalled for this song. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in A minor, op. 55, Saint-Saëns (first time); Concerto for violin, Ernst; Humoresque, E. Humperdink, and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 15, Miss Marguerite Hall, assisting. The programme is: Quartet, G-major, Mozart; Songs; and Quartet D-major, op. 63, Gade. Tickets for the season and for single concerts may now be had at Music Hall.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1892.

The programme of the Symphony concert on Saturday evening comprised Dvorak's suite for orchestra in D major; recitative and aria from "Oberon"; Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen"; Liszt's "Die Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B flat major.

The musical public was first introduced to Dvorak's suite by Mr. Gericke, and the favorable impression created at the first hearing was only increased under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. It is a thoroughly interesting as well as enjoyable work, full of quaint movements and brilliant ideas, and was rendered with excellent taste.

Scharwenka's symphonic poem was interesting from its oddity. In was in many ways unlike this singular composer's other works, and while pleasing in fragments, left rather an unsatisfactory effect as a whole.

Gade's symphony is familiar to the patrons of these concerts, and is always acceptable, especially when so admirably rendered, not only as far as the orchestra is concerned, but by the judicious taste of the conductor.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. She gave the aria from "Oberon" with fine effect, although at times the orchestral accompaniment was too powerful and overpowered the efforts of the singer. "Die Loreley" was also well given, the fault on the part of the orchestra being less noticeable. The programme for the next concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 12, will be: Saint-Saens, symphony in A minor, op. 55; E. W. Ernst, concerto for violin in F sharp minor; E. Humperdink, humoresque for orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2; soloist, T. Adamowski.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Penn.

ate 10/31/92

The symphony to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Academy of Music, next Wednesday evening, is that by Tschaikowsky, No. 5, in E minor, which has not yet been heard in Philadelphia. It is in four movements, allegro, andante cantabile, valse (allegro moderato) and finale (andante maestoro), and is said to be an interesting and characteristic work. One will here notice the substitution of a valse movement for the usual scherzo. Other orchestral numbers at the concert will be the "Oberon" overture and "Parsifal" vorspeil. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, her selections being Weber's aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and Liszt's "Loreley."

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1892.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A Singular Preference Shown by Miss Emma Juch.

The Secret Choice of Charles Baudelaire, Wagnerite.

The programme of the third symphony concert was as follows:

Suite for orchestra, op. 39.....Dvorak
"Ocean! thou mighty monster".....Weber
Symphonic Poem, "Fruehlingswogen".....P. Scharwenka
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony No. 4, B flat.....Gade

Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

There is a spontaneity in the suite by Dvorak that is thoroughly delightful; that is sought for in vain in later and more ambitious works by him. There is here no groping after an effect, no vague oracular shriek from a Bohemian tripod. The different numbers are not unlike cabinet pictures of folk life. The people are presented frankly in their simplicity and jollity. Such fresh and melodious music is welcome in the close air of Music Hall. The Dvorak polka makes more for musical righteousness than symphonic-poems "in eight mystic devices and three paraphrases" or symphonies that are said to represent the struggle of Man with the Infinite. Nor is the furiant, known of old as the furie, to be despised. Perhaps in time we may become acquainted with the chodovska, the husitska, the Umriec, the skakava, the strasak, and the baborak; for the Bohemians are a people of many steps, and Afred Waldan, in his "Bohemian National Dances," writes of 136 distinct varieties in the manner of stamping, gliding and leaping into the air.

***

It was a pleasure to hear again the severe and beautiful symphony of Gade. To be sure it is not great music in the modern sense of the term. Gade is here simply a maker of music; he is not a "tone poet," nor a "seer," nor a "revolutionary." He is a man of musical temperament, who learned the art of expressing himself clearly and often with grace. He has no startling story to shock or confound the hearer; he is agreeable, sympathetic, at times eloquent in speech. In his eloquence he rarely raises his voice, and he never screams. He does not linger, hat in hand, with idle repetitions. His leave taking is neither abrupt, nor is it like unto that peculiar parting of two women busied in a social function, the parting that assumes the importance of the death-bed, although it is only for a day. And in this symphony Gade is not so cruelly choked by Mendelssohn as in certain of his other works.

***

Ten years ago Mr. Philipp Scharwenka was a good-natured man who lived in Berlin, where he relished a jest and was persuaded occasionally by an impatient pupil to give him a lesson in composition. His laziness was then as traditional as his good nature. He still lives in Berlin. That he is still lazy and fond of jesting is revealed by his symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen," for he shuns the labor of original thinking and plays a musical joke on the hearer. We are informed that the composer has taken "a single, simple idea, the general upheaving or 'billowing' of animate nature at the arrival of spring," but to illustrate this idea he has taken many ideas from predecessors and contemporaries. Nor is he fastidious in his choice—Richard Wagner and Albert Jungmann are held by him in equal esteem. "Siegfried" yeast excites the musical fermentation of Scharwenka; and when he feels himself possessed and gives vent to his own exuberance he sings a saccharine melody that might have been written by Oesten or Chas. Morley. Then he is so garrulous after he has inserted firmly a finger in the button hole! It is possible, after all, that Scharwenka was serious in his intent and felt a personal interest in his interminable platitudes and incongruous quotations, "just as a drunkard who cannot articulate supposes himself oracular."

***

This symphonic poem was played last week for the first time in Boston. New York listened to it in December, 1891. Chicago wondered at it in the January of this year.

***

Miss Emma Juch sang the celebrated scene and air of Rezia from "Oberon" in German. Now Weber wrote the music to an English text for an English singer and an English audience. The German translation by Th. Hell was not made until the composer had finished the opera with sole view to the musical illustration of the lines of Planche. Mary Anne Paton was the name of the singer who created the part at the Covent Garden Theatre—the beautiful Miss Paton, who was happier afterward as Mrs. Joseph Wood (under which name she was known to Bostonians of a former generation) than when she enjoyed the doubtful honor of a Scotch marriage with Lord William Pitt Lennox. Nor did Weber complain of her nationality, nor did he sigh for the sound of the German guttural. On the contrary, he wrote his wife that Miss Paton "sang divinely." There was not a German in the cast that memorable night of the 12th of April, 1826. (Not until late in December of that year was the opera sung in German, and then at Leipzig.) Furthermore, the patriotic Weber, who worked so earnestly for German art, was loud in his praises of the English singers. And why? Because "they were masters of the Italian school." But this was long before the opinion prevailed that the art of song was merely an affair of the intellect, only to be fully understood by German men and women.

***

Miss Juch cannot plead in excuse a lack of familiarity with our language. She sings it with rare beauty of enunciation and pronunciation. She has been identified prominently with English opera. She sang last Saturday evening "Die Loreley" in English. The superb opening of the great scene with the setting of the words "Ocean, thou mighty monster," is known to all. Are the following words to be preferred for power of expression or charm of euphony: "Ocean, Du Ungeheuer! Schlangen gleich naelst du umschlungen rund die ganze Welt!" Has Juch perhaps found a meaning in them that appealed to her, some meaning mystic, wonderful, for she chose them although she sang before an English-speaking audience.

***

She sang the scene and air with vocal skill and dramatic intelligence, so that she was applauded deservedly and thrice recalled. In Liszt's elaborate setting of Heine's verses she was less successful. It is true that at times during the evening her voice showed the wear and tear that follow, unfortunately, faithful and long-continued work. But in these days when half-taught or ignorant declaimers disdain the the true notes, short of [illegible] word, making reputations in monstrous fashion; in these days when such declaimers are encouraged until they wax bold and lain would shove true singers from the stage, it is a valued pleasure to hold in grateful remembrance the concert career of Emma Juch.

***

The performance of the orchestral numbers was worthy of undiluted praise. In solo work and in ensemble it was fully up to the old and the established reputation of the organization.

***

Attention is called frequently by the more inflamed disciples of Richard Wagner to the case of Charles Baudelaire, the poet of "Fleurs du Mal.' It is true that in 1861 the "sleepless heart and sombre soul" of Mr. Baudelaire were moved mightily by the theories and the music of Wagner, and he achieved a pamphlet, entitled "Richard Wagner et Tannhauser à Paris," which is now quoted in second-hand book catalogues at seven or eight francs. The world, however, was ignorant of any other views of Mr. Baudelaire concerning music, which, by the way, he treated only from the standpoint of the layman, until Mr. Jules Claretie lately revealed the inner soul of the poet-critic. This revelation deserves a separate paragraph.

***

"I hear him still telling us, with a grimace not to be forgotten: 'I adore Wagner. But the music I prefer is that of a cat hung up by his tail outside of a window and trying to stick to the panes of glass with its claws. There is an odd grating on the glass which I find at the same time strange, irritating and singularly harmonious.'"

PHILIP HALE.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartette will take place in Chickering Hall, Tuesday afternoon, November 15. The programme will include Quartette, G major, Mozart, and Quartette, D major, op. 63, Gade. Miss Marguerite Hall will sing a group of songs. Tickets for the season and for single concerts may now be had at Music Hall.

The second concert of the Knepsel Quartette will be given in Chickering Hall Monday evening, Nov. 7. The programme will be as follows: Quartette, E flat Lalo (first time); Schuman's Sonata, for pianoforte and violin, A minor; Quartette, D minor, Schubert. Mr. Clayton Johns will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 122.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1892.

Miss Emma Juch, Soloist at the Symphony Concert—Cyril Tyler's Farewell Tonight—Rice's Popular at the Park This Evening—Other Attractions, News Notes and Gossip.

An admirably varied programme was performed at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening under the direction of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, the soloist being Miss Emma Juch, soprano.

The selections of the evening included Dvorak's suite for orchestra; Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon"; Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen"; Liszt's song (with orchestra), "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B flat major.

The appearance of Miss Juch gave her many admirers in this city a welcome pleasure, and she has seldom made a more emphatic success than on this occasion. The great dramatic aria from "Oberon," which so severely tests the abilities of the best equipped soprano, was given with splendid breadth and artistic finish, its contrasting movements displaying the admirable vocal gifts of the artist to the best advantage. Miss Juch's delivery of the number was well calculated to call out the commendation of the most critical, and a well merited ovation rewarded the singer as she concluded the selection. Liszt's beautiful "Loreley" is a composition which is seldom heard with full satisfaction, as the demands it makes upon the musical intelligence of the singer are rarely met. Miss Juch is singularly gifted in the intellectual attainments demanded in the proper interpretation of this song, and last evening she fairly disarmed criticism by the admirable fashion in which she realized all its beauties. The sentiment, feeling and intelligence shown in the delivery of the number, the artistic grace which characterized its phrasing, and the purity and correctness of the tones of the singer, combine to make the song a source of keen enjoyment, and to win for the singer another grand demonstration.

The novelty of the evening consisted of the spring poem by Philipp Scharwenka, which was given its first hearing here on this occasion. The composition appeals with rare success to the poetic and sentimental characteristics of the music loving public, the fanciful idea of depicting in true colors the opening of spring being carried out with artist cleverness and singularly pleasing realism. The principal theme is elaborated with admirable skill, and the instrumental combination, as well as the working out, gives evidence of the master's hand. Mr. Nikisch brought all his great talents for the successful interpretation of this class of writings to the reading of this true poem, and his performance of the composition gave entire satisfaction.

The sharp contrasting movements of the Dvorak suite were given a delightful interpretation and Mr. Nikisch was also particularly happy in his reading of the Gade symphony, which has never had a more pleasing production than on this occasion.

The orchestra makes its first occasional tour during the coming week and resumes its home concerts on the 11th of November, when Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

How it would have delighted the heart of any true Bostonian to have been present at the welcome extended Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony orchestra at the brilliant opening of the Providence season. The sale, to begin with, was a floral one, and the genial Mr. Comee, who manages the Providence series, disbursed the tickets amid a beautiful chrysanthemum display. The floral idea was next tendered to Mr. Nikisch, as, upon entering Infantry Hall, he found his stand converted into a support for smilax and roses. The applause which greeted his entrance came from an audience which included the wealth and musical culture of Providence, and was in size the largest that has ever greeted the Symphony, the sale even for the opening concert exceeding by $1000 any sale of previous seasons. This appreciation of an orchestra of which Boston is so justly proud has extended to Washington, where the opening sale of seats was a test for the ingenuity and urbanity of Mr. Comee to satisfy everybody's demand for the best seats obtainable.

[28]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1892.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

A PLEASANT MINGLING OF OLD AND NEW.

The Dvorak Work a Sort of Apotheosis of National Dance Music, Well Rendered—Miss Juch Welcomed Back—Liszt in Vocal English Not a Success—Gade's Symphony.

Again a programme of new instrumental numbers, or of numbers so old that they became practically new, and it was a line of modern work which exhibited our conductor at his best. The Dvorak work, which began the concert, falsified the Shakesperian line,

I am never merry when I hear Suite music.

for this Suite swept the gamut of merriment from placid gaiety to hilarious frenzy. It is a sort of apotheosis of national dance-music, and it gives rather an overdose of Terpsichore. The pastoral introduction is its best number, for here there is a degree of development and figure treatment which is interesting. There is an intentional monotony of bass (a sort of "ground-bass"), that is attractive. The movement was well played and the oboe work, of which there was an abundance, was commendable. Mr. Sautet not only blows the thin and tender tone of the French school (which is peculiarly appropriate in these rustic effects), but at times gives the broad, full tone which one hears from the German players, and which approaches the quality of the English horn.

Now followed a polka movement. As the "Puika" is a national dance of Bohemia it was natural to expect it in a Bohemian suite, but, after all, its rhythm is the least adapted to interesting treatment, and while the polonaise, the mazurka, the minuet, the gavotte and the waltz all have points that can be developed to some purpose in orchestral music of the better sort, the polka remains barren even when treated by the masters, and Raff and Rubinstein, as well as Dvorak, have become prosy or conventional when dealing with its 2-4 measures.

The minuet which came next was dainty in the extreme, and had a pretty little skip in its chief figure which was charming. It reminded one of the elfin Minuet which Berlioz introduced in the "Damnation of Faust."

The Romanza gives plenty of musical sugar, and a conversation between the flute and the English horn might be a dialogue of a youth and maiden. The flute obbligato work was finely given, and the rest of the woodwind also deserves praise.

But now came more dancing in the shape of a "Furiante" (again a folkdance of Bohemia) and more of spiced bizarrerie. Goulasch may be good food, but one can tire even of ever-recurring Goulasch, and the very caprice displayed began to have a suspicion of sameness. Brilliant tone coloring is certainly present in the movement, but the effect produced on the writer was as if he had been at an art exhibition where the painter used only scarlet, pea green, sky blue and bright yellow.

Now came Miss Emma Juch and received a welcome that must have assured her that the Boston public remembers her former artistic triumphs. She sang "Ocean, thou mighty monster!" from Weber's "Oberon," with fine musical intelligence, and her climaxes both in high and low register were well worked up; but the voice was not altogether broad enough for the ambitious number, and more han once seemed forced. Beside a Materna or a Lehmann rendering of this dramatic scene the performance would have shown decided shortcomings. The public, however, appreciated the artistic efforts of the singer and gave the heartiest applause. It was a mistake to give Liszt's "Loreley" in English, or, in fact, to give it at all. Liszt is a decidedly unvocal writer, and the spasmodic gasps, and shrieks, and moanings, and groanings of the vocal part, not to speak of the wild modulations of the orchestra, make the tender folksong so grandiloquent that one longs even for the simplicity of Silcher's setting as a relief. Yet there is one beautiful theme in the work which gives a picture of tranquillity and sadness, and in this Miss Juch's voice was most effective and tender, because unforced.

Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen" was rather too ecstatic and long-drawn out. Such an amount of surging and tempestuous trouble is not generally associated with spring, and there were fierce dissonances that could only picture a New England spring in its early and catarrh-breeding stages. But judged apart from any definite picture, the work showed a deft hand in using orchestral color and a passion for thematic development that was interesting even though it sometimes led to unclearness. The horn calls (played a trifle flat) reminded one of the manner in which Schumann awakened the spring in his B flat symphony. The harp had prominent work to do and Mr. Schuecker played his part clearly and most artistically. I suspect that there is more in the work than appears at a first hearing, and can only say that the primary impression was of vague beauty, excessive length, bold modulation, and modern ecstacy. It formed an excellent foil to Gade's B-flat symphony, and also served to remind one that Gade's singing of spring (he has written two short but glorious cantatas on the topic) was more easily comprehended.

Gade's symphony closed the concert. It may be true that Gade, in his symphonic writing especially, played moon to Mendelssohn's sun, but his treatment is none the less symmetrical and worthy, and he is as concise as heart could wish. Charming it was, after all the excitement of ultra-modern musical spasms and agonies, to hear a logical work with clear relationship of themes and intelligible development. And the violins played the chief theme as they loved it, while the cellos and horns did the same for the second. The pleasant treatment of the two-noted figure ("Mrs. Mendelssohn," cried the German critics,) was well brought out. The whole work received a good reading, save that the finale was made a little too fiery. At times, too, the middle voices which also have independent thoughts to present occasionally, were not heard because of the impetuosity of the violins.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, brought the following programme with it:

Dvorak: Suite for orchestra, in D major, Opus 39.
Weber: Recitative and Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
Philipp Scharwenka: Symphonic Poem, "Frühlingswogen," in A-flat major, Opus 87.
Liszt: Song with orchestra, "Die Loreley."
Gade: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Opus 20.
Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

The Dvorak suite has been heard here before: it is one of the Bohemian composer's most genial works—bright, sunny, and, except in a few ill-sounding places, musical in spirit and form. Where the music borders dangerously upon the flimsy and the trivial, as it does at times, Dvorak has known how to save it by a certain native charm that is very winning. The closing Furiant is one of the most spirited things of his in this vein that we know of; it carried off the honors of the suite with the audience. The whole suite was admirably played, and the effect it produced left little or nothing to be desired.

Philipp Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen" was given (with some considerable, but very welcome, cuts) for the first time here. The composer calls it a symphonic poem, but it has less definiteness of poetic, or picturesque, purpose than most of the compositions we have hitherto known by that name. It is pleasant-sounding, rather unpretentious music, agreeably scored for full modern orchestra, but totally lacking in genius or distinction of any sort. It might have been written by Fritz Spindler, had that "pianoforte-pupil's best friend" been in the habit of writing for orchestra. There is little to criticise in it, save that it does not in the least fill the requirements of a composition for a serious symphony concert. When one listens to music at such a solemnity, one likes at least to feel one's self in communion with a mind of some distinction, with one that has something to say. Scharwenka shows here that he has exceedingly little to say and that only of the most commonplace sort. It was capitally played.

Gade's ever beautiful and lovely B-flat symphony came like a refreshing shower in the desert. One hears so little by him nowadays, and so much by men who fly with a more heroic, or at least with a more strenuous, wing, that one looks forward to hearing a work of his once more with something of distrust, with a little fear that his whilom charm and fascination may seem a trifle aged and withered; but no, when he is at his best, as he is in this symphony, he is found to be still the same bright, poetic, fascinating Gade, to have lost none of his native charm. Apart from the intrinsic beauty of this symphony, one finds something peculiarly winning in the orchestration; take, for instance, those cantilena passages in the slow movement, where the first violins soar high up above all the other strings in a rare atmosphere of their own, the distance between them and the accompaniment being as it were made less sensible by the melody being doubled by two flutes in octaves; how light, buoyant and sunny this sounds in comparison with the stress of octaves and double octaves between first and second violins and 'celli that more modern composers (especially the French and Russians) employ ad nauseam! What richness, warmth and variety of color Gade obtains, without any overloading or loss of clearness! And, when he does use the more voluptuous lower tones that are now so popular—as in the wonderful conclusion-theme, for horn and 'celli, in the first movement—what absolutely entrancing effects he produces!

The scherzo (the gem of the symphony) was taken a little faster by Mr. Nikisch than we have been accustomed to hear it here. As far as the indications in the score go, there is no objection to be made to this; for, although the movement is marked Allegro, ma non troppo e tranquillamente, it is still marked Allegro, and not Allegretto. We believe this is the first time we have ever complained of Mr. Nikisch for not giving in to the now prevailing fashion of "slow Allegros." Still, in this case, it does seem to us that the peculiarly sly humor of the theme in G minor could be given more point and made more caustic by a slightly more deliberate tempo. This theme always seems to say, as some pretty girl might to a pair of lovers: "Ah! you two trios; you may play the guitar and sing love-songs under my window as much as you please: but if you think to catch me in that way—pooh!" You can actually see it wink and laugh in its sleeve. The performance, with the exception of this one flaw (which is, after all, but a matter of opinion), was admirable in the extreme; it showed the full beauty and grace of the delightful work. It was a rare treat to hear it; and now, if Mr. Nikisch would only give us the E major symphony too (the one with the march-like finale), we should have nothing more to ask on Gade's score.

Miss Juch sang the great "Ozean! du Ungeheuer"—albeit the scena is a trifle large for her in admirable style. Her voice not being of the very largest calibre, such as Weber had in his mind when writing the scene, forces her to give a rather weak, sentimental tinge to one or two of the more tremendous passages ("Ein Schreck bist du" for instance): but her singing was almost throughout forcible, artistic, and in a finely broad and grand style; in the finale ("Mein Hüon! mein Gatte! etc." she carried everything before her.

Liszt's "Loreley" seems, strange to say, to gain nothing in force or color by its orchestral dress: the original accompaniment is essentially pianoforte writing, and loses more than it gains by being scored for orchestra. Still, in a hall like the Music Hall, the orchestral version is to be preferred for obvious reasons. Miss Juch sang it very beautifully indeed; perhaps one could have wished for a thought more of voluptuous languor in that siren-like melody to the words "Die Luft ist Kühl und es dunkelt, etc." One also missed the ring of the pianoforte pedal here; the phrases of the accompaniment sounded too detatched. But it was an exceedingly beautiful performance nevertheless. Miss Juch was rapturously applauded and repeatedly recalled after both songs.

The next programme (for Saturday after next, Nov. 12) is: Saint-Saëns, symphony in A minor, opus 55; Ernst, violin concerto in one movement, in F sharp minor; Humperdink, humoresque for orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2, in D major. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the violinist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 30, 1892.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Emma Juch the Soloist and the Programme One of Great Variety.

It was a programme of unusual variety which Conductor Nikisch presented at the third of this season's symphony concerts. There were a suite for orchestra, a symphonic poem, a symphony, and two songs for soprano.

The attendance was of the usual size, a size which severely taxes the capacity of Music Hall. There was also the customary measure of carefully considered applause for the conductor, the orchestra and the soloist.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist, and her appearance was most welcome. She has long been a favorite here, and deservingly so. There are few American prima donnas —Miss Juch, although of foreign birth, may very properly be considered an American—who are better equipped with voice, presence and dramatic talent for concert or operatic work, and there are still fewer who are more conscientious and ambitious in their efforts to adhere to the higher class of music, regardless of the financial sacrifices which may in consequence be necessitated.

She sang two numbers last evening, the recitative and aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and Liszt's "Die Loreley," with orchestral accompaniment. The recitative was sung with an effect of simple sincerity and artistic expression, and exactness and purity of tone which have so often been commended in Miss Juch's singing of oratorical music, and which has won for her in that class of music a position of unquestioned prominence.

The aria was sung delightfully, the higher notes were deliciously clear, the lower tones charmingly rich and full, and the difficult staccato passages were executed with ease and artistic finish.

Rare expression and sympathetic interpretation marked her singing of the beautiful "Die Loreley" melody, and the enthusiastic plaudits which three times recalled Miss Juch were thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral accompaniment was praiseworthy in the main, but gentler treatment of certain passages of "Die Loreley" would have been welcome.

The one novelty on the evening's programme was Philipp Scharwenka's "Fruchlingswogen," a "symphon c poem" in A-flat major. It is an interesting work, full of bright, if not particularly original ideas, breezy and animated from beginning to end, plentiful in melody and rich in elaborate and graceful scoring.

It has been described as a "spring poem in tones." It certainly is suggestive of the new life and gayety of springtime, and in its variety of tonal effects it is fanciful and picturesque to a high degree. Short and dainty solos are given nearly all the wind instruments, and these were splendidly played by the members of Director Nikisch's band.

The five movements of Antoin Dvorak's suite for orchestra, in D major, were admirably played. This suite is a work that is particularly characteristic of its composer's original, brilliant and forceful style. There are those who still refuse to accept Dvorak's music with any degree of enthusiasm, but the oftener one hears his writings the more one becomes impressed with the great power, originality and depth of musical feeling that he possesses.

Gade's symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, concluded the concert, and was interpreted in a manner that was evidently thoroughly satisfactory to the audience.

The symphony orchestra will be absent from Boston this week. On Nov. 11 and 12 the programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, op. 55.....Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin in F sharp minor..H. W. Ernst
Humoresque for orchestra.....E. Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven
The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski.

——Mme. Nordica is expected to come over from London early in November to visit her sisters, Mrs. W. F. Baldwin and Mrs. George A. Walker, in Dorchester, for two months or more.

——The largest audience of the season assembled for the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, the appearance of Mme. Juch as soloist being somewhat responsible for the crowd. She looked extremely well in black india silk with a groundwork of pink roses. The bodice was of black lace with narrow gold bands of embroidery over a low cut black corsage. Her profusion of blonde hair was simply arranged on her finely shaped head. She sang beautifully and was greeted with unusual applause for a matinee.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 30, 1892.

PHILHARMONIC.

It has been a custom for many years not to regard the local musical season as fairly opened until the Brooklyn Philharmonic society has taken the field. This formal initial event will occur this week. The series of performances will begin with the public rehearsal of next Friday afternoon, November 4. Mr. Nikisch will be commander in chief for the second year and his forces will comprise ninety first class instrumentalists. While the name of rehearsal is preserved, it is well known that it is such but nominally. This permanent orchestra is so thoroughly trained and is so subject to the discipline of constant playing together, with no disturbing practice under differing direction, that the best production may be looked for at a so called rehearsal no less than at a concert. The same programme will be heard on Saturday night, November 5. It is as follows:

Overture—"Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Aria—"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster".....Weber
Miss Juch.
Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde"
Wagner
Song, with orchestra—"Loreley.....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky

THE STANDARD UNION.
MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 31, 1892.
SIX PAGES.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The arrangements by which the concerts of the Philharmonic Society are to be given again by the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives great satisfaction in musical circles, and there are many indications that the coming season will be one of unusual brilliancy. Mr. Nikisch and his men have won a high place in the esteem of concert patrons in this city by their splendid performances, and it is gratifying to note the increased interest in these concerts which is shown by the great demand for season tickets. The sale until now is nearly double that of last year. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
Varspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Song, with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in E. Minor, No. 5..Tschaikowsky

The sale of season tickets is now progressing at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street.

The sale of single tickets for the first concert opens next Wednesday.

Clipping from Gazette
Date 10-29

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Nordica and Other Eminent Artists Will Appear Here.

The management announces that the soloists, excepting one, have been engaged for the coming season's course of Boston Symphony concerts. First and foremost is Mme. Nordica, who so greatly pleased Worcester audiences in the Festival of 1891. Not only did she create a furor here but in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Chicago. Worcester is to be congratulated on this exceptional opportunity to hear this great artist with such a perfected organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is quite likely she will make her first public appearance in this country for the coming season at this concert.

The pianist to appear in the course is Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, one of the greatest women pianists living. She has been heard in this city but once, and on that occasion was vociferously re-called five times. Huneker in the Musical Courier says: "She is a bundle of nerves, a great temperament, as our Gallic neighbor across the sea would say. Her magnetism, her unconquerable audacity of execution, the sustained dash and fire, all under the control of a musical imagination as rare as it is bold, all contribute to make the name of Fannie Bloomfield a lodestone for all lovers of artistic pianism."

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing in one of the concerts as solist and in the same concert will be heard Herr Alwin Schroeder the famous 'cellist. Mrs. Nikisch is more than a noted man's wife, she is an artist herself. She was musically educated at the Cologne Conservatory and upon completing her studies appeared in Opera in such famous musical centres as Berlin, Leipsic and Cassel, in 1888. Mr. Nikisch met her while abroad and she returned with him as his wife. Alwin Schroeder is first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra and unsurpassed as a soloist on his chosen instrument. For 11 years he played first 'cello in the famous Gervaudhaus Orchestra, which shows him to be on a par with the greatest 'cellists of the world. Success everywhere attended him in Europe and has followed him to this country. It is with pride the Boston Symphony numbers him among its numbers.

The management has yet to engage one other artist, and is at present negotiating with, and hopes to secure one who in New York and Boston during the past season outshone Patti.

The management wish it understood that while no pains or money will be spared in securing eminent soloists, that the orchestra itself is the main feature of these concerts, and on its excellence they base the claim for public patronage. The first concert will be held Tuesday, Nov. 22, and the sale opens for subscribers Nov. 10 at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s. The sale will be open to the public on Nov. 12.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-28

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening next, when the programme will be as follows:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Vorspiel und Liebstod. From "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Song with Orchestra. "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky

Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Four more concerts will follow on Wednesday evenings—December 7, January 11, February 8 and March 15. The ticket office is at 1221 Chestnut.

Mr. Adamowski, [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give his fourth series of chamber concerts in Philadelphia during the coming season at the new Century Drawing Room, Twelfth street below Sansom, on Thursdays, November 3 and December 8, 1892, Wednesday, January 11, 1893, and Thursdays, February 9 and March 16, at 2.15 P. M., precisely. The programme will consist of quartets and trios, chosen from the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, etc., as well as the modern composers. That for next Thursday is as follows: Quartet, G major, No. 14, Mozart; Nouvelette for violin and piano, T. Adamowski, and Quartet in D major, Op. 63, Gade.

[29]

FADED TEXT

TIMES, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-30

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasy, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Emma Juch will sing two numbers.

PRESS, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10-30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No one interested in music need be apprised of the importance of next Wednesday evening's event at the Academy of Music—the first of this season's five concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch. The programme will be as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from 'Oberon,'.....Weber
Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isoide".....Wagner
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky

The Tschaikowsky symphony has never been given in Philadelphia. The soloist of the concert will be Emma Juch, the popular soprano. The orchestra is said to be this season in better form than ever before, to say which, is to utter the highest laudation.

The Adamowski Chamber Concert.

Mr. Adamowski, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will inaugurate his fourth series of chamber concerts in this city (of which five will be given in all) next Thursday at 2.15 P. M. in the New Century Drawing Room, with the following programme:—

Quartette, G Major, No. 12.....Mozart
Nouvelette for violin and piano....T. Adamowski
Quartette, D major, Op. 63.....Gade

SUN, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-30

No better orchestral music is now heard in New York city than that produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The first of this season's performances is to be given on Thursday evening next in Chickering Hall. Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist, and the programme embraces: Overture Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet".Tschaikowsky
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
Queen Mab Scherzo from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Song, with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

The Boston Orchestra may also be heard in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of that city, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, in the Academy of Music. The programme, which is the same on both occasions, consists of overture "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Varspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Symphony in E minor, No. 5, Tschaikowsky and solo numbers by Miss Emma Juch.

Clipping from Record Philadelphia
Date 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening next, when the programme will comprise Weber's "Oberon" overture, the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of "Tristan and Isolde," and a symphony by Tschaikowsky in E minor, which has not yet been played in Philadelphia. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Her selections are Weber's aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting, with orchestral accompaniment of the "Loreley" legend.

Clipping from Times Philadelphia
Date 10-31

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, accompanied by Miss Emma Juch as soloist, will give the first concert of its series at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. The programme is as follows: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," Weber; Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; song, with orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt; Symphony in E Minor, No. 5, Tschaikowsky.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 10/30

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening next, November 2, when the program will comprise Weber's beautiful "Oberon" overture, the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of "Tristan and Isolde," and a symphony by Tschaikowsky in E minor, which has not yet been played in Philadelphia, and is said to be an extremely vigorous and interesting work. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Her selections are Weber's aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting, with orchestral accompaniment, of the "Lorley" legend.

The Adamowski Concerts.

Mr. Adamowski, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give his fourth series of chamber concerts in Philadelphia, during the coming season, at the New Century Drawing Room, Twelfth street below Sansom, on Thursdays, November 3, and December 8, 1892, Wednesday, January 11, 1893, and Thursdays, February 9 and March 16, at 2.15 P. M., precisely. The program for the first concert is as follows: Quartet, G major, No. 12, Mozart; Nouvelette for violin and piano, T. Adamowski; Quartet, D major, op. 63, Gade.

Clipping from Times Philadelphia
Date 10/31

The programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert, at Chickering Hall, on Thursday evening, includes Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantaisie, the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Schumann's Symphony in D minor. Miss Emma Juch will sing Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!" and Liszt's "Loreley," with orchestral accompaniment.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 10-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening next, November 2, when the programme will comprise Weber's beautiful "Oberon" overture, the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of Tristan and Isolde and a symphony by Tschaikowsky in E minor, which has not yet been played in Philadelphia, and is said to be an extremely vigorous and interesting work. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Her selections are Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting, with orchestral accompaniment, of the "Lorelei" legend.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN—
NOVEMBER 1, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Nikisch Was at His Best—The Concert a Great Success.

Ford's Opera House was filled to overflowing yesterday evening by a cultivated and musical audience to hear the only concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The whole performance was highly satisfactory, and caused still greater praise to be given to this already famous organization. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist of the evening. She only sang twice, notwithstanding the tremendous applause which greeted her after each selection, and the fact that she received a large bunch of flowers, which was considered rather ungracious by some. In both instances she was accompanied by the orchestra.

Her voice shows remarkable cultivation and strength.

In the aria from "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," she at times almost filled the theater with her voice, rising above the sounds of the instruments, and at the end bursting forth in a grand climax. Her second song, "Loreley," was of an entirely different kind, and was rendered with a great deal of feeling and expression. Every one seemed to want to hear again this charming melody of Liszt.

Only one of Wagner's compositions was given by the orchestra, "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan Und Isolde," which was written at the time of his greatest power, and is now regarded as the most perfect of all the composer's tragic creations. It was played with great perfection, the exquisite harmony causing delight. At times one could scarcely believe that more than one powerful instrument was in use, so perfect was the rhythm.

The last part of the program was devoted to the C minor symphony of Ludwig von Beethoven, and was the most pleasing of all. It is said that Beethoven got much of his inspiration for his magnificent compositions during long walks through the country, which can readily be imagined after listening to this waltz, which is the most famous of them all.

The pathetic sadness, the outbursts of enthusiasm, the visions of happiness which come to an artistic soul when alone with nature are all shown, and were all expressed by the skilful manipulation of the instruments yesterday evening. Mr. Nikisch is a wonderful conductor. Every look and gesture was seen by every man, and the whole performance was as smooth and harmonious as the compositions.

In the audience were noticed a great number of socially prominent persons, amongst them Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson, Mrs. Dr. Reuling, Miss Reuling, Mrs. James A. Gary, the Misses Gary, Miss Maud Price, Mr. George Oslack Stone, Mrs. Alexander Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Von Lingen, Dr. Thomas Shearer, Miss Shearer, Miss Mollie George, Miss Gaither, Miss Nannie Barker, Mr. Edward Shoemaker, Miss Sarah Poor, Major Richard Poor, Lieut. Noble, U. S. A.; Mrs. Gordon, Mr. Lawrason Riggs, Dr. Eugene Van Ness, Mr. Percy McLaren.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Penn.
Date 11/1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert on Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening next, November 2, when the programme will comprise Weber's beautiful "Oberon" overture, the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of "Tristan and Isolde," and a symphony by Tschaikowsky in E minor, which has not yet been played in Philadelphia, and is said to be an extremely vigorous and interesting work. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist. Her selections are Weber's aria "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's setting with orchestral accompaniment, of the "Loreley" legend. The ticket office is at 1221 Chestnut street.

The Adamowski Quartet will give the first in the series of five chamber concerts at the New Century Drawing Room on Twelfth street, below Sansom, on Thursday afternoon next, at 2.15. The programme consists of quartets by Mozart and Gale, and of a duet for violin and piano by T. Adamowski.

THE SUN.
BALTIMORE.
NOVEMBER 1, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was but one thing that marred the pleasure of the audience in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Ford's Opera House, and that was the thought that it was probably the only performance of this splendid body of musicians in Baltimore this season. Heretofore the city has been favored with a series of concerts extending at intervals throughout the winter, but the need of a suitable hall handicapped the orchestra to such a degree that it was decided to give but the one when Ford's Opera House was obtainable. The theatre was crowded, and the conductor, Arthur Nikisch, was given a hearty greeting.

The programme was a rather curious combination of works, not altogether artistically arranged, and presenting but one composition that has not been heard time and again in Baltimore. Fortunately these old friends were worthy of a renewal of acquaintance, and were received with appreciation of their beauty and merit. The one comparatively new work was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a rich and original fantasia, a musical interpretation of an old Sanskrit love poem. The well-known numbers were Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," and two vocal numbers—the aria from Weber's "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Lorelei."

The vocalis was Miss Emma Juch, whose pure, true voice and exquisite style were worthy of Liszt's beautiful lyric, and compensated in a great measure for the need of a heavier voice felt in the dramatic "Oberon" aria. Miss Juch is a great favorite in Baltimore, and her hearers naturally grew enthusiastic over her admirable performance, calling her again and again to the stage at the close of her solos.

As to the instrumental numbers, what more potent words could be used than the mere mention of two such works as the scene from "Tristan" and the C minor symphony, these two colossal conceptions that contain some of the most sublime effects in tonal creation, both so far apart in tone and treatment and in the ages in which they were wrought, yet standing side by side in grandeur of though and expression. It was the memories of these two mighty creations that the hearers carried away with them above all the intervening numbers.

The scene from "Tristan" contains one of the grandest climaxes in music, a climax that is reached so gradually, yet so significantly, that its central, all-sufficient burst of harmony seems to contain in its majestic sweep all of the beauty and poetry and spirituality that are opened to the mind and heart in the course of the wonderful tone-poem. After that one absorbing moment the listener feels as if the height had been reached and that every nerve is strained to its utmost. And here with what unerring instinct of genius does the composer gradually and gently soothe the over-wrought emotions, not attempting to sustain an effect that was at once complete and satisfying in itself, nor weakening it by piling climax upon climax.

The programme, being arranged without reference to the time and style of the composers, presented the Beethoven symphony as the closing number. There are few works of other old masters that could have sustained interest after the effect of the Wagner number, but the C minor symphony could and did. Its stateliness and noble breadth were well brought out by the orchestra, though there were occasional Nikischisms that made the interpretation at times different from the usual performance. Notwithstanding the remarkable hieroglyphics the conductor traces in the air with his baton and a slight yielding to the temptation to "pose," Nikisch has his orchestra splendidly under control, and always presents an interesting interpretation.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.
Date 11/1

NIKISCH AND MISS JUCH.

The Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Ford's.

For the first time in several years did the Baltimore music-lovers have an opportunity last night of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to advantage at the concert given in Ford's Opera House. At a number of previous concerts this excellent organization was compelled to squeeze upon a stage hardly large enough for an orchestra half its size and to struggle with poor acoustics. But last night, in a house of ample spaciousness, before a large and critical audience, it was in a position to demonstrate what good music is.

The programme embraced much of what has been heard here before, but seldom has it been given in such an artistic manner, and was, therefore, none the less enjoyable. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist, and showed that she is a vocalist of rare powers. She sang the recitation and aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and Liszt's "Loreley." As usual she showed her dramatic training, and her singing was very effective.

The first orchestral number was Goldmark's Oriental overture "Sakuntala." This work if rendered by any other than a proficient orchestra has a superficial ring. The working out of the themes is given to the celli, violin, harp, and reed, with an occasional scattering of brass.

The second number was the "Prelude" and "Love Death," from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Its departure from the Wagnerian characteristic has made this selection famous. There is a noticeable absence of brass.

The concluding number, Beethoven's symphony in C Minor No. 5, was the orchestral feature. It has been heard here before, but only such an aggregation as the Boston Orchestra can bring out its beauties. It is a work which embodies a wonderful disparity of ideas.

The first movement, "allegro con brio," suggestive of dejection, is left to the strings, and it is only such bass work like that of last night which can give to it the proper effect. The "andante con moti," often commonly termed adagio, which the second movement leads up to, is a peculiar mixture of gravity and despair. The theme, first announced by the 'cello and viola, is re-concurrent. The scherzo and two concluding movements bear out the theme first introduced.

It is to be regretted that owing to the lack of a hall last night was the only concert to be given here this season by Mr. Nikisch's musicians.

ALONG THE WATER.

TRIBUNE, New York, N. Y.
Date 10-31

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme includes the overture "Sukuntala," by Goldmark; Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in E minor, No. 5, Tschaikowsky, and vocal numbers sung by Miss Emma Juch.

Clipping from Hatchet D C
Date 11/3/92

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This organization began its season in Boston two weeks ago and will give five concerts at Metzerott Music Hall in this city on Tuesday evenings, the first Nov. 1, next Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 7 and March 14. Among the soloists already engaged are Emma Juch, Franz Kneisel and Paderewski the renowned pianist.

THE WASHINGTON POST,
NOVEMBER 2, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Work Approved by a Fine Washington Audience at Metzerott Hall.

Conductor Nikisch and his band received a right royal reception at Metzerott Music Hall last evening on the occasion of the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series. The new hall had its capacity tested for the first time, only a few seats in the front rows remaining vacant. The draperies about the boxes were in place and gave a refreshing bit of color with the prevailing white and buff. The orchestra comfortably filled the stage and presented the same faces now familiar to many of the audience. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Roth, and Kuntz were picked out and mentally greeted as old friends. At the desk with Adamowski was the new violinist, Schnitzler. Svecenksi appeared for the first time at the head of the violas.

When Mr. Nikisch appeared there was a burst of applause that should entitle his Washington audience to a warm place in the affections of the popular conductor. The audience was slow in coming in, and it was fully twenty minutes after the hour when Mr. Nickish rapped impatiently on his stand, intimating that he would like to begin the programme. The hint was taken, and the inspiring strains of the pilgrims' chorus from "Tannhaeuser" opened the concert.

Aside from this number, the selections were new to Washington as far as this band is concerned. The "Tannhaeuser" overture had not been heard for three years in its original form, though the Paris version, ending with the bacchanalian, has been played since. It is a composition that is always welcome, and the bold measures of the well-known chorus thrill the audience and proclaim the triumph of the good in music as well as morals. The "Queen Mab" scherzo is the third movement of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, which, like the ninth of Beethoven, is written for voices as well as orchestra.

Three of the movements were played by Mr. Damrosch at Albaugh's last. The symphony was inspired by Berlioz's passion for Miss Smithson, the Irish actress, whom he afterward married, whose favorite part was that of Juliet. The scherzo is unique in its daintiness and odd effects, and has been happily termed "A Musical Spider's Web." The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, is more frequently played than any other works of that composer. It was written in 1841, soon after the composer's marriage, and was first produced at Leipsic, but did not meet with the approval of the critics, and was rewritten in the form used to-day. The original version was unearthed a year or two ago and given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for the first time in this country. Among the peculiarities of the original was a part for a guitar introduced in the romanza.

The symphony is also peculiar in that, by the composer's direction, it is played "in one piece." This innovation was introduced by Mendelssohn in his symphony beginning the "Hymn of Praise," and Schumann, in his paper commenting on the change, declared it of questionable benefit, yet within a year or two he makes use of the change himself.

The work of the orchestra was flawless, and fully up to the standard of previous years.

The soloists were Miss Emma Juch and Mr. Franz Kneisel. Miss Juch, charming in a dress of white crepe, with bead fringe ornaments, sang "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and Liszt's "Loreley." Her voice at times gives evidence of the wear and tear incident to her operatic work, but there is the same purity of tone and sincerity of purpose. The Weber aria, though written for a London audience, the opera receiving its first production in that city, was for some reason sung by Miss Juch in German, and much of the beauty of the composition is lost to the majority of the audience. "Die Loreley" was sung with artistic intelligence and true interpretation. After both numbers Miss Juch was several times recalled, but Mr. Nikisch's rule permits no encores.

Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the orchestra, played a "Romance," by Svendsen, and "Farfallen," by Laurel, with the purity of tone and breadth of style that characterize all his efforts. The new hall came in for its share of praise, and it was pronounced acoustically perfect. Miss Juch and Mr. Nikisch both gave their testimony to this effect. The audience contained many well-known people, and, as usual, the balcony was crowded with the musical enthusiasts. A party of fifty young ladies from Mount Vernon Seminary had seats together on the floor, and attracted general attention on their entrance. The next concert will be given on Tuesday evening, December 6.

[30]

Clipping No.

Clipping from

Washington D.C.

Date 11-30

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESRA.

Its First Concert This Season Will Be Next Tuesday Evening.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will renew his acquaintance with the musical public of this city at Metzerott Music Hall next Tuesday evening when the first of its series of five concerts will be given. In the new Music Hall the orchestra will be heard to greater advantage than heretofore and its concerts promise to be more brilliant and attractive than ever.

The sale of seats has been very large and assures a splendid audience for Tuesday's concert. Miss Emma Juch and Mr. Franz Kneisel will appear as the soloists. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "Tanahaeuser".....Wagner.
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber.
Queen Mab Scherzo from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz.
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt.
Soli for violin—
a. Romance.....Svendsen.
b. Farfalla.....Emile Sauret.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann.

Season tickets for the series and single tickets, or the first concert are now on sale at Metzerott's music store.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-2

THE DEAN MUSICAL PREFACE.

Given in Explanation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The explanatory lecture on the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to take place on Thursday evening, was given yesterday morning at Chickering Hall by Mr. Frederic Dean. The lecture was amply and excellently illustrated by Miss Kathryn Hilke, soprano; Mr. William C. Carl, organist, and Messrs. Victor Harris and Emil Levy, pianists.

The purpose of these lectures cannot be too highly commended, as affording to the ordinary amateur music-lover and concert-goer a means whereby to better comprehend and appreciate the spirit and design of master works, whose beauties might otherwise remain to them but partially disclosed.

Mr. Dean fulfilled his purpose with cleverness and interest, and it is to be hoped that a just appreciation will encourage his plan.

The entire programme of the forthcoming concert was gone over, a special point being made in the reproduction, closely as possible, by organ and piano, of the orchestral effects.

Miss Kathryn Hilke in Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," scored a marked success, rising as she did with perfect satisfaction to the dramatic power and vocal breadth which this difficult aria demands.

Mr. Carl handled the organ in his usual manner, which is a thoroughly musicianly one, and was especially good in conception and execution in Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantaisie.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony of Berlioz was played at a four-hand piano arrangement daintily and characteristically by Messrs. Victor Harris and Emil Levy, while other numbers of the programme received equally good treatment.

The next lecture, preface the [illegible] symphony concert, will be given by Mr. Dean, on Tuesday morning, Dec. 6, at Chickering [illegible]

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

BOSTON'S ADMIRABLE ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Sixth New York Season Given in Chickering Hall.

The Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, gave its first concert of this winter's series in Chickering Hall last night. The hall was packed with a representative audience, and this fact, together with the genuine enthusiasm with which the most important of the evening's pieces were received, clearly showed there is still room here for orchestral performances of the very highest order.

In this city as well as in Boston all the seats for the whole series of concerts by this organization have already been taken. This is a tribute to the worth of this superb organization creditable alike to the Boston Orchestra and to the taste of our music lovers.

As I have had occasion to say many times in former years, the Boston Orchestra surpasses any body of players we have in the beauty of tone of the strings and in the precision and delicacy with which they play. Nothing more lovely and perfect than the orchestra's performance of Schumann's D minor symphony last night can be wished for or even imagined.

The Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" offer to the orchestra extraordinary difficulties, but these are just what such a body of virtuosi delight in, and in the Tschaikowsky overture especially the results were superb. Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again.

The choice of the soloist was not exactly a happy one. Weber's dramatic air from "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster" calls for a broader manner than Miss Juch possesses, while Liszt's fine setting of Heine's "Die Loreley" sadly lacked in color of voice and distinction of style. The personal popularity of the singer seems, however, to be very marked and she was loudly applauded and brought back many times to bow her thanks.

[31]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

SWEET SOUNDS FROM BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Before New York's Culture and Scores a Triumph.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3. A large and cultured audience witnessed the triumphant opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season in Chickering Hall tonight. Mr. Nikisch, in arranging his programme, made no effort to excite interest through novelty. Save the opening number, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," the music was extremely familiar, and this number had been heard here before. The performance of it was thrilling in the intensity of its feeling, the warmth of its tonal color and the energy and precision with which its throbbing rhythms were proclaimed.

In the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony the skill of the Boston players was put to a severer test. The other orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which was finely played. The solo performances were Weber's air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monstre," and Liszt's "Lorely," sung by Miss Emma Juch.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 4, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

As a romanticist Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at his best. It was, therefore, wise for him to make his first programme this season one of romantic music. For Summer vacations will have their effect, even upon artists of great skill, and there were some evidences in Chickering Hall last evening that the splendid orchestra from the centre of the universe had not yet been tuned quite up to concert pitch. But if the tuba player fell from grace, and persistently remained fallen through several measures, and if the horns in the scherzo of the Berlioz symphony seemed to be playing behind a cloud for a few moments, it is easy enough to forgive these lapses because of the general virility of the evening's work. Though Homer sometimes nods, he is still Homer.

The programme last night consisted of Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet," the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon"; the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; Liszt's song, "The Loreley," and Schumann's D minor symphony. It was an excellently made programme, for who could have followed Tschaikowsky in his supreme power better than Weber in his? The Berlioz scherzo afforded charming relief with its dainty orchestral surprises and airy atmosphere, and the simple melody and sentiment of the Liszt song made an easy transition from this to the joyous vigor of the Schumann work.

The Tschaikowsky overture, which might better be called simply a prelude, (if that word did not have a special meaning given by Bach's usage,) is a work which grows on the hearer. It has always had a high place in the esteem of the followers of modern music, and the belief that it is destined to live is deepening. Surely it is brimming over with melodic eloquence, and not only in matter, but also in form and treatment, it stands as a conspicuous example of the perfect suitability of music to the broad expression of the fundamental emotions. We might not, if the title were absent, discern in it a special indication of Shakespeare's love-tragedy, but we should certainly not fail to perceive that it indicated a tremendous struggle in which a great, yearning passion was one of the potent forces, and of which a tragedy was the final issue. To have achieved this much and to have voiced the emotions in such beautiful instrumental language is to have done the work of a great composer.

The performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch's inspiring direction, was instinct with vigor, and it was generally clean and dramatic in phrasing. The glorious strings of the orchestra did their work with their usual finish, and the ensemble was notable, as usual, for its precision. One could have wished for a little more refinement of tone in the wind; but, as we have noted, the season is yet young, and the Summer is demoralizing. Barring the deficiencies already mentioned, the playing of the Berlioz music was altogether delightful. As for the performance of the Schumann symphony, that hardly needs comment. The work is one of the strongest in the repertory of the orchestra under the present conductor—a Schumannite in whom there is no guile. The symphony, to be brief, was superbly played from beginning to end, the highest point of excellence being reached in the marvelously beautiful trio of the scherzo.

The solo singer was Miss Emma Juch. It must be admitted that ocean was a little too mighty a monster for the vocalist, whose best efforts are not in the direction of such exacting dramatic measures. In the Liszt song Miss Juch acquitted herself with greater credit. This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the first public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The principal number on the programme is Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 5, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was one novelty on the programme of the third Symphony concert—the "Spring Waves," which its author, Philipp Scharwenka, calls a symphonic poem, after the fashion of the time, although there is no symphony and not a great deal of poetry about it. It is a pleasant, rambling composition, with some pretty airs, some nice undulating rhythms and figures and much even, polished and musicianly writing all through its instrumentation. But it is not inspired or eloquent, and lacking such qualities, it is too long and becomes insipid from the repetition of the same flavors, especially as these are seldom original. It has the conventional pastoral coloring in the use of the wooden wind and horns, and there are some agreeable although mild contrasts and changes of mood. Were there half as much of it it would be better, and one cannot help thinking that the composer would be more at home in wandering in the woodlands than in pursuing aquatics, in spite of the placid fluctuations and soft swellings which he has depicted in this score. The playing was very good, although that fierce kettle-drummer translated some sudden notes which may have been meant to signify the bursting of seed capsules into what might well have been accepted in a Urania spectacle for the explosion of sub-aqueous volcanoes. The first place on the programme was assigned to Dvorák's orchestral suite in D-major, opus 39. This is a composition rich in melody, diversified in spirit, in form and in coloring, and quite delightful also by reason of the clever characterization of its parts—a broad prelude; a light, bright polka; a sturdy minuet, with some quaint bassoon ramblings; a sweet and ingenious romance, and a bold, ardent furiant for the finale. The symphony was Gade, in B-flat major (his fourth), short, clean-cut, melodious and strong in harmony and variety of scoring. This—like the suite—had an able reading, but the scherzo was not so brilliantly or captivatingly played as to make many people think that they should like to ask for it that encore which Mr. Apthorp's note said it always used to get in Leipsig. Miss Juch was the soloist and her choice fell upon two large vocal works—the great "Ocean" scena from Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's song, "The Loreley," which latter has not the spontaneity to entrance, nor the elegance and brilliancy to command, the admiration of a great audience, however effective it may be at short range, as one may say. Miss Juch sang artistically and with the earnestness which has come into her voice and manner since varied dramatic work has qualified the girlish freshness of the one and coolness of the other. Her phrasing was large, her intonation pure, her purpose correct and her disposition faithful; but it is not in her possibilities to give that almost stupendous scene its proper character and effect in such a room as Music Hall—only a Clara Novello, a Titiens, a Parepa or a Lehmann can do that. Why she sang an English air in German and a German song in English wants explanation.

There will be no concert tonight, the orchestra being away during the week in other cities, but on next Saturday this programme will be played: Saint-Saëns' symphony in A-minor, Ernst's violin concerto in G-sharp minor and E. Humperdink's "Humoresque" for orchestra—the first and third new to Boston—and Beethoven's second symphony. Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS

NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

A Superb Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an immense audience at the Academy of Music last evening, comprising many of the devotees of music of a high order, of Philadelphia and neighboring towns. The appearance of Mr. Nikisch was greeted with hearty applause, demonstrating the great esteem in which he is held by this public. The concert began with Weber's "Oberon" overture given very effectively and with beautiful shadings, which brought out the superior quality of the string instruments.

Miss Emma Juch sang the aria from "Oberon,"—"Ocean Thou Mighty Monster!"—in artistic style and with her usual good method of vocalization. Her voice is as charming as ever. Her second selection, Liszt's "Loreley" she sang with such tenderness and expressiveness as to affect her hearers deeply.

In the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," the beautiful blending of the brass with the strings was striking; and, but for an occasional faulty attack of the brass, the rendering might have favorably compared with Dr. Hans Richter's masterly rendering of this famous number.

The piece de resistance was Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor, which was heard last evening for the first time in Philadelphia. It is thoroughly original, and in the composer's most witching style. The accomplished Russian stands preeminently in the front rank of living symphony writers, and in the work given last evening, he has placed more than the usual quota of interesting musical novelties which are so promiscuously scattered throughout, that the auditor is fascinated by their rapid succession. The composer, whether such was strictly his intention or not—for every symphony may be diversely interpreted—has portrayed the story of a pair of Cossack lovers evidently more refined than their rustic surroundings. The relatives of the maid call their neighbors to a consultation, and upon the green fields the youth's merits or demerits are discussed. Occasionally the bellowings of the farm animals are heard, and then the passing of a storm cloud interrupts, but only momentarily. The third movement is a waltz, in which all participate and the judges are inclined favorably toward the suitor. The finale—according to this perception—ends with a triumphant outburst of the victorious youth and an exclamation upon the part of the assembly that there has been much ado about nothing.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Nov. 3, 1892.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that exceeded the seating accommodations of the Academy of Music, and which was notably fashionable, greeted last night the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert comprised but five numbers, of which two were vocal, but of such important instrumentation as to rank them as orchestral numbers. The opening was the "Oberon" overture. This at once made apparent the fact that the old beauty, fullness and balance of tone of the Orchestra is still preserved and in some respects enhanced. The overture was correctly and charmingly played, Mr. Nikisch conducting without notes (he seldom referred to a score during the evening, indeed), and the band played with a spontaneity that suggested that the performers, too, knew the music "by heart."

The overture was followed by "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from the same opera, and for once Weber's great aria had both the singers and orchestra to do it full justice, Miss Juch being the soloist. She sang with something less than her former power in some notes and was less at her ease in the very highest of them, but these were minor defects that only the most critical would pause over. She was extended the most cordial applause and several recalls, a pleasant experience she repeated after singing Liszt's "Die Loreley." The last few recalls took on the appearance of a desire on the part of a goodly number of the audience to have a portion at least of Liszt's aria repeated, but Miss Juch didn't appear inclined to construe the compliment in that way.

The concert closed with a performance (the first here) of Tschaikowsky's Fifth (E minor) Symphony. It required but little musical penetration to observe that the composer aimed at a "programme" symphony, and it is to be regretted that the excellent annotated programme did not give the listener an intimation of the subjects handled. It proved to be a work of which it is exceptionally difficult to speak on a first hearing, for, while it is in the symphonic form, the author has wrought as if he had other objects in view than the production of a symphony. The first movement (which, by the way, has a coda of which the theme is almost literally that of the famous "Three Blind Mice") has the freshest and most original music and is the most elegant in workmanship. The second, melodious enough, is prosaic and over-elaborate; the third, in which he substitutes a set of variations on a waltz theme for the usual scherzo, is conspicuously without humor or fancy, and the fourth, in which what little of a Slavic flavor there is occurs, is more remarkable for technical features and for tumultuous passages for the brasses than for its invention.

Judging by the manifestations—or, more strictly speaking, by the absence of them—on the part of the audience, Tschaikowsky's latest symphony did not produce a profoundly satisfactory impression. To be a little plain, the audience was a little bored, and even the almost meaningless fanfaronade that broke out in the last movement seemed a relief from the tedium of many a bar that went before. Perhaps if the symphony had been given at the opening, instead of at the close of the concert, the fresh and unsated listeners, from their greater acuteness, might have found more in it to admire; but, after all, the placing of the symphony, whether at top or bottom of the list, is a matter of judgment. Philadelphia audiences have been used to getting it at the beginning of a concert; Mr. Nikisch evidently believes in putting it at the end. There is a great deal to be said in favor of the former way; the fact that Mr. Nikisch chooses the other says much for it. One thing there can be common agreement about is that, in either, he is sure to display his own virtues as a conductor and the splendid accomplishments of his superb orchestra.

TIMES—PHILADELPHIA

NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Opens the Season at the Academy Brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening to a crowded house. The superb organization which Mr. Nikisch commands has never appeared in better form. Its tone was rich and smooth and its execution exact and clean, and the important feature of the programme, Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, was played in a way that left nothing to be sought.

This is the most modern of the Russian composer's works, quite characteristic in a certain half-barbaric force and fervor, but eminently cosmopolitan in its melodic grace, suggesting sometimes the French and sometimes the most recent Italian music, and, but for an occasional bizarre effect, keeping within the lines of symmetry and beauty. The "Oberon" overture, which opened the concert, was a little disappointing in its lack of brilliancy, remembering how beautifully Mr. Nikisch has usually played Von Weber. The prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde" displayed the rich tone of the orchestra and the exquisite suavity of its playing.

The demonstrative part of the audience seemed more interested in Emma Juch than in the orchestra, though the popular singer was not in her best voice and the great scene from "Oberon" is not quite in her line. Liszt's "Lorely" suits her voice and lyric method better, and she sang this beautifully, with good sentiment and musical expression.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Herald Washington D.C.

Date 1130

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESRA.

Its First Concert This Season Will Be Next Tuesday Evening.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will renew his acquaintance with the musical public of this city at Metzerott Music Hall next Tuesday evening when the first of its series of five concerts will be given. In the new Music Hall the orchestra will be heard to greater advantage than heretofore and its concerts promise to be more brilliant and attractive than ever.

The sale of seats has been very large and ensures a splendid audience for Tuesday's concert. Miss Emma Juch and Mr. Franz Kueisel will appear as the soloists. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "Tanahaeuser".....Wagner.
Aria from "Oberon".....Weber.
Queen Mab Scherzo from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berloiz.
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt.
Soli for violin—
a. Romance.....Svendsen.
b. Farfalla.....Emile Sauret.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann.

Season tickets for the series and single tickets, or the first concert are now on sale at Metzerott's music store.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-2

THE DEAN MUSICAL PREFACE.

Given in Explanation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The explanatory lecture on the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to take place on Thursday evening, was given yesterday morning at Chickering Hall by Mr. Frederic Dean. The lecture was amply and excellently illustrated by Miss Kathryn Hilke, soprano; Mr. William C. Carl, organist, and Messrs. Victor Harris and Emil Levy, pianists.

The purpose of these lectures cannot be too highly commended, as affording to the ordinary amateur music-lover and concert-goer a means whereby to better comprehend and appreciate the spirit and design of master works, whose beauties might otherwise remain to them but partially disclosed.

Mr. Dean fulfilled his purpose with cleverness and interest, and it is to be hoped that a just appreciation will encourage his plan. The entire programme of the forthcoming concert was gone over, a special point being made in the reproduction, closely as possible, by organ and piano, of the orchestral effects.

Miss Kathryn Hilke in Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," scored a marked success, rising as she did with perfect satisfaction to the dramatic power and vocal breadth which this difficult aria demands.

Mr. Carl handled the organ in his usual manner, which is a thoroughly musicianly one, and was especially good in conception and execution in Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantaisie.

The "Queen Mab" scherzo from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony of Berlioz was played at a four-hand piano arrangement daintily and characteristically by Messrs. Victor Harris and Emil Levy, while other numbers of the programme received equally good treatment.

The next lecture, to preface the Second Symphony concert, will be given by Mr. Dean, on Tuesday morning, Dec. 6, at Chickering Hall.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

BOSTON'S ADMIRABLE ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Sixth New York Season Given in Chickering Hall.

The Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, gave its first concert of this winter's series in Chickering Hall last night. The hall was packed with a representative audience, and this fact, together with the genuine enthusiasm with which the most important of the evening's pieces were received, clearly showed there is still room here for orchestral performances of the very highest order.

In this city as well as in Boston all the seats for the whole series of concerts by this organization have already been taken. This is a tribute to the worth of this superb organization creditable alike to the Boston Orchestra and to the taste of our music lovers.

As I have had occasion to say many times in former years, the Boston Orchestra surpasses any body of players we have in the beauty of tone of the strings and in the precision and delicacy with which they play. Nothing more lovely and perfect than the orchestra's performance of Schumann's D minor symphony last night can be wished for or even imagined.

The Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" offer to the orchestra extraordinary difficulties, but these are just what such a body of virtuosi delight in, and in the Tschaikowsky overture especially the results were superb. Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again.

The choice of the solist was not exactly a happy one. Weber's dramatic air from "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster" calls for a broader manner than Miss Juch possesses, while Liszt's fine setting of Heine's "Die Loreley" sadly lacked in color of voice and distinction of style. The personal popularity of the singer seems, however, to be very marked and she was loudly applauded and brought back many times to bow her thanks.

[31]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

SWEET SOUNDS FROM BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Before New York's Culture and Scores a Triumph.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3. A large and cultured audience witnessed the triumphant opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season in Chickering Hall tonight. Mr. Nikisch, in arranging his programme, made no effort to excite interest through novelty. Save the opening number, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," the music was extremely familiar, and this number had been heard here before. The performance of it was thrilling in the intensity of its feeling, the warmth of its tonal color and the energy and precision with which its throbbing rhythms were proclaimed.

In the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony the skill of the Boston players was put to a severer test. The other orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which was finely played. The solo performances were Weber's air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monstre," and Liszt's "Lorely," sung by Miss Emma Juch.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 4, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

As a romanticist Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at his best. It was, therefore, wise for him to make his first programme this season one of romantic music. For Summer vacations will have their effect, even upon artists of great skill, and there were some evidences in Chickering Hall last evening that the splendid orchestra from the centre of the universe had not yet been tuned quite up to concert pitch. But if the tuba player fell from grace, and persistently remained fallen through several measures, and if the horns in the scherzo of the Berlioz symphony seemed to be playing behind a cloud for a few moments, it is easy enough to forgive these lapses because of the general virility of the evening's work. Though Homer sometimes nods, he is still Homer.

The programme last night consisted of Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet," the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon"; the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; Liszt's song, "The Loreley," and Schumann's D minor symphony. It was an excellently made programme, for who could have followed Tschaikowsky in his supreme power better than Weber in his? The Berlioz scherzo afforded charming relief with its dainty orchestral surprises and airy atmosphere, and the simple melody and sentiment of the Liszt song made an easy transition from this to the joyous vigor of the Schumann work.

The Tschaikowsky overture, which might better be called simply a prelude, (if that word did not have a special meaning given by Bach's usage.) is a work which grows on the hearer. It has always had a high place in the esteem of the followers of modern music, and the belief that it is destined to live is deepening. Surely it is brimming over with melodic eloquence, and not only in matter, but also in form and treatment, it stands as a conspicuous example of the perfect suitability of music to the broad expression of the fundamental emotions. We might not, if the title were absent, discern in it a special indication of Shakespeare's love-tragedy, but we should certainly not fail to perceive that it indicated a tremendous struggle in which a great, yearning passion was one of the potent forces, and of which a tragedy was the final issue. To have achieved this much and to have voiced the emotions in such beautiful instrumental language is to have done the work of a great composer.

The performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch's inspiring direction, was instinct with vigor, and it was generally clean and dramatic in phrasing. The glorious strings of the orchestra did their work with their usual finish, and the ensemble was notable, as usual, for its precision. One could have wished for a little more refinement of tone in the wind; but, as we have noted, the season is yet young, and the Summer is demoralizing. Barring the deficiencies already mentioned, the playing of the Berlioz music was altogether delightful. As for the performance of the Schumann symphony, that hardly needs comment. The work is one of the strongest in the repertory of the orchestra under the present conductor—a Schumannite in whom there is no guile. The symphony, to be brief, was superbly played from beginning to end, the highest point of excellence being reached in the marvelously beautiful trio of the scherzo.

The solo singer was Miss Emma Juch. It must be admitted that ocean was a little too mighty a monster for the vocalist, whose best efforts are not in the direction of such exacting dramatic measures. In the Liszt song Miss Juch acquitted herself with greater credit. This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the first public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The principal number on the programme is Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 5, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was one novelty on the programme of the third Symphony concert—the "Spring Waves," which its author, Philipp Scharwenka, calls a symphonic poem, after the fashion of the time, although there is no symphony and not a great deal of poetry about it. It is a pleasant, rambling composition, with some pretty airs, some nice undulating rhythms and figures and much even, polished and musicianly writing all through its instrumentation. But it is not inspired or eloquent, and lacking such qualities, it is too long and becomes insipid from the repetition of the same flavors, especially as these are seldom original. It has the conventional pastoral coloring in the use of the wooden wind and horns, and there are some agreeable although mild contrasts and changes of mood. Were there half as much of it it would be better, and one cannot help thinking that the composer would be more at home in wandering in the woodlands than in pursuing aquatics, in spite of the placid fluctuations and soft swellings which he has depicted in this score. The playing was very good, although that fierce kettle-drummer translated some sudden notes which may have been meant to signify the bursting of seed capsules into what might well have been accepted in a Urania spectacle for the explosion of sub-aqueous volcanoes. The first place on the programme was assigned to Dvorák's orchestral suite in D-major, opus 39. This is a composition rich in melody, diversified in spirit, in form and in coloring, and quite delightful also by reason of the clever characterization of its parts—a broad prelude; a light, bright polka; a sturdy minuet, with some quaint bassoon ramblings; a sweet and ingenious romance, and a bold, ardent furiant for the finale. The symphony was Gade, in B-flat major (his fourth), short, clean-cut, melodious and strong in harmony and variety of scoring. This—like the suite—had an able reading, but the scherzo was not so brilliantly or captivatingly played as to make many people think that they should like to ask for it that encore which Mr. Apthorp's note said it always used to get in Leipsig. Miss Juch was the soloist and her choice tell upon two large vocal works—the great "Ocean" scena from Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's song, "The Loreley," which latter has not the spontaneity to entrance, nor the elegance and brilliancy to command, the admiration of a great audience, however effective it may be at short range, as one may say. Miss Juch sang artistically and with the earnestness which has come into her voice and manner since varied dramatic work has qualified the girlish freshness of the one and coolness of the other. Her phrasing was large, her intonation pure, her purpose correct and her disposition faithful; but it is not in her possibilities to give that almost stupendous scene its proper character and effect in such a room as Music Hall—only a Clara Novello, a Titiens, a Parepa or a Lehmann can do that. Why she sang an English air in German and a German song in English wants explanation.

There will be no concert tonight, the orchestra being away during the week in other cities, but on next Saturday this programme will be played: Saint-Saëns' symphony in A-minor, Ernst's violin concerto in G-sharp minor and E. Humperdink's "Humoresque" for orchestra—the first and third new to Boston—and Beethoven's second symphony. Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

A Superb Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an immense audience at the Academy of Music last evening, comprising many of the devotees of music of a high order, of Philadelphia and neighboring towns. The appearance of Mr. Nikisch was greeted with hearty applause, demonstrating the great esteem in which he is held by this public. The concert began with Weber's "Oberon" overture given very effectively and with beautiful shadings, which brought out the superior quality of the string instruments.

Miss Emma Juch sang the aria from "Oberon,"—"Ocean Thou Mighty Monster!"—in artistic style and with her usual good method of vocalization. Her voice is as charming as ever. Her second selection, Liszt's "Loreley" she sang with such tenderness and expressiveness as to affect her hearers deeply.

In the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," the beautiful blending of the brass with the strings was striking; and, but for an occasional faulty attack of the brass, the rendering might have favorably compared with Dr. Hans Richter's masterly rendering of this famous number.

The piece de resistance was Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor, which was heard last evening for the first time in Philadelphia. It is thoroughly original, and in the composer's most witching style. The accomplished Russian stands preeminently in the front rank of living symphony writers, and in the work given last evening, he has placed more than the usual quota of interesting musical novelties which are so promiscuously scattered throughout, that the auditor is fascinated by their rapid succession. The composer, whether such was strictly his intention or not—for every symphony may be diversely interpreted—has portrayed the story of a pair of Cossack lovers evidently more refined than their rustic surroundings. The relatives of the maid call their neighbors to a consultation, and upon the green fields the youth's merits or demerits are discussed. Occasionally the bellowings of the farm animals are heard, and then the passing of a storm cloud interrupts, but only momentarily. The third movement is a waltz, in which all participate and the judges are inclined favorably toward the suitor. The finale—according to this perception—ends with a triumphant outburst of the victorious youth and an exclamation upon the part of the assembly that there has been much ado about nothing.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Nov. 3, 1892.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that exceeded the seating accommodations of the Academy of Music, and which was notably fashionable, greeted last night the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert comprised but five numbers, of which two were vocal, but of such important instrumentation as to rank them as orchestral numbers. The opening was the "Oberon" overture. This at once made apparent the fact that the old beauty, fullness and balance of tone of the Orchestra is still preserved and in some respects enhanced. The overture was correctly and charmingly played, Mr. Nikisch conducting without notes (he seldom referred to a score during the evening, indeed), and the band played with a spontaneity that suggested that the performers, too, knew the music "by heart."

The overture was followed by "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from the same opera, and for once Weber's great aria had both the singers and orchestra to do it full justice, Miss Juch being the soloist. She sang with something less than her former power in some notes and was less at her ease in the very highest of them, but these were minor defects that only the most critical would pause over. She was extended the most cordial applause and several recalls, a pleasant experience she repeated after singing Liszt's "Die Loreley." The last few recalls took on the appearance of a desire on the part of a goodly number of the audience to have a portion at least of Liszt's aria repeated, but Miss Juch didn't appear inclined to construe the compliment in that way.

The concert closed with a performance (the first here) of Tschaikowsky's Fifth (E minor) Symphony. It required but little musical penetration to observe that the composer aimed at a "programme" symphony, and it is to be regretted that the excellent annotated programme did not give the listener an intimation of the subjects handled. It proved to be a work of which it is exceptionally difficult to speak on a first hearing, for, while it is in the symphonic form, the author has wrought as if he had other objects in view than the production of a symphony. The first movement (which, by the way, has a coda of which the theme is almost literally that of the famous "Three Blind Mice") has the freshest and most original music and is the most elegant in workmanship. The second, melodious enough, is prosaic and over-elaborate; the third, in which he substitutes a set of variations on a waltz theme for the usual scherzo, is conspicuously without humor or fancy, and the fourth, in which what little of a Slavic flavor there is occurs, is more remarkable for technical features and for tumultuous passages for the brasses than for its invention.

Judging by the manifestations—or, more strictly speaking, by the absence of them—on the part of the audience, Tschaikowsky's latest symphony did not produce a profoundly satisfactory impression. To be a little plain, the audience was a little bored, and even the almost meaningless fanfaronade that broke out in the last movement seemed a relief from the tedium of many a bar that went before. Perhaps if the symphony had been given at the opening, instead of at the close of the concert, the fresh and unsated listeners, from their greater acuteness, might have found more in it to admire; but, after all, the placing of the symphony, whether at top or bottom of the list, is a matter of judgment. Philadelphia audiences have been used to getting it at the beginning of a concert; Mr. Nikisch evidently believes in putting it at the end. There is a great deal to be said in favor of the former way; the fact that Mr. Nikisch chooses the other says much for it. One thing there can be common agreement about is that, in either, he is sure to display his own virtues as a conductor and the splendid accomplishments of his superb orchestra.

TIMES—PHILADELPHIA
NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Opens the Season at the Academy Brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening to a crowded house. The superb organization which Mr. Nikisch commands has never appeared in better form. Its tone was rich and smooth and its execution exact and clean, and the important feature of the programme, Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, was played in a way that left nothing to be sought.

This is the most modern of the Russian composer's works, quite characteristic in a certain half-barbaric force and fervor, but eminently cosmopolitan in its melodic grace, suggesting sometimes the French and sometimes the most recent Italian music, and, but for an occasional bizarre effect, keeping within the lines of symmetry and beauty. The "Oberon" overture, which opened the concert, was a little disappointing in its lack of brilliancy, remembering how beautifully Mr. Nikisch has usually played Von Weber. The prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde" displayed the rich tone of the orchestra and the exquisite suavity of its playing.

The demonstrative part of the audience seemed more interested in Emma Juch than in the orchestra, though the popular singer was not in her best voice and the great scene from "Oberon" is not quite in her line. Liszt's "Lorely" suits her voice and lyric method better, and she sang this beautifully, with good sentiment and musical expression.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Night a Great Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of an audience which completely filled the auditorium, and which was made up of what are conventionally known as "the best people" in Philadelphia. Society, with a discrimination which it does not always exercise, has taken the Boston Orchestra up, and has so strongly reinforced the regular army of music-lovers that for each of the five concerts which it was arranged that Mr. Nikisch should give the house had some days ago been sold out. Under these circumstances it may be hoped that the management will find a way to arrange for a supplementary concert or two, or at least an extra matinee. The orchestra has never given a matinee in Philadelphia, and there is no doubt that a large section of the public would be glad to have it do so.

The feature of last night's programme, whose five numbers consisted exclusively of romantic music, was a new symphony in E minor, No. 5, by the Russian composer Ilyitch Tschaikowsky. It is not, of course, possible to write with assurance or adequacy of a composition of this magnitude and importance after a single hearing. All that can be done is to record a general impression. This new symphony in E minor, like the other works of its composer, shows decided originality of invention, a fine capacity for emotional utterance and an easy command of all the resources of a modern orchestra. Like them, also, it betrays a constant tendency to force the note and exaggerate the emphasis, and a persistent striving after extraordinary effects, which, sometimes successful, as often fails. There is a kind of barbaric strength about the symphony suggestive of a passion untutored and uncontrolled, and parts of it are extremely interesting and impressive, but much of the material is elaborated to a degree which is a tax upon the listener's patience, and altogether Tschaikowsky lays it on rather too thick. The sentiment of the symphony is naturally Slavonic in its melancholy, and in a kind of hopelessness which sometimes rages with the fury of a frenzied despair and sometimes sinks to the subdued wistfulness of an enforced resignation. Whether pure music such as Mozart and Beethoven gave us should be thus distinguishable is a question.

The other orchestral numbers were the "Oberon" overture and an arrangement from "Tristan and Isolde," both of which, as was the symphony, were superbly played. In the overture the lovely, poetic, fairy-like delicacy of the adagio was not more notable than the verve and brilliancy of the succeeding allegro, and both in the symphony and in the "Tristan" music the orchestra, stimulated by Mr. Nikisch, played with a breadth and power and resounding sonority which in previous seasons have sometimes been missed. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. As a lyric singer, a dramatic area such as "Ocean, thou mighty monster" is scarcely in her genre, but she sang it with much intelligence and surprising breadth, and was even more successful in her artistic delivery of Liszt's familiar setting of the "Loreley" legend. She was much and deservedly applauded.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4,
NEW YORK HERALD.

BOSTON'S ADMIRABLE ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Sixth New York Season Given in Chickering Hall.

The Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, gave its first concert of this winter's series in Chickering Hall last night. The hall was packed with a representative audience, and this fact, together with the genuine enthusiasm with which the most important of the evening's pieces were received, clearly showed there is still room here for orchestral performances of the very highest order.

In this city as well as in Boston all the seats for the whole series of concerts by this organization have already been taken. This is a tribute to the worth of this superb organization creditable alike to the Boston Orchestra and to the taste of our music lovers.

As I have had occasion to say many times in former years, the Boston Orchestra surpasses any body of players we have in the beauty of tone of the strings and in the precision and delicacy with which they play. Nothing more lovely and perfect than the orchestra's performance of Schumann's D minor symphony last night can be wished for or even imagined.

The Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" offer to the orchestra extraordinary difficulties, but these are just what such a body of virtuosi delight in, and in the Tschaikowsky overture especially the results were superb. Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again.

The choice of the solist was not exactly a happy one. Weber's dramatic air from "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster" calls for a broader manner than Miss Juch possesses, while Liszt's fine setting of Heine's "Die Loreley" sadly lacked in color of voice and distinction of style. The personal popularity of the singer seems, however, to be very marked and she was loudly applauded and brought back many times to bow her thanks.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Brilliant Audience Listens to a Program That Lacked a Symphony.

The Academy of Music has seldom contained a more representative musical audience than was gathered last night at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season. The house was crowded in every part, and hundreds sought tickets in vain. So far as the audience was concerned, it was a success; in respect of the orchestra, it was at its best, but as concerns the program, it was disappointing. Here it is:

Weber..... Overture, "Oberon."
Weber..Aria from "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," Miss Juch.
Wagner..Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."
Liszt..Song with Orchestra, "Loreley," Miss Juch.
Tschaikowsky, Symphony No.5, in E minor.

We pointed out last year that Mr. Nikisch made a great mistake in opening his season with a Tschaikowsky symphony. Tschaikowsky has an enviable reputation as a composer and is the leader of the Slav school. Two years ago he carried Paris by storm and there was an immediate rush by all orchestras to play his works, which are invariably interesting and many of them important. But he is not a symphony composer. It requires a great stretching of terms to designate any of his so-called works by this dignified term which has received its true definition from the immortal works of the greatest composers. They are more properly suites and as such are entitled to consideration, but we think it was rather stretching things for Mr. Nikisch for the second time to open his season with one of his works for the piece de resistance. We think the interest in this composer reached its height last year when Tschaikowsky himself conducted the orchestra when it played one of his works. Since then it has steadily declined and the audience last night would have infinitely preferred one of the older masterpieces that the orchestra plays so well.

The symphony last night lacked coherence, and in the first movement the theme is decidedly overwrought—a third of it might well be omitted. The entire work is pronouncedly Slav, but the interest grows with each movement. It has been played here before with a somewhat different interpretation of some passages. Next time we hope to have a symphony that will send us all home full of inspiration. We have had enough of musical fads.

No singer is more warmly welcomed here than Miss Juch, and no singer is more delightful in her methods. It is long since she has been heard here in concert, and she was welcomed right royally. The aria was sung with power, but more pleasing was the "Loreley," which she sang exquisitely.

The Oberon Overture is exceedingly familiar but always delightful, and is the class of work in which Mr. Nikisch excels. The Wagner number is one of the composer's most powerful scenes, that loses much from being given in concert. To those who are familiar with the work there is little lost, but to those who are not Wagnerian in their tastes the production of a noble work of this kind leaves something lacking. It is like a fragment from one of the tragedies of Æschylus to those who have never read one of his works. This most touching of all Wagner's scenes was played with great delicacy and true dramatic appreciation. Could the program have concluded with a Beethoven symphony there would have been little left to be desired.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 53-63 PARK ROW.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch and His Orchestra Win Applause at Chickering Hall.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Chickering Hall. The following was the programme:

Overture, Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster,"..... Weber
Miss Emma Juch.
"Queen Mab," Scherzo, from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet,".....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Emma Juch.
Symphony in D minor No. 4.....Schumann

When Mr. Nikisch fixes his men with that steady glance before stepping up to his stand it seems a challenge that every player shall be upon his mettle. That every man did his best last evening was soon shown. The Boston Symphony has never been heard to better advantage, nor have its brilliant effects, so much enhanced by the recently augmented forces, ever shone out in nobler contrast to the fine and delicate shading of which these strings are especially capable.

The opening hymnal strains of the Tschaikowsky overture, which is indeed the most veritable of fantasies, lead into the "allegro" so vividly descriptive of the feuds between Montague and Capulet. The most exquisite of love themes follows—music which is fraught with so much that is mystic and sorrowful as well as beautiful. In conception and treatment there was little room left in the overture for improvement.

The Queen Mab Scherzo, rather erratic and formless as a composition, but abounding in dainty instrumental effects, called forth some excellent work in pianissimo from the strings. The ever welcome D minor symphony was received with the usual favor. Some alterations in tempo were made by Mr. Nikisch with varied effect. It seems rather an improvement to take the first movement slower than it is usually heard, but in the "Scherzo" the "slackening" of time made things somewhat leaden-footed.

In the solo "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," Mlle. Juch, while dramatic and intelligent in purpose, lacked the power and volume which this difficult aria demands. Her pure and vibrant tones rose clearly enough above the orchestra, but were too light in quality for the massive scope of the stupendous aria. The "Loreley" of Liszt with all its grace and plaintiveness fitted more truly Mlle. Juch's powers and was given with perfection of phrasing and vocal charm. Altogether the initial concert of the Boston Symphony was a decided success.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 4, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

As a romanticist Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at his best. It was, therefore, wise for him to make his first programme this season one of romantic music. For Summer vacations will have their effect, even upon artists of great skill, and there were some evidences in Chickering Hall last evening that the splendid orchestra from the centre of the universe had not yet been tuned quite up to concert pitch. But if the tuba player fell from grace, and persistently remained fallen through several measures, and if the horns in the scherzo of the Berlioz symphony seemed to be playing behind a cloud for a few moments, it is easy enough to forgive these lapses because of the general virility of the evening's work. Though Homer sometimes nods, he is still Homer.

The programme last night consisted of Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet," the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon"; the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; Liszt's song, "The Loreley," and Schumann's D minor symphony. It was an excellently made programme, for who could have followed Tschaikowsky in his supreme power better than Weber in his? The Berlioz scherzo afforded charming relief with its dainty orchestral surprises and airy atmosphere, and the simple melody and sentiment of the Liszt song made an easy transition from this to the joyous vigor of the Schumann work.

The Tschaikowsky overture, which might better be called simply a prelude, (if that word did not have a special meaning given by Bach's usage,) is a work which grows on the hearer. It has always had a high place in the esteem of the followers of modern music, and the belief that it is destined to live is deepening. Surely it is brimming over with melodic eloquence, and not only in matter, but also in form and treatment, it stands as a conspicuous example of the perfect suitability of music to the broad expression of the fundamental emotions. We might not, if the title were absent, discern in it a special indication of Shakespeare's love-tragedy, but we should certainly not fail to perceive that it indicated a tremendous struggle in which a great, yearning passion was one of the potent forces, and of which a tragedy was the final issue. To have achieved this much and to have voiced the emotions in such beautiful instrumental language is to have done the work of a great composer.

The performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch's inspiring direction, was instinct with vigor, and it was generally clean and dramatic in phrasing. The glorious strings of the orchestra did their work with their usual finish, and the ensemble was notable, as usual, for its precision. One could have wished for a little more refinement of tone in the wind; but, as we have noted, the season is yet young, and the Summer is demoralizing. Barring the deficiencies already mentioned, the playing of the Berlioz music was altogether delightful. As for the performance of the Schumann symphony, that hardly needs comment. The work is one of the strongest in the repertory of the orchestra under the present conductor—a Schumannite in whom there is no guile. The symphony, to be brief, was superbly played from beginning to end, the highest point of excellence being reached in the marvelously beautiful trio of the scherzo.

The solo singer was Miss Emma Juch. It must be admitted that ocean was a little too mighty a monster for the vocalist, whose best efforts are not in the direction of such exacting dramatic measures. In the Liszt song Miss Juch acquitted herself with greater credit. This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the first public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The principal number on the programme is Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

YORK RECORDER.

AMERICA'S GREATEST ORCHESTRA.

Crowds of Musical People Flock to the First Boston Symphony Concert.

An almost ideal programme, barring the singing, and interpreted, too, in a most superior mode, was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Chickering Hall. An organization, whose virtuosity has no equal on the continent, and a leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, whose affinity for compositions of the romantic school—these factors were all very patent last night to the listeners at this first concert, and Chickering Hall was literally choked with musical people.

Peter Tschaikowsky opened the evening's entertainment, his superbly sonorous overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," being given. The hyphenated title (overture-fantasy) is a form in which the passionate pictorial and vividly dramatic gifts of the great Russian find ample scope. Charged with pain and passion, this significant fantasy gives the lie to the apostles of "no emotion in music." Indefinite as music ever must be, but subtly suggestive, nevertheless, there are pages in this work which rank the composer with the immortals. It is not all sound and fury, like some of his music, wherein the Cossack blood overbears the poet's judgment. It has proportion, symmetry, a wealth of color and the composer has well sensed the dramatic situations. What lovely episodes, and how keen the despair and anguish of wrecked lives! It is a great work, and candor compels one to say it was greatly played.

Nikisch last night glowed with a fine fire that he communicated to his forces. The homogeneity of tone, the incisive attack, the dynamic contrasts, all were present, and the detail work was most lovingly exploited.

Virtuosity reached white heat in the performance of Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet." The arabesques were given with Meissonier delicacy and clarity.

Of the Schumann D minor symphony there is little to be said. Its performance was a tour de force, for it has always been dear to Mr. Nikisch's heart. Musical, tender and brilliant was the work of the band, and it was directed con amore. Need more be said?

Emma Juch was the singer. Her voice shows wear and tear and Western "one-night stands," but she is an artist, she is musical au bout des ongles, and her articulation miraculous as compared with her contemporaries. She essayed Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and as an essay it merits recognition; as an interpretation it was puny. Far better she succeeded with Liszt's effective but artificial "Loreley." Her phrasing was delightful in this, and her singing so excellent that she was given a triple recall. But the orchestra, after all, was the soloist of the evening.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is a pleasant duty to record a triumphant opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New-York season in the concert which took place in Chickering Hall last night. The audience crowded the elegant concert-room, the "standing room only" sign having been displayed at the foot of the stairs over an hour before the music began. But it was not only members that characterized the gathering. The audience was plainly one of culture and gentleness in the lovely old acceptation of the term. The air of eagerness which prevailed during the evening told of keen enjoyment more eloquently than any concert of noisy handclapping. Yet there was no lack of applause, as there was no want of challenge in the pieces and the manner in which they were played.

Mr. Nikisch, in arranging his programme, made no effort to irritate interest through novelty. Save the opening number, Schaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," the music was extremely familiar, and this number had been heard here before. Indeed, though the fact seems to have dropped out of public notice, it was this composition which introduced the admired Russian composer to our concert rooms many years ago. It is a favorite work with Mr. Nikisch, who played it at the third New-York concert of his first American season, in February, 1890. The reason of his fondness for it is not far to seek. It is not only one of the finest of Tschaikowsky's compositions, but also one which affords a superb opportunity for the exhibition of the Boston leader's style of conducting, and the virtuosoship of his orchestra. The performance last night was thrilling in the intensity of its feeling, the warmth of its tonal color and the energy and precision with which its throbbing rhythms were proclaimed. In the Scherzo, from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, which formed the middle number of the programme, the technical skill of the Boston players was put to a severer test, but superbly as it stood that test there was nothing in the performance to compare with the impassioned eloquence of the Russian composer's love song. The remaining orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which was finely played, though not so well as we have heard it from the same organization and under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The solo performances of the evening were Weber's air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Lorely," sung by Miss Emma Juch. The lady deserved the greatest credit for her singing of the song. For this composition, striking and beautiful, but sadly out of harmony with the folk-song spirit of Heine's poem, Miss Juch has sympathy and understanding, as well as vocal equipment. For the great scene from "Oberon" she has only the first two qualifications. Yet her singing, marked by the elements which have long kept her a prime favorite in all the cities of the United States, gave keen pleasure and she was rewarded with enthusiastic recalls. The orchestra will play in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Concert This Season.

Eighty-five admirably competent musicians were massed upon the platform of Chickering Hall last evening, under the shadow Mr. Arthur Nikisch's potent baton, and in the auditorium there was not a seat left vacant and scarcely a free inch of standing room. The gathering of so large, fashionable, and enthusiastic an audience attests conclusively how deeply these excellent concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become rooted in the esteem and affection of our public, and the many and unmistakable signs of favor shown by New Yorkers to their musician guests must be in the highest degree gratifying to Boston pride.

Though these visitors cannot excel our own orchestras and our best conductors, yet they lose nothing by comparison with them; so that Nikisch now occupies a niche in our musical sphere which would seem but dull and vacant were he to step down from it.

The best renderings last evening were undoubtedly those of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Berlioz's "Queen Mab." The former was splendid in its passionate force, the latter equally fine from its extreme delicacy and neatness. To Tschaikowsky's composition Nikisch gave a thoroughly well thought out and sympathetic delineation, finer in a vast degree than was his conception of Schumann's glorious symphony in D minor.

This was indeed somewhat stiff and pedantic—too reserved. As to tempi, they were not those we have been accustomed to hear. Mr. Nikisch almost reversing the old order of things as Theodore Thomas commanded them, and his effects in Schumann's symphonies could not be surpassed as to grace and beauty. Suavity and grace were lacking last evening, squareness and precision predominating over everything else.

Miss Emma Juch made, as usual, a very attractive addition to the programme, her beautiful face and her beautiful voice cooperating to produce a charming effect. She was somewhat overweighted in the great aria from Oberon, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," because, in spite of the fact that she has grown immensely in dramatic power and also in mere strength of tone, yet she cannot, with all her clever art, perform the song without great and apparent effort. She appeared to more advantage in Liszt's "Loreley," which earned repeated encores. Miss Juch is one of our most talented and most intelligent artists, whom it is always an instruction as well as a delight to hear.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

To-morrow night the matchless Symphony orchestra from Boston will appear at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, inaugurating the second series of its local Philharmonic concerts. Goldmark, Weber, Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikowsky are on its programme.

[32]

THE COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, FRIDAY, ...MBER 4, 1892.

A MUSICAL TREAT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chickering Hall.

The circumstances attending the first concert for the season of 1892-1893 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening combined to make the event a notable one in the sphere of music. Chickering Hall was crowded with an intelligent audience, the programme was a most admirable one, the soloist sang in a meritorious manner and the orchestra played in perfect form. Critical comment on such work as Nikisch and his players perform must of necessity be on a high plane. This body of musicians is facile princeps the first orchestra of America, and it stands in full equality with the celebrated organizations of the Old World. In mechanical execution it attains a superlative degree of precision. While its component parts are not of equal merit the strings being better and stronger than the reeds or the brass, it is in unison thoroughly well balanced. There is no orchestra in Europe which possesses a body of first violins whose playing is so unanimous, from both a technical and an expressive point of view. But the chief merit of this orchestra is its absolute responsiveness to the wishes and intentions of its leader. It forms one great instrument in the hands of its guiding spirit. As a general thing its playing is above criticism. An intelligent consideration of its performances turns in consequence upon questions of interpretation and illustration. It is doubtful if America has ever harbored a kapellmeister so well suited to its musical condition as Mr. Arthur Nikisch is. The development of musical taste and knowledge has been rapid with us. The impetus is of recent origin. We have, to speak colloquially, skipped over the phases of tradition and conventionality and have reached the stage of modern interpretation. For that reason we are not in sympathy with the purely classical treatment of musical art. Leaders like Hans von Bulow do not satisfy us. We are progressive, and progress appeals to us. Nikisch is progressive within legitimate bounds. He is neither traditional nor conventional. At the same time he is not radical. His reading of the compositions of the great masters — past and present — is passionate, romantic and poetical. He interprets not so much from the head as from the heart. He tries to express what he feels. He is not always correct in his interpretations. He often fails to catch the spirit of the composer—very often with Wagner, in the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," for instance. He is often apt to exaggerate his emphases and his accentuations, his gradations and his progressions, his rhythms and his tempi. But he is always consistent and genuine. He has limitations, and of these it will be proper to write at some other time. The predominant impression which his concerts produce is that the orchestra is expressing his views and ideas. From a purely artistic point of view it is a question which admits of much discussion, whether this individualization in musical interpretation is entirely to be encouraged.

When one considers the respective and contrasting abilities of Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch, the three directors this orchestra has had since its organization, it is small wonder that it has become what it is. The orchestral numbers of the programme last evening were Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo and Schumann's D minor Symphony No. 4. The Tschaikowsky selection is one of the most brilliant of this composer's works. It is essentially dramatic in treatment and emotional in expressiveness. Unlike most of his compositions its character is universal as distinguished from national. The new school of Slavic composers finds it difficult to avoid being characteristic. To be always characteristic is to be eccentric.

Tschaikowsky is often eccentric, but not so in "Romeo and Juliet." The playing of this number was superb in its fire and vigor. The "Berlinz Scherzo" is an orchestral tour de force. It is technically one of the most difficult orchestral compositions in existence. Few leaders have the temerity to attempt it. The orchestration is a continued series of tests of instrumental skill. It was marvellously well executed by the orchestra, the first violins covering themselves with glory. Nikisch's interpretation of the Schumann symphony was masterful. It was broad, dignified and yet striking. The work is familiar to concert goers, but it has never been played here with such a sweep and breadth of tone.

Miss Juch sang two numbers, the Oberon aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley." She has not been heard here in several years. Her voice has gained in volume. It is full and true. The recitative and andante of the aria were well sung, but in the allegro the voice seemed to lose its sonorous quality. The Liszt song is a gem. Miss Juch sang it poetically. She used the German text, and the lines of Heinrich Heine seemed to gain in beauty and sentiment.

The audience seemed appreciative, but it was hardly demonstrative enough in its recognition of the merits of this most meritorious concert.

BEAUCLERC.

ANOTHER CRITIC'S VIEWS.

If there were any lingering doubts as to the superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over similar organizations here they must certainly have been dispelled by their playing last evening in Chickering Hall, the occasion being the first concert in ...season's series. The room was packed ...dience which was representative ...demonstrative in its recog... orchestra and ...ed...

...the following ... was rendered:

Tschaikowsky. Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Weber. Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
Miss Juch.

Berlioz. "Queen Mab" Scherzo, from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet."

Liszt.....Song with Orchestra, "Lo reley"
Miss Juch.

Schumann.....Symphony in D minor, No. 4

To our mind the Berlioz scherzo was the most interesting number and its performance was a perfect one, revealing at once all the very best qualities of the leader and his band. There was an indescribable delicacy of tone, an exquisite tenderness combined with great breadth of treatment.

The orchestra, by the way, is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader, as is done in the Paris Conservatoire, the strings stretching to the right and the left, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage. At the very first one was impressed, in the Tschaikowsky overture, with a fuller quality of tone than heretofore, and this must unquestionably be attributed to this new mode of grouping the players, which imparts to the wind instruments a new clearness, without detracting from the strings anything of their power and unity.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture lacks many of the qualities which have gone to make the Russian composer's music unique, but in compensation it possesses virtues which his other compositions lack. It is more gentle and tender, less wild in spirit, less harsh in tone, less indicative of his determination to crowd a theme through all obstacles. It is brilliant and coherent, and has not so much of the Slavic spirit as his symphonies for instance. When it comes to orchestration Tschaikowsky is a veritable master. He lays on the colors with unstinting generosity, and his harmonies and melodies are always original. There is a superb virility in all his music and in developing this element in the overture the orchestra was at its best.

The reading of Schumann's exquisite fourth symphony was a conservative one, wholly free from the grotesque exaggerations which have disfigured some others we have heard. Nothing could be more beautiful than the playing of the slow second movement and in vivid contrast with this came the brilliant scherzo at the finale, both fine examples of orchestral dynamics.

The soloist was Miss Emma Juch, who was heard in Weber's air from "Oberon" and subsequently in Liszt's "Loreley." She was infinitely better in the latter, which she sang with much feeling and expression. While she revealed much musical intelligence and vocal art in the air, it must be said that she lacks the breadth of style and the dramatic force which are essential to an adequate interpretation of it, such an one as Materna or Lehmann would give.

H. A.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra repeated at the Brooklyn Academy of Music the programme that was reviewed in the papers of yesterday, and repeated it to a large and thankful audience. Under the admirable lead of Mr. Nikisch it was strong, flexible, expressive, picturesque. The "Sakuntala" overture, the prelude and end to "Tristan and Isolde" and the sad, gruff, half barbaric Fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky were played as one seldom has a chance to hear them played anywhere and the enthusiasm of the listeners was properly aroused. Among the listeners was Dr. Antonin Dvorak, whose Socratic face peered from one of the boxes. The soloist, as at the rehearsal, was Emma Juch, who sang the air from "Oberon" with judgment and the "Lorelei" of Liszt with such sympathy, delicacy and sweetness, such purity of tone and clearness of enunciation that she was recalled again and again to bow, but not to sing. As in the old days of the Philharmonic regime, the stage was beautified with flowers. The next rehearsal and concert, when Professor Scharwenka will be the soloist, will occur on December 9 and 10.

NEW YORK HERALD

BOSTON'S TRIUMPHANT MUSIC MAKERS.

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Orchestra's first concert here this season brought together an audience in Chickering Hall on Thursday night remarkable in numbers and in character. The hall was crowded to the doors and scores of persons stood all evening. Every musician and music lover of note in this neighborhood was present. It was an audience of experts.

We New Yorkers were compelled years ago to admit that in some respects we hear from no other orchestra such playing as that which Mr. Nikisch and his men can give us. We have still the same admission to make. The beauty of tone precision and brilliancy of the strings of the Boston Orchestra alone suffice to make its concerts a delight, even in a community so sated with good music as is New York.

It is to be hoped that next year the management of this orchestra may find it possible to give more than five concerts here, or to give some public rehearsals.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 6, 1892.

—Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again after the Symphony orchestra's performance of the Tschaikowsky overture at the first concert in Chickering Hall, New York, Thursday night. The seats for the entire series are all sold, as in Boston. In Washington, Tuesday, the orchestra had a similar ovation.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An event that was significant and hopeful was seen yesterday in the assembling of a large audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It was the beginning of the second season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra that drew the people there, and the hopefulness of the incident lies in the fact that when Mr. Nikisch and his unrivaled band made their first appearance here a year ago they played to a pitifully small audience. It is now evident that the orchestra is appreciated and its visits will, without question, be annual affairs from this time forth. Men and women hear no finer music in this world than they heard yesterday who attended the so called public rehearsal at the Academy, for there is no orchestra to surpass this one, started and long maintained through the munificence and public spirit of an art loving citizen of Boston. It discloses few and unimportant changes of personality this season, and it has already been playing long enough since vacation to have acquired the firmness, resonance and brilliancy that are habitual to its work. The strings have the same flow, sweetness and voice like quality, and in the wind choirs where, if in any department, there was weakness formerly, there is such improvement as to bring the ensemble close to the limit of possible perfection. Mr. Nikisch is as self contained as ever, seeming to govern his players more by purpose than by action, for there are no superfluous flagellations of the atmosphere in his leading, but every stroke of the baton is indicative and seems to carry an electric message of command. The playing is as uniform in expression as it is in attack and intonation, and the reading of the guiding eye and ear is that which is accepted by every musician in the corps. Mr. Nikisch's programmes are always marked by brevity. Nobody leaves his concerts with a feeling of surfeit. Yesterday he played just about two hours, but he crowded a good deal into that space of time. His programme was entirely familiar. The numbers on it had been played by him before and by Thomas and Seidl also. They were the picturesque, artistically constructed "Sakuntala" overture, in which Goldmark has a little surpassed himself, the introduction and death scene from "Tristan and Isolde" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony. To the grace of action and rich scoring in the Goldmark number there was an addition of sentiment and the rendering was no less remarkable for power than for sublety. The passing of themes from one instrument to another was accomplished so deftly that string tones merged almost imperceptibly into those of reeds; indeed, there are people living who can remember when such a performance as that of yesterday would have been regarded as almost a miracle. In Wagner's music Mr. Nikisch has sometimes failed to attain the utmost dramatic effect, because he has not been practised in the conduct of operas, though he has always given clear views of Wagner's mental and spiritual attitudes and purposes; but the "Tristan and Isolde" selection yesterday he made big with feeling and dignity. It rose higher and higher in power as he proceeded, until at the tremendous crescendo one might say that art has its limit here and has reached the grandeur and endurance of nature. Here is a manifestation of spirit that ranks among the eternal verities, that purifies and ennobles like the sea, the mountains and the sunset, that is great because it means more than it tells. Tschaikowsky's symphony, relatively wanting both in power and charm, is nevertheless musicianly and original. Apart from its strictly artistic interest is an ethnological manifestation. It is a reduction to melody and harmony of the fierce, frank, yet saddened spirit that tells itself elsewhere in books of whilom popularity and in the pictures of Repin and Veresetchagin. Look at the pictures by Repin in the last number of the Century before hearing these wild Cossack rhythms and modulations, and you will find the one a key to the other. The workmanship of the symphony is earnest and honest, none the less, and the piece may endure in public estimation longer than the works of Rubinstein, who is untrue to his nation because he fancies that truth to his art requires that he should be. As between the two composers, Rubinstein has the more elegance and scholarship, but Tschaikowsky is the more free and genuine. Emma Juch was the soloist, and she first gave the recitative and air from "Oberon," beginning with rather a hifalutin apostrophe to the ocean. This selection she gave with intelligence, but not with the breadth and command that it needed. She was better in Liszt's setting of Heine's "Loreley," for that wanted just such a voice as hers—light, sweet and true—to represent its mystery. Poem and music are imaginative and symbolical: we are absorbed in ideals and see not where we are drifting: and the strangeness and pathos of the truth are told by Heine without his usual sarcasm and by Liszt in his musical romance. To-night the programme will be repeated. During the summer the old box scene belonging to the Philharmonic society has been repainted, but hardly improved, the paneling of its upper spaces with heavy red being a mistake, because heavy colors ought to gravitate toward the bottom and because heavy colors ought never to be used, anyway, especially in an interior. In the Academy it is out of harmony with the other tints; still, it is an improvement on the blue, chocolate and crimson horror that was several times used last season. To-night the stage will be decorated with flowers.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 129.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Orchestra's Success in Other Cities.

"The Fencing Master" Makes a Hit at the Hollis Street—"Tar and Tartar" at the Globe—Rice's Sunday Night Concerts—Cyril Tyler's Farewell—Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its first tour of the present season at Brooklyn last evening, and it is gratifying to local pride to be able to say that the success of the home concerts of this organization has been fully equalled in all the cities visited during the week.

The severity of the tests which the orchestra is put to in visiting the other cities included in these occasional tours can hardly be over stated, and the ready recognition of the merits of the Boston orchestra and its conductor, from both the press and publics of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, affords indisputable evidence of its value as a musical organization.

Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the evening of the concert, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons. The audience in Philadelphia number 3300 by actual count, 700 of these being admission ticket buyers who came early and stood through the programme.

Such results fully justify the estimate put upon value of the Boston orchestra in this city.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Mass
Date 11/12/92

Symphony Concert.

At the first concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders theatre, on Thursday evening of last week, the programme was made up exclusively of Beethoven's works, as follows: Overture. Leonore, No. 3. Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major. Symphony, No. 3, Eroica. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist. This greatest of the Leonore overtures was superbly played, the slow introduction being taken in just the right tempo to make it impressive, and the beautiful theme in the succeeding Allegro was worked up to a splendid pitch of excitement, which won enthusiastic applause from the very large audience. Mr. Busoni's large, fluent technique, and clear, liquid touch, easily met the most exacting demands of the concerto, and if he did not penetrate the innermost depths of this immortal work, one could but feel the warmest admiration for the unaffected simplicity of his style, and earnest devotion to his work. Mr. Busoni's tone is especially delightful, as he never forces the piano beyond its proper limits, while his grace and beauty of phrasing are always apparent. The cadenzas, written by Mr. Busoni, were rich in harmony, and most effective in the treatment of the various themes. He was warmly applauded and recalled. The concert ended with a fiery performance of the great Eroica symphony, which proved that in spite of Mr. Nikisch's unquestioned leaning towards the modern and romantic school, he knows his Beethoven well, and plays it con amore. The wonderful intensity of the first movement was revealed in its utmost brightness, and the "Marcia Funebre" moved at a pace which did not weary the audience, but at the same time was consistent with the solemnity of its character. The contrast between this tragic mood and the tender gladness of the Scherzo was beautifully defined, the story told by the horns, being on the whole very well done when one considers that this was the first performance of this symphony for many months. The finale, with its series of brilliant variations, was a triumph of virtuosity, the strings, as well as Messrs. Molé and Santet, covering themselves with glory. The keen, poetical insight of Mr. Nikisch always leads him to heighten, rather than detract from the central idea of the composer, and whatever exception may be taken from a bird's eye point of view, the grand effect of the whole is unmistakable. Mr. Nikisch was warmly received and applauded at the end of the concert. The next concert will be given on Thursday evening, November 10. According to present appearances Cambridge will undoubtedly become quite a musical centre, with ten symphony concerts in the Sanders theatre, and others to be announced later.

[33]

THE COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1892.

A MUSICAL TREAT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Chickering Hall.

The circumstances attending the first concert for the season of 1892-1893 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening combined to make the event a notable one in the sphere of music. Chickering Hall was crowded with an intelligent audience, the programme was a most admirable one, the soloist sang in a meritorious manner and the orchestra played in perfect form. Critical comment on such work as Nikisch and his players perform must of necessity be on a high plane. This body of musicians is facile princeps the first orchestra of America, and it stands in full equality with the celebrated organizations of the Old World. In mechanical execution it attains a superlative degree of precision. While its component parts are not of equal merit the strings being better and stronger than the reeds or the brass, it is in unison thoroughly well balanced. There is no orchestra in Europe which possesses a body of first violins whose playing is so unanimous, from both a technical and an expressive point of view. But the chief merit of this orchestra is its absolute responsiveness to the wishes and intentions of its leader. It forms one great instrument in the hands of its guiding spirit. As a general thing its playing is above criticism. An intelligent consideration of its performances turns in consequence upon questions of interpretation and illustration. It is doubtful if America has ever harbored a kapellmeister so well suited to its musical condition as Mr. Arthur Nikisch is. The development of musical taste and knowledge has been rapid with us. The impetus is of recent origin. We have, to speak colloquially, skipped over the phases of tradition and conventionality and have reached the stage of modern interpretation. For that reason we are not in sympathy with the purely classical treatment of musical art. Leaders like Hans von Bulow do not satisfy us. We are progressive, and progress appeals to us. Nikisch is progressive within legitimate bounds. He is neither traditional nor conventional. At the same time he is not radical. His reading of the compositions of the great masters — past and present — is passionate, romantic and poetical. He interprets not so much from the head as from the heart. He tries to express what he feels. He is not always correct in his interpretations. He often fails to catch the spirit of the composer—very often with Wagner, in the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," for instance. He is often apt to exaggerate his emphases and his accentuations, his gradations and his progressions, his rhythms and his tempi. But he is always consistent and genuine. He has limitations, and of these it will be proper to write at some other time. The predominant impression which his concerts produce is that the orchestra is expressing his views and ideas. From a purely artistic point of view it is a question which admits of much discussion, whether this individualization in musical interpretation is entirely to be encouraged.

When one considers the respective and contrasting abilities of Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch, the three directors this orchestra has had since its organization, it is small wonder that it has become what it is. The orchestral numbers of the programme last evening were Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo and Schumann's D minor Symphony No. 4. The Tschaikowsky selection is one of the most brilliant of this composer's works. It is essentially dramatic in treatment and emotional in expressiveness. Unlike most of his compositions its character is universal as distinguished from national. The new school of Slavic composers finds it difficult to avoid being characteristic. To be always characteristic is to be eccentric.

Tschaikowsky is often eccentric, but not so in "Romeo and Juliet." The playing of this number was superb in its fire and vigor. The "Berlinz Scherzo" is an orchestral tour de force. It is technically one of the most difficult orchestral compositions in existence. Few leaders have the temerity to attempt it. The orchestration is a continued series of tests of instrumental skill. It was marvellously well executed by the orchestra, the first violins covering themselves with glory. Nikisch's interpretation of the Schumann symphony was masterful. It was broad, dignified and yet striking. The work is familiar to concert goers, but it has never been played here with such a sweep and breadth of tone.

Miss Juch sang two numbers, the Oberon aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley." She has not been heard here in several years. Her voice has gained in volume. It is full and true. The recitative and andante of the aria were well sung, but in the allegro the voice seemed to lose its sonorous quality. The Liszt song is a gem. Miss Juch sang it poetically. She used the German text, and the lines of Heinrich Heine seemed to gain in beauty and sentiment.

The audience seemed appreciative, but it was hardly demonstrative enough in its recognition of the merits of this most felicitious concert.

BEAUCLERC.

ANOTHER CRITIC'S VIEWS.

If there were any lingering doubts as to the superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over similar organizations here they must certainly have been dispelled by their playing last evening in Chickering Hall, the occasion being the first concert in this season's series. The room was packed with an audience which was representative in character and demonstrative in its recognition of the merits of the orchestra and [illegible] and the following programme was rendered:

Tschaikowsky. Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Weber, Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
Miss Juch.

Berlioz, "Queen Mab" Scherzo, from the Symphony "Romeo and Juliet."

Liszt.....Song with Orchestra, "Loreley"
Miss Juch.

Schumann.....Symphony in D minor, No. 4

To our mind the Berlioz scherzo was the most interesting number and its performance was a perfect one, revealing at once all the very best qualities of the leader and his band. There was an indescribable delicacy of tone, an exquisite tenderness combined with great breadth of treatment.

The orchestra, by the way, is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader, as is done in the Paris Conservatoire, the strings stretching to the right and the left and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage. At the very first one was impressed, in the Tschaikowsky overture, with a fuller quality of tone than heretofore, and this must unquestionably be attributed to this new mode of grouping the players, which imparts to the wind instruments a new clearness, without detracting from the strings anything of their power and unity.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture lacks many of the qualities which have gone to make the Russian composer's music unique, but in compensation it possesses virtues which his other compositions lack. It is more gentle and tender, less wild in spirit, less harsh in tone, less indicative of his determination to crowd a theme through all obstacles. It is brilliant and coherent, and has not so much of the Slavic spirit as his symphonies for instance. When it comes to orchestration Tschaikowsky is a veritable master. He lays on the colors with unstinting generosity, and his harmonies and melodies are always original. There is a superb virility in all his music and in developing this element in the overture the orchestra was at its best.

The reading of Schumann's exquisite fourth symphony was a conservative one, wholly free from the grotesque exaggerations which have disfigured some others we have heard. Nothing could be more beautiful than the playing of the slow second movement and in vivid contrast with this came the brilliant scherzo at the finale, both fine examples of orchestral dynamics.

The soloist was Miss Emma Juch, who was heard in Weber's air from "Oberon" and subsequently in Liszt's "Loreley." She was infinitely better in the latter, which she sang with much feeling and expression. While she revealed much musical intelligence and vocal art in the air, it must be said that she lacks the breadth of style and the dramatic force which are essential to an adequate interpretation of it, such an one as Materna or Lehmann would give.

H. A.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra repeated at the Brooklyn Academy of Music the programme that was reviewed in the papers of yesterday, and repeated it to a large and thankful audience. Under the admirable lead of Mr. Nikisch it was strong, flexible, expressive, picturesque. The "Sakuntala" overture, the prelude and end to "Tristan and Isolde" and the sad, gruff, half barbaric Fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky were played as one seldom has a chance to hear them played anywhere and the enthusiasm of the listeners was properly aroused. Among the listeners was Dr. Antonin Dvorak, whose Socratic face peered from one of the boxes. The soloist, as at the rehearsal, was Emma Juch, who sang the air from "Oberon" with judgment and the "Lorelei" of Liszt with such sympathy, delicacy and sweetness, such purity of tone and clearness of enunciation that she was recalled again and again to bow, but not to sing. As in the old days of the Philharmonic regime, the stage was beautified with flowers. The next rehearsal and concert, when Professor Scharwenka will be the soloist, will occur on December 9 and 10.

NEW YORK HERALD

BOSTON'S TRIUMPHANT MUSIC MAKERS.

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Orchestra's first concert here this season brought together an audience in Chickering Hall on Thursday night remarkable in numbers and in character. The hall was crowded to the doors and scores of persons stood all evening. Every musician and music lover of note in this neighborhood was present. It was an audience of experts.

We New Yorkers were compelled years ago to admit that in some respects we hear from no other orchestra such playing as that which Mr. Nikisch and his men can give us. We have still the same admission to make. The beauty of tone precision and brilliancy of the strings of the Boston Orchestra alone suffice to make its concerts a delight, even in a community so sated with good music as is New York.

It is to be hoped that next year the management of this orchestra may find it possible to give more than five concerts here, or to give some public rehearsals.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 6, 1892.

—Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again after the Symphony orchestra's performance of the Tschaikowsky overture at the first concert in Chickering Hall, New York, Thursday night. The seats for the entire series are all sold, as in Boston. In Washington, Tuesday, the orchestra had a similar ovation.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An event that was significant and hopeful was seen yesterday in the assembling of a large audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It was the beginning of the second season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra that drew the people there, and the hopefulness of the incident lies in the fact that when Mr. Nikisch and his unrivaled band made their first appearance here a year ago they played to a pitifully small audience. It is now evident that the orchestra is appreciated and its visits will, without question, be annual affairs from this time forth. Men and women hear no finer music in this world than they heard yesterday who attended the so called public rehearsal at the Academy, for there is no orchestra to surpass this one, started and long maintained through the munificence and public spirit of an art loving citizen of Boston. It discloses few and unimportant changes of personality this season, and it has already been playing long enough since vacation to have acquired the firmness, resonance and brilliancy that are habitual to its work. The strings have the same flow, sweetness and voice like quality, and in the wind choirs where, if in any department, there was weakness formerly, there is such improvement as to bring the ensemble close to the limit of possible perfection. Mr. Nikisch is as self contained as ever, seeming to govern his players more by purpose than by action, for there are no superfluous flagellations of the atmosphere in his leading, but every stroke of the baton is indicative and seems to carry an electric message of command. The playing is as uniform in expression as it is in attack and intonation, and the reading of the guiding eye and ear is that which is accepted by every musician in the corps. Mr. Nikisch's programmes are always marked by brevity. Nobody leaves his concerts with a feeling of surfeit. Yesterday he played just about two hours, but he crowded a good deal into that space of time. His programme was entirely familiar. The numbers on it had been played by him before and by Thomas and Seidl also. They were the picturesque, artistically constructed "Sakuntala" overture, in which Goldmark has a little surpassed himself, the introduction and death scene from "Tristan and Isolde" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony. To the grace of action and rich scoring in the Goldmark number there was an addition of sentiment and the rendering was no less remarkable for power than for sublety. The passing of themes from one instrument to another was accomplished so deftly that string tones merged almost imperceptibly into those of reeds; indeed, there are people living who can remember when such a performance as that of yesterday would have been regarded as almost a miracle. In Wagner's music Mr. Nikisch has sometimes failed to attain the utmost dramatic effect, because he has not been practised in the conduct of operas, though he has always given clear views of Wagner's mental and spiritual attitudes and purposes; but the "Tristan and Isolde" selection yesterday he made big with feeling and dignity. It rose higher and higher in power as he proceeded, until at the tremendous crescendo one might say that art has its limit here and has reached the grandeur and endurance of nature. Here is a manifestation of spirit that ranks among the eternal verities, that purifies and ennobles like the sea, the mountains and the sunset, that is great because it means more than it tells. Tschaikowsky's symphony, relatively wanting both in power and charm, is nevertheless musicianly and original. Apart from its strictly artistic interest is an ethnological manifestation. It is a reduction to melody and harmony of the fierce, frank, yet saddened spirit that tells itself elsewhere in books of whilom popularity and in the pictures of Repin and Verestchagin. Look at the pictures by Repin in the last number of the Century before hearing these wild Cossack rhythms and modulations, and you will find the one a key to the other. The workmanship of the symphony is earnest and honest, none the less, and the piece may endure in public estimation longer than the works of Rubinstein, who is untrue to his nation because he fancies that truth to his art requires that he should be. As between the two composers, Rubinstein has the more elegance and scholarship, but Tschaikowsky is the more free and genuine. Emma Juch was the soloist, and she first gave the recitative and air from "Oberon," beginning with rather a hifalutin apostrophe to the ocean. This selection she gave with intelligence, but not with the breadth and command that it needed. She was better in Liszt's setting of Heine's "Loreley," for that wanted just such a voice as hers—light, sweet and true—to represent its mystery. Poem and music are imaginative and symbolical: we are absorbed in ideals and see not where we are drifting; and the strangeness and pathos of the truth are told by Heine without his usual sarcasm and by Liszt in his musical romance. To-night the programme will be repeated. During the summer the old box scene belonging to the Philharmonic society has been repainted, but hardly improved, the paneling of its upper spaces with heavy red being a mistake, because heavy colors ought to gravitate toward the bottom and because heavy colors ought never to be used, anyway, especially in an interior. In the Academy it is out of harmony with the other tints; still, it is an improvement on the blue, chocolate and crimson horror that was several times used last season. To-night the stage will be decorated with flowers.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 129.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Orchestra's Success in Other Cities.

"The Fencing Master" Makes a Hit at the Hollis Street—"Tar and Tartar" at the Globe—Rice's Sunday Night Concerts—Cyril Tyler's Farewell—Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its first tour of the present season at Brooklyn last evening, and it is gratifying to local pride to be able to say that the success of the home concerts of this organization has been fully equalled in all the cities visited during the week.

The severity of the tests which the orchestra is put to in visiting the other cities included in these occasional tours can hardly be over stated, and the ready recognition of the merits of the Boston orchestra and its conductor, from both the press and publics of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, affords indisputable evidence of its value as a musical organization.

Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the evening of the concert, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons. The audience in Philadelphia number 3300 by actual count, 700 of these being admission ticket buyers who came early and stood through the programme.

Such results fully justify the estimate put upon value of the Boston orchestra in this city.

Clipping from Tribune
Brooklyn Daily Eagle
Date 1892

Symphony Concert.

At the first concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders theatre, on Thursday evening of last week, the programme was made up exclusively of Beethoven's works, as follows: Overture, Leonore, No. 3. Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major. Symphony, No. 3, Eroica. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist. This greatest of the Leonore overtures was superbly played, the slow introduction being taken in just the right tempo to make it impressive, and the beautiful theme in the succeeding Allegro was worked up to a splendid pitch of excitement, which won enthusiastic applause from the very large audience. Mr. Busoni's large, fluent technique, and clear, liquid touch, easily met the most exacting demands of the concerto, and if he did not penetrate the innermost depths of this immortal work, one could but feel the warmest admiration for the unaffected simplicity of his style, and earnest devotion to his work. Mr. Busoni's tone is especially delightful, as he never forces the piano beyond its proper limits, while his grace and beauty of phrasing are always apparent. The cadenzas, written by Mr. Busoni, were rich in harmony, and most effective in the treatment of the various themes. He was warmly applauded and recalled. The concert ended with a fiery performance of the great Eroica symphony, which proved that in spite of Mr. Nikisch's unquestioned leaning towards the modern and romantic school, he knows his Beethoven well, and plays it con amore. The wonderful intensity of the first movement was revealed in its utmost brightness, and the "Marcia Funebre" moved at a pace which did not weary the audience, but at the same time was consistent with the solemnity of its character. The contrast between this tragic mood and the tender gladness of the Scherzo was beautifully defined, the story told by the horns, being on the whole very well done when one considers that this was the first performance of this symphony for many months. The finale, with its series of brilliant variations, was a triumph of virtuosity, the strings, as well as Messrs. Molé and Santet, covering themselves with glory. The keen, poetical insight of Mr. Nikisch always leads him to heighten, rather than detract from the central idea of the composer, and whatever exception may be taken from a bird's eye point of view, the grand effect of the whole is unmistakable. Mr. Nikisch was warmly received and applauded at the end of the concert. The next concert will be given on Thursday evening, November 10. According to present appearances Cambridge will undoubtedly become quite a musical centre, with ten symphony concerts in the Sanders theatre, and others to be announced later.

HE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU.
Robert and Linn Luce, 68 Devonshire Street,
P. O. Box 2616, Boston.
Clipping No.
ipping from TELEGRAPH, Philadelphia, Penn.
ate 11-3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened at the Academy of Music last evening with the same evidences of fashionable following which have marked these high-grade entertainments for several years. The Academy was thronged, and it is understood that seats for single nights are difficult to get except by hands of speculative holders, the house having been practically sold out by season tickets in advance. The opening of the new series was not one of the strongest concerts given by the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia; it had interest, of course, but it would have been easy to make a more valuable and enjoyable programme. It depended mainly on Tschaikowsky's E Minor No. 5 Symphony, which no degree of admiration for that composer can make one pronounce a greatly inspired work. No doubt the general feeling over the Symphony was one of disappointment, and as it occupied the full latter half of the evening the finish was not inspiriting nor of the kind to send people away in a thrill of pleasure and in a mood to spread the news of a striking musical event. The incident seems to show again that Tschaikowsky has really made his name by his minor works and not through his nuge concert pieces. Another of his Symphonies (that marked No. 2) has been heard here and found very tedious; the No. 5 has, at least, more vitality than that work. Then, there was the Piano Forte Concerto which the Russian musician himself conducted in his too-brief visit to this city, and in which Miss Aus der Ohe seems to have broken herself down, for she has scarcely appeared in public since. The immense and reckless labor given to the study and "committing" of that portentous work, for but one or two performances, we shall always regard as a singularly misapplied piece of energy. Work like that is reasonably done for use and to an end, but this was mere enthusiastic foolishness; it would have been a task only to have played it from book. The E Minor Symphony is neither classic nor romantic. The really enjoyable thing in Tschaikowsky is the Slavonic wildness, the odd rhythms, the fierce originality of the new Northern School, of which he is a master. There are some outbreaks of this kind in his Fifth Symphony, but for the most part the work follows the accepted models, and the Russian on classic lines seems not his true self. The other orchestral numbers were the Oberon overture and the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from Tristan and Isolde. The playing of the fine band in these sections, as throughout, was of the perfect kind which the public has grown to admire in other years. Nothing more finished is conceivable, though, as before, we felt the want of verve and force. These eighty-five instruments often give no more than the effect of half their number, and that not only in piano, but in forte passages it seems a waste. It was a night of great triumph for Miss Emma Juch. The lady sang the scena "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Oberon, and Lizst's "Loreley," with a passion, an understanding, and a perfection of technique which no American artist of the period can pretend to rival. Finally, we would in all kindness urge Mr. Nikisch to throw off that incubus of weariness and melancholy, which weighs down his audience as well as himself. After all, there are other burdens and responsibilities in life than the conducting of an orchestra. This lackadaisical posturing seems to have been played for all it is worth. Let him brace up.

STAR, Washington, D. C. 11-2

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The musical season may be said to have been formally opened last night by the first concert at Metzerott's Music Hall of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This band of musicians is undoubtedly the finest orchestral organization in this country, and its popularity here was attested by the large and appreciative audience that filled the new hall to listen to the excellent program that had been announced. The high perfection of the orchestra was fully manifest in the excellent performance of the opening number, the "Tannhauser" overture, and the loud applause that followed the grand climax with which it closed testified to the warm appreciation of the audience. Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony was evidently new to a large number of those present, and its daintiness and delicacy was listened to with pleasurable surprises. The Schumann Symphony in D minor was the other number of the orchestra and all the movements were given with a precision and intelligence that gave the most complete satisfaction. The soloists of the evening were Miss Emma Juch and Mr. Franz Kneisel. The former displayed that admirable method that has won for her such high popularity, although her voice exhibited evidences of the hard usage it had received in her operatic work. Mr. Kneisel gave two selections, a romance by Svendsen and a farfalla by Sauret, in both of which his artistic excell[illegible] violinist was plainly [illegible]

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 11-3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Night a Great Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of an audience which completely filled the auditorium, and which was made up of what are conventionally known as "the best people" in Philadelphia. Society, with a discrimination which it does not always exercise, has taken the Boston Orchestra up, and has so strongly reinforced the regular army of music-lovers that for each of the five concerts which it was arranged that Mr. Nikisch should give the house had some days ago been sold out. Under these circumstances it may be hoped that the management will find a way to arrange for a supplementary concert or two, or at least an extra matinee. The orchestra has never given a matinee in Philadelphia, and there is no doubt that a large section of the public would be glad to have it do so.

The feature of last night's programme, whose five numbers consisted exclusively of romantic music, was a new symphony in E minor, No. 5, by the Russian composer Ilyitch Tschaikowsky. It is not, of course, possible to write with assurance or adequacy of a composition of this magnitude and importance after a single hearing. All that can be done is to record a general impression. This new symphony in E minor, like the other works of its composer, shows decided originality of invention, a fine capacity for emotional utterance and an easy command of all the resources of a modern orchestra. Like them, also, it betrays a constant tendency to force the note and exaggerate the emphasis, and a persistent striving after extraordinary effects, which, sometimes successful, as often fails. There is a kind of barbaric strength about the symphony suggestive of a passion untutored and uncontrolled, and parts of it are extremely interesting and impressive, but much of the material is elaborated to a degree which is a tax upon the listener's patience, and altogether Tschaikowsky lays it on rather too thick. The sentiment of the symphony is naturally Slavonic in its melancholy, and in a kind of hopelessness which sometimes rages with the fury of a frenzied despair and sometimes sinks to the subdued wistfulness of an enforced resignation. Whether pure music such as Mozart and Beethoven gave us should be thus distinguishable is a question.

The other orchestral numbers were the "Oberon" overture and an arrangement from "Tristan and Isolde," both of which, as was the symphony, were superbly played. In the overture the lovely, poetic, fairy-like delicacy of the adagio was not more notable than the verve and brilliancy of the succeeding allegro, and both in the symphony and in the "Tristan" music the orchestra, stimulated by Mr. Nikisch, played with a breadth and power and resounding sonority which in previous seasons have sometimes been missed. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. As a lyric singer, a dramatic area such as "Ocean, thou mighty monster" is scarcely in her genre, but she sang it with much intelligence and surprising breadth, and was even more successful in her artistic delivery of Lizst's familiar setting of the "Loreley" legend. She was much and deservedly applauded.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 131.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second of the Kneisel quartet's series of chamber concerts, given at Chickering Hall last evening, proved to be a very interesting occasion, and the selections made for the string players and Mr. Clayton Johns, the pianist, assisting, were greatly enjoyed. The opening work was Lalo's quartet in E flat, this having a first hearing here in this concert. The many beauties of the quartet and its charming performance by Mr. Kneisel and his associates quite delighted all who heard it, and its merits proved the good taste of Mr. Kneisel in making selections for these concerts. Mr. Johns gave Mr. Kneisel very efficient aid at the piano in the playing of Schumann's sonata for violin and piano in A minor, and Schubert's quartet in D minor made an effective ending of the programme, in which the quartet was heard at its best.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, NOV. 8, 1892.

Kneisel Quartet.

The second of the Kneisel quartet concerts was given in Chickering Hall last evening, with the usual large audience in attendance. Mr. Clayton Johns assisted, accompanying Mr. Franz Kneisel in his solo number, Schumann's sonata in A minor.

The novelty of the evening was Ed Lalo's quartet in E flat, which was played for the first time here. It consisted of four movements, the second being the most original. Mr. Kneisel's rendering of the Schumann sonata was in his usual finished style, with that delicate touch so exceptionally his own, and the daintiness of the allegretto movement was the signal for an outburst of applause.

Schubert's quartet in D minor has been heard often, but never to better advantage. In fact, the more one hears this organization play the more it seems to bring out those points in a composition which the composer himself had in mind when at work.

It is safe to say that there is no quartet in the world which can approach them.

The third concert is announced for Monday, Nov. 21, when one or two novelties are promised.

BULLETIN, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 11-3

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was known a fortnight ago that the concerts of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra this season were to have great success. The sale of tickets at that time made this certain. When the doors of the Academy were opened last evening the gathered throng soon filled all the seats of every part of the house, and a great number of persons had to stand at the back of the auditorium during the whole performance. The multitude was appreciative as well as numerous, for the truest lovers of good music were there.

The musicians were in their places at 8.15. They so filled the great stage that there was only a narrow passage for the leader and the solo-singer. Miss Juch had a hard task to grope and clamber to the front, as she had to do about twenty times in response to the wild demands of her admirers. The programme began with Von Weber's Oberon overture played with a finish, a delicacy and a poetical sentiment that have never been attained by any other orchestral leader that has attempted it in Philadelphia. Every man of the band was a true artist, the horns were as smooth as the violins, and there was not a wrong note from any of the others. Mr. Nikisch's reading differs in some passages from those that we have heard, and it revealed new beauties in the noble composition. It was followed by Miss Juch's singing of the grand aria from the same opera, "Ocean, thou mighty monster!" The lady sang with grace and elegance, and in the declamatory parts showed more than usual fire. She used, too, the original English words, which she articulates in a manner that might well be studied by native singers. She was repeatedly called out, but very properly declined to repeat the air.

The next number was the Vorspiel and Liebestod of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, played in an entirely perfect manner by the orchestra. Detached from the "music drama" such pieces have no dramatic illusion, and they do not show the composer at his best. But none could fail to enjoy the strange, novel modulations, the singularly beautiful orchestration and the consistent but surprising effects of the development of the weird themes. Miss Juch followed, with an admirable performance of Liszt's Lorely aria, in which lovely melody is joined to noble instrumentation. Again was the lady compelled to come forward by the clamor of her admirers, and again she declined to interrupt the programme.

The latter part of the concert was given up to Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor, played here for the first time. It is in four movements and grandiose in its pretensions. It proves that the composer is thoroughly acquainted with all the technicalities of the orchestra. Such scholarship is rare among living composers. Indeed, the ambition to display this accomplishment exceeds the power to produce what is pleasing, poetic and intelligible. There were many bits full of grace, but the work as a whole is not impressive. At times there are trivialities and frivolities, aimed, perhaps, to express humor, but they miss their mark. Often a few noble bars excite expectation, but they lead to nothing or are disappointing in some way. The Symphony as a whole does not bear comparison with any one by the great master of symphony. The last movement, however, is brilliant if not great, and it sent the audience home in a happy frame of mind.

There are to be four more of these concerts, the next one to be given on Wednesday evening, December 7.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1892.

Kneisel Quartet.

At Chickering Hall last evening to a large and fashionable audience Mr. Kneisel presented the second concert of his quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns. The programme was quartet in E flat, with four movements, by Edward Lalo, played for the first time, and most carefully rendered; sonata for piano and violin in A minor, three movements, from R. Schumann, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist, assisted by Mr. Johns, beautifully given, and showing the power of both performers; F. Schubert's superb quartet in D minor, with four movements, allegro, andante con moto, allegro molto, presto, executed as it has been seldom done before, giving Mr. Kneisel grand opportunities for solo passages, which he most skilfully and beautifully rendered. After the second movement the audience took some minutes to quiet down. The next concert will be Nov. 21.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Robert and Linn Luce, 68 Devonshire Street,
P. O. Box 2616, Boston.
Clipping No.
Clipping from
RECORD, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 13

[illegible] apoplexy.

SOME GREAT MUSIC.

Tschaikowsky's Latest Symphony at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Year after year the extraordinary perfection in technique and in musical expression that has been attained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra becomes more and more apparent, and the concerts given by these talented musicians are consequently regarded as among the leading musical events of the season. This year the band seems to be stronger and more homogeneous than ever, and its performance last evening at the Academy of Music was a source of unmixed delight. It was the first concert of the series in this city, and there was not a vacant seat to be seen in any portion of the vast auditorium.

The mellifluous overture to "Oberon" and the "Tristan and Isolde" music—the prelude and Isolde's death song have been given here on previous occasions by Mr. Nikisch's forces—and the familiar effects of perfect harmony, dramatic inspiration and perfect balance of tone, were repeated in the rendering of both the earlier and the later compositions. The "Oberon" overture enhanced the effect of the grand aria from Weber's opera which Miss Juch sang during the evening with orchestral accompaniment. "Ocean, thou mighty monster," is a favorite subject for butchery by ambitious albeit inexperienced sopranos, and it was refreshing to listen to its adequate musical treatment by Miss Juch, who lacks only the massive voice of Materna to render this aria one of the most notable of her vocal repertoire. The cantatrice also sang Liszt's "Loreley" with exquisite finish of vocal style and true artistic expression.

The chief instrumental number of the evening was Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, which was heard here on this occasion for the first time. It is in the characteristic style of this composer, with daring innovations in the handling of the themes—which are distinctively Russian—and an infinite elaboration of orchestral treatment throughout. The opening andante movement is musicianly and satisfying, the allegro an inspiration of energy and fury, and the waltz—which the composer has used in place of the customary scherzo or minuet—a dainty and graceful yet vigorous and well-sustained bit of composition. The finale opens with a majestic andante, in which reappears the original theme, followed by a characteristic presto movement in which all the resources of modern orchestration are employed to the closing bars. The upper woodwind was unpleasantly dominant at times, and with a profusion of melody there was also no little confusion and mere noise; yet this symphony will nevertheless be generally accepted as a notable and enduring contribution to contemporary music.

[34]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1892.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The first public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program includes the overture "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in E minor No. 5, Tschaikowsky, and vocal numbers by Miss Emma Juch.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1892.

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

The Brooklyn public does not yet seem to have discovered that by all odds the best concerts ever heard in the Academy over there are those given by the Boston Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Yesterday afternoon, when the rehearsal for the first concert of their winter's series was given, the building was by no means crowded and the applause was not what it ought to have been.

Mr. Nikisch led the orchestra, of course, and his men played with the splendid dash, spirit and technical perfection that may be expected from this body of virtuosi as a matter of course. The programme comprised Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and Tschaikowsky's fine symphony in E minor.

The orchestra found its best opportunities in the symphony and gave a really brilliant performance. The second movement, with its noble theme for the horn, was a triumph.

Miss Juch was the soloist and attempted Weber's "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," without suggesting its broadly dramatic character. In Liszt's "Die Loreley" the result was far more satisfactory.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second of the concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E flat, Op. 19.....Lalo
Sonata for pianoforte and violin, A minor.....Schumann
Quartette, D minor.....Schubert

Lalo is known chiefly in this country by the violin compositions written for Sarasate. But the career of Edouard Victor Antoine Lalo is worthy of the serious attention of all students of music. He was born at Lille in 1823, and he died in the April of the present year. His first teacher was a German named Baumann; his first compositions showed his study of the great German composers, and they were at first more appreciated in Germany than in his own country. He is one of the few French musicians who did not at once look to the operatic stage for reputation. When he first went to Paris he played the viola in the quartette founded by Armingaud and Jacquard, and he wrote chamber music, music for the orchestra and songs. He himself has told us that until he was 42 he had never thought of the stage. He then began an opera, "Fiesque," which has never been produced. "Le Roi d'Ys," the opera that made him famous, was not brought out until 1888, and he was then 65 years old.

There are two string quartettes by him; the one played last night for the first time in Boston, and op. 45, which, I believe, is still in manuscript. The quartette in E flat is like the career of the man and like the man himself. Even his face, if the portrait is faithful, goes with the music. The career of the man was full of discouragement. He was not appreciated at first by his colleagues or the public. In later years he was, for a long time, the sport of managers. He was called "a member of the severe order of bores." He was taunted with a desire for "orchestral composition." He was accused gravely of Wagnerism. But he did not complain. He did not sulk. He did better; he worked patiently, for he believed in Time, the great Avenger.

And this quartette shows labor rather than spontaneous invention. With the exception of the trio of the third movement there is no theme that attracts at once popular attention. The music is serious throughout; too serious, perhaps, for the thought is so heavy at times that it is almost obscure, and the harmonic progressions seem like unto ponderous and far-fetched arguments. It is sincere music, the music of a man who wrote first of all to satisfy his own convictions. The first movement opens clearly, but the themes are not remarkable, and the development is the answer to a self-imposed problem that seems unnecessarily difficult and hardly worth the solving. There is ingenuity, there is boldness in modulation, there is contrapuntal skill, but one searches with a lantern for music. The second movement is grimly gloomy. The gloom, however, is the depression of a noble soul. Only in the third movement is there the sharply defined rhythm or the piquant melody that was the right of Lalo by his Spanish descent. The finale is the end, carefully constructed, to be sure; but to the hearer it appears simply as the fourth movement demanded by the traditions of the quartette. There is not one touch of vulgarity in the composition; there is a painstaking shunning of the commonplace, and there is very little inspiration.

It is perhaps impertinent to add that the performance of the two quartettes was admirable throughout in all the qualities that are characteristic of perfect ensemble. It is seldom that such unalloyed pleasure is given to lovers of music as was given last evening by the superb reading of the famous second movement of the Schubert quartette. The conception was so free from sentimentality and affectation, so noble and serene.

The sonata was finely played so far as Mr. Kneisel was concerned, but the passionate work of Schumann demands a pianist of marked temperament and technique.

PHILIP HALE.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

II. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 7, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ED. LALO. QUARTET in E flat. op. 19.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—Allegro con fuoco.—Allegro vivace.
(First time.)

R. SCHUMANN. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN, in A minor.
Appassionata.—Allegretto.—Allegro.

F. SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Allegro molto.—Presto.

The date of the Third Concert is November 21.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

That the public taste for the refined form of the string quartette is fostered in Boston by an organization so perfect as the Kneisel Quartette is almost as much a matter of congratulation as the existence of our great symphony orchestra or great choral societies; for the surest criterion of sound musical judgment on the part of the public is an appreciation of this chaste classical school, and Chickering Hall was crowded last night.

The strongest part of the programme was its closing number. Schubert may not be as much a master of development as Beethoven but he is more than his equal in adapting his ideas to his vehicle of expression when that medium is anything less than the full orchestra, and his lyrical treatment of the string instruments causes them to sing in a manner that has something of the charm of the human voice. The D minor quartette which was given at this concert is the perfection of such semi-vocal treatment and it is the more marked since the Andante is founded on the theme of Schubert's song "Der Tod und das Mædchen," which is here varied in a beautiful manner. This picture of death and life seems to be the central idea of the whole composition and in the broad measures of the first movement one can readily detect a portrayal of the dark and sombre shadows of a funereal occasion, while the exciting themes and treatment of the finale seem a picture of the struggle of existence. There is nothing more dangerous in music than to attempt to fathom every meaning of a composer, but it is not audacious to apply to the study of such a tone-picture the words which the composer has used in the song which furnishes thematic material for its most expressive movement. Here they are:—

The Maiden:—
"Pass onward! Why linger!
Thou skeleton so white
For I am young, thy finger
On me can have no might."

Death:—
"Give me thy hand thou fair and gentle child,
Thy friend am I, and punish never;
Be not afraid, I am not wild,
Within my arms thou'lt sleep forever."

And in these words of Claudius one may discern the impelling motive of the entire work, which in its breadth, its strong contrasts and its singable themes, is certainly the best of Schubert's productions in this form, and may rank with the strongest of all string quartettes. The quartette lost nothing in the playing, and was given with a degree of expression that suited it well, while the ensemble was such as the Kneisel Quartette has accustomed us to for the last few years. The second movement, the important andante above mentioned, was given with a fervor that carried every auditor along with it, and, while every instrument was well played, the beautiful daintiness of the embelishments of the theme on the first violin, and the breadth of the viola work call for especial mention. The searcher for coincidences of musical treatment could not fail to notice that Wagner (Mime's theme) was represented in the chief figure of the third movement, and Beethoven (Kreutzer Sonata) in the chief theme of the final. The splendid performance of this work was the chief glory of the concert.

Lalo's string quartette in E flat represented the element of novelty. It is not, however, a work to grow very enthusiastic over. One may praise the composer for having kept within the lines of good musical form, which is something in these latter days, and for giving plenty of brightness and dash to his work. The first movement is a clear example of sonata-form, and the legato chief theme is in good contrast with the mysterious second subject, but the development is ineffective, and the composer evidently finds this, pons asinorum of modern writers, a difficult path to travel. The return, however, is cleverly made, and the coda is well woven out of the chief theme. The second movement bristles with organ-points and stationary tones, but is rather monochromatic in its mournful earnestness and its shower of cello syncopations in pizzicato. It was not so well played as the rest of the work. The third movement seemed rather trivial, and dallied with a Laendler-like theme, which it finally chopped into fragments for a coda. The finale was bright, crisp and concise, and seemed, at a first hearing, to be, next to the first movement, the clearest part of the composition.

The chief merit of the new work (heard for the first time in Boston) was that it was not too ambitious, and not too vague. Only the adagio strained after original progressions and swam in that "sea of tone" which Wagner sailed so boldly, and in which so many of his imitators have drowned.

The solo number of the concert was something not less passionate than the Schubert quartette mentioned above. It was Schumann's A minor sonata for violin and piano, played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Clayton Johns. This work is in clearer form than many of the compositions of the epoch in which it was produced (1851) and while it has far more thematic treatment than the Schubert work, this does not impair its display of emotion and romantic power. In fact one sees here a flickering up of the flames which burnt so fiercely in the composer 11 years before. The playing was good in ensemble and the phrasing was commendably clear, so that one could follow the transfigurations of the chief themes readily; but more of passion would not have been amiss at times, and a degree of explosive force was present in the first and last movements, which was not the idea of the introspective Schumann. The piano part here seemed to overpower the violin. But the allegretto was played delightfully by both Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Johns.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-4

AMERICA'S GREATEST ORCHESTRA.

Crowds of Musical People Flock to the First Boston Symphony Concert.

An almost [illegible]amme, barring the singing, and interpreted, too, in a most superior mode, was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Chickering Hall. An organization, whose virtuosity has no equal on the continent, and a leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, whose affinity for compositions of the romantic school—these factors were all very patent last night to the listeners at this first concert, and Chickering Hall was literally choked with musical people.

Peter Tschaikowsky opened the evening's entertainment, his superbly sonorous overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," being given. The hyphenated title (overture-fantasy) is a form in which the passionate pictorial and vividly dramatic gifts of the great Russian find ample scope. Charged with pain and passion, this significant fantasy gives the lie to the apostles of "no emotion in music." Indefinite as music ever must be, but subtly suggestive, nevertheless, there are pages in this work which rank the composer with the immortals. It is not all sound and fury, like some of his music, wherein the Cossack blood overbears the poet's judgment. It has proportion, symmetry, a wealth of color and the composer has well sensed the dramatic situations. What lovely episodes, and how keen the despair and anguish of wrecked lives! It is a great work, and candor compels one to say it was greatly played.

Nikisch last night glowed with a fine fire that he communicated to his forces. The homogeneity of tone, the incisive attack, the dynamic contrasts, all were present, and the detail work was most lovingly exploited.

Virtuosity reached white heat in the performance of Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet." The arabesques were given with Meissonier delicacy and clarity.

Of the Schumann D minor symphony there is little to be said. Its performance was a tour de force, for it has always been dear to Mr. Nikisch's heart. Musical, tender and brilliant was the work of the band, and it was directed con amore. Need more be said?

Emma Juch was the singer. Her voice shows wear and tear and Western "one-night stands," but she is an artist, she is musical au bout des ongles, and her articulation miraculous as compared with her contemporaries. She essayed Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and as an essay it merits recognition; as an interpretation it was puny. Far better she succeeded with Liszt's effective but artificial "Loreley." Her phrasing was delightful in this, and her singing so excellent that she was given a triple recall. But the orchestra, after all, was the soloist of the evening.

[35]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1892.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The first public rehearsal and concert of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program includes the overture "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; symphony in E minor No. 5, Tschaikowsky, and vocal numbers by Miss Emma Juch.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1892.

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

The Brooklyn public does not yet seem to have discovered that by all odds the best concerts ever heard in the Academy over there are those given by the Boston Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. Yesterday afternoon, when the rehearsal for the first concert of their winter's series was given, the building was by no means crowded and the applause was not what it ought to have been.

Mr. Nikisch led the orchestra, of course, and his men played with the splendid dash, spirit and technical perfection that may be expected from this body of virtuosi as a matter of course. The programme comprised Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and Tschaikowsky's fine symphony in E minor.

The orchestra found its best opportunities in the symphony and gave a really brilliant performance. The second movement, with its noble theme for the horn, was a triumph.

Miss Juch was the soloist and attempted Weber's "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," without suggesting its broadly dramatic character. In Liszt's "Die Loreley" the result was far more satisfactory.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second of the concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E flat, Op. 19.....Lalo
Sonata for pianoforte and violin, A minor.....Schumann
Quartette, D minor.....Schubert

Lalo is known chiefly in this country by the violin compositions written for Sarasate. But the career of Edouard Victor Antoine Lalo is worthy of the serious attention of all students of music. He was born at Lille in 1823, and he died in the April of the present year. His first teacher was a German named Baumann; his first compositions showed his study of the great German composers, and they were at first more appreciated in Germany than in his own country. He is one of the few French musicians who did not at once look to the operatic stage for reputation. When he first went to Paris he played the viola in the quartette founded by Armingaud and Jacquard, and he wrote chamber music, music for the orchestra and songs. He himself has told us that until he was 42 he had never thought of the stage. He then began an opera, "Fiesque," which has never been produced. "Le Roi d'Ys," the opera that made him famous, was not brought out until 1888, and he was then 65 years old.

There are two string quartettes by him; the one played last night for the first time in Boston, and op. 45, which, I believe, is still in manuscript. The quartette in E flat is like the career of the man and like the man himself. Even his face, if the portrait is faithful, goes with the music. The career of the man was full of discouragement. He was not appreciated at first by his colleagues or the public. In later years he was, for a long time, the sport of managers. He was called "a member of the severe order of bores." He was taunted with a desire for "orchestral composition." He was accused gravely of Wagnerism. But he did not complain. He did not sulk. He did better; he worked patiently, for he believed in Time, the great Avenger.

And this quartette shows labor rather than spontaneous invention. With the exception of the trio of the third movement there is no theme that attracts at once popular attention. The music is serious throughout; too serious, perhaps, for the thought is so heavy at times that it is almost obscure, and the harmonic progressions seem like unto ponderous and far-fetched arguments. It is sincere music, the music of a man who wrote first of all to satisfy his own convictions. The first movement opens clearly, but the themes are not remarkable, and the development is the answer to a self-imposed problem that seems unnecessarily difficult and hardly worth the solving. There is ingenuity, there is boldness in modulation, there is contrapuntal skill, but one searches with a lantern for music. The second movement is grimly gloomy. The gloom, however, is the depression of a noble soul. Only in the third movement is there the sharply defined rhythm or the piquant melody that was the right of Lalo by his Spanish descent. The finale is the end, carefully constructed, to be sure; but to the hearer it appears simply as the fourth movement demanded by the traditions of the quartette. There is not one touch of vulgarity in the composition; there is a painstaking shunning of the commonplace, and there is very little inspiration.

It is perhaps impertinent to add that the performance of the two quartettes was admirable throughout in all the qualities that are characteristic of perfect ensemble. It is seldom that such unalloyed pleasure is given to lovers of music as was given last evening by the superb reading of the famous second movement of the Schubert quartette. The conception was so free from sentimentality and affectation, so noble and serene.

The sonata was finely played so far as Mr. Kneisel was concerned, but the passionate work of Schumann demands a pianist of marked temperament and technique.

PHILIP HALE.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

II. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 7, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ED. LALO. QUARTET in E flat. op. 19.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—Allegro con fuoco.—Allegro vivace.
(First time.)

R. SCHUMANN. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN, in A minor.
Appassionata.—Allegretto.—Allegro.

F. SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Allegro molto.—Presto.

The date of the Third Concert is November 21.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

That the public taste for the refined form of the string quartette is fostered in Boston by an organization so perfect as the Kneisel Quartette is almost as much a matter of congratulation as the existence of our great symphony orchestra or great choral societies; for the surest criterion of sound musical judgment on the part of the public is an appreciation of this chaste classical school, and Chickering Hall was crowded last night.

The strongest part of the programme was its closing number. Schubert may not be as much a master of development as Beethoven but he is more than his equal in adapting his ideas to his vehicle of expression when that medium is anything less than the full orchestra, and his lyrical treatment of the string instruments causes them to sing in a manner that has something of the charm of the human voice. The D minor quartette which was given at this concert is the perfection of such semi-vocal treatment and it is the more marked since the Andante is founded on the theme of Schubert's song "Der Tod und das Mædchen," which is here varied in a beautiful manner. This picture of death and life seems to be the central idea of the whole composition and in the broad measures of the first movement one can readily detect a portrayal of the dark and sombre shadows of a funereal occasion, while the exciting themes and treatment of the finale seem a picture of the struggle of existence. There is nothing more dangerous in music than to attempt to fathom every meaning of a composer, but it is not audacious to apply to the study of such a tone-picture the words which the composer has used in the song which furnishes thematic material for its most expressive movement. Here they are:—

The Maiden:—
"Pass onward! Why linger!
Thou skeleton so white
For I am young, thy finger
On me can have no might."

Death:—
"Give me thy hand thou fair and gentle child,
Thy friend am I, and punish never;
Be not afraid, I am not wild.
Within my arms thou'lt sleep forever."

And in these words of Claudius one may discern the impelling motive of the entire work, which in its breadth, its strong contrasts and its singable themes, is certainly the best of Schubert's productions in this form, and may rank with the strongest of all string quartettes. The quartette lost nothing in the playing, and was given with a degree of expression that suited it well, while the ensemble was such as the Kneisel Quartette has accustomed us to for the last few years. The second movement, the important andante above mentioned, was given with a fervor that carried every auditor along with it, and, while every instrument was well played, the beautiful daintiness of the embelishments of the theme on the first violin, and the breadth of the viola work call for especial mention. The searcher for coincidences of musical treatment could not fail to notice that Wagner (Mime's theme) was represented in the chief figure of the third movement, and Beethoven (Kreutzer Sonata) in the chief theme of the final. The splendid performance of this work was the chief glory of the concert.

Lalo's string quartette in E flat represented the element of novelty. It is not, however, a work to grow very enthusiastic over. One may praise the composer for having kept within the lines of good musical form, which is something in these latter days, and for giving plenty of brightness and dash to his work. The first movement is a clear example of sonata-form, and the legato chief theme is in good contrast with the mysterious second subject, but the development is ineffective, and the composer evidently finds this, pons asinorum of modern writers, a difficult path to travel. The return, however, is cleverly made, and the coda is well woven out of the chief theme. The second movement bristles with organ-points and stationary tones, but is rather monochromatic in its mournful earnestness and its shower of cello syncopations in pizzicato. It was not so well played as the rest of the work. The third movement seemed rather trivial, and dallied with a Laendler-like theme, which it finally chopped into fragments for a coda. The finale was bright, crisp and concise, and seemed, at a first hearing, to be, next to the first movement, the clearest part of the composition.

The chief merit of the new work (heard for the first time in Boston) was that it was not too ambitious, and not too vague. Only the adagio strained after original progressions and swam in that "sea of tone" which Wagner sailed so boldly, and in which so many of his imitators have drowned.

The solo number of the concert was something not less passionate than the Schubert quartette mentioned above. It was Schumann's A minor sonata for violin and piano, played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Clayton Johns. This work is in clearer form than many of the compositions of the epoch in which it was produced (1851) and while it has far more thematic treatment than the Schubert work, this does not impair its display of emotion and romantic power. In fact one sees here a flickering up of the flames which burnt so fiercely in the composer 11 years before. The playing was good in ensemble and the phrasing was commendably clear, so that one could follow the transfigurations of the chief themes readily; but more of passion would not have been amiss at times, and a degree of explosive force was present in the first and last movements, which was not the idea of the introspective Schumann. The piano part here seemed to overpower the violin. But the allegretto was played delightfully by both Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Johns.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date

AMERICA'S GREATEST ORCHESTRA.

Crowds of Musical People Flock to the First Boston Symphony Concert.

An almost [illegible] programme, barring the singing, and interpreted, too, in a most superior mode, was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Chickering Hall. An organization, whose virtuosity has no equal on the continent, and a leader, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, whose affinity for compositions of the romantic school—these factors were all very patent last night to the listeners at this first concert, and Chickering Hall was literally choked with musical people.

Peter Tschaikowsky opened the evening's entertainment, his superbly sonorous overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," being given. The hyphenated title (overture-fantasy) is a form in which the passionate pictorial and vividly dramatic gifts of the great Russian find ample scope. Charged with pain and passion, this significant fantasy gives the lie to the apostles of "no emotion in music." Indefinite as music ever must be, but subtly suggestive, nevertheless, there are pages in this work which rank the composer with the immortals. It is not all sound and fury, like some of his music, wherein the Cossack blood overbears the poet's judgment. It has proportion, symmetry, a wealth of color and the composer has well sensed the dramatic situations. What lovely episodes, and how keen the despair and anguish of wrecked lives! It is a great work, and candor compels one to say it was greatly played.

Nikisch last night glowed with a fine fire that he communicated to his forces. The homogeneity of tone, the incisive attack, the dynamic contrasts, all were present, and the detail work was most lovingly exploited.

Virtuosity reached white heat in the performance of Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet." The arabesques were given with Meissonier delicacy and clarity.

Of the Schumann D minor symphony there is little to be said. Its performance was a tour de force, for it has always been dear to Mr. Nikisch's heart. Musical, tender and brilliant was the work of the band, and it was directed con amore. Need more be said?

Emma Juch was the singer. Her voice shows wear and tear and Western "one-night stands," but she is an artist, she is musical au bout des ongles, and her articulation miraculous as compared with her contemporaries. She essayed Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and as an essay it merits recognition; as an interpretation it was puny. Far better she succeeded with Liszt's effective but artificial "Loreley." Her phrasing was delightful in this, and her singing so excellent that she was given a triple recall. But the orchestra, after all, was the soloist of the evening.

[35]

THE STANDARD UNION.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 6, 1892.

NIKISCH AT THE ACADEMY.

At the Academy of Music last Saturday evening, was given the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great auditorium, with its new scenery and a bank of waving palms and many colored chrisanthemums between the audience and the stage, to say nothing of a large assemblage of polite and cultivated music-lovers, presented something of a gala appearance. When it is realized that this orchestra plays nothing but the highest order of classical music, and plays it in a way which can be fully appreciated only by the educated taste, the size and enthusiasm of the audience, is a credit to the city in which the concert was given. The appearance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for a hearty outburst of applause, as well it maybe, when it is considered that the magic of this man's leadership, united with the quality of musicians which his fine perception has selected and welded together, has placed before the public the highest orchestral excellence yet known on this side the Atlantic. Eighty-five admirable musicians compose the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it can truly be said that among these eighty-five there is apparently not one discordant element, the whole forming a musical force which, for virility, artistic feeling and magnificent sonority, could hardly be excelled. It was delightful to feel that the audience was in full harmony with the spirit of the occasion; that it gave the music the close attention which marks the genuine music-lover, that its applause was noticeable for the spontaneity and warmth which recognize a splendid achievement, and also for the courtesy which does not insist on encores. If it is one of the highest of pleasures to listen to music of the best class exquisitely rendered, it is hardly a lesser pleasure to listen amidst sympathetic and congenial surroundings. An interesting incident of the evening was the presence, for a time, in Henry E. Sheldon's box, of Dvorak, the maestro and composer, who in February will lead at the Academy the Choral Socioety, in the performance of his "Stabat Mater."

The first number on the programme was Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntola," an elaborate composition, which served to exhibit the resources of the orchestra, but which in itself is not a work of great musical charm. While the theme gives opportunity for some very lovely harp and 'cello accompaniments, and there is at all times a fancifulness of instrumentation which allows a rich and varied coloring, there is little in the piece which appeals to the higher sensibilities. It formed, however, a brave and brilliant opening for the evening, and paved the way for the aria from "Oberon," "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," rendered by Miss Emma Juch. English words can never be successful married to German music, even when the union is effected by so good a vocalization as that which marks this sterling soprano. The Weber aria was far less pleasing than the lady's second number, Liszt's "Loveley," one of the most alluring of those love-songs, which speak in their melodies not less than their words. Miss Juch was hardly in perfect voice, though the veil lifted as she progressed, and the tones rang out at last in their full roundness and strength. While recognizing the worth of Miss Juch's achievements, and finding in her that German largeness and dramatic quality which is so sadly lacking in the purer but colder tones of some of our typically American sopranl, it is curious how little she stirs us. Always she impresses us as an exponent of the music pure and simple, not an entity to be worshipped for its own heaven-born gifts and graces. She is in many respects an admirable interpreter, but she interprets as a calm sea decorously carries its precious ships, not as a tumultuous ocean plays with its own storms.

The most beautiful orchestral number of the evening was the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Amidst the magnificent minor harmonies, the wild delirium of the great "Love-Death," the listener completely loses himself, and knows only that he floats upon a wondrous wealth of feverish fancies, and is thrilled to his very soul by the hand of a master. It seemed as if nothing on earth at that moment could be more thrillingly sweet and poignant than this creation of Wagner, as interpreted by an orchestra under the control of Mr. Nikisch. The seventy instruments seemed fairly to be alive, as they bent and vibrated to the influence of one of the masterpieces of the world—a composition which, when played as that was played last Saturday night, seems for the moment to be the love-song of the race. It was interesting to pass from the pain and passion of this great moment with the demi-gods to the work of one who was once greatly influenced by the genius of Wagner. Tschaikowsky is a name more or less unfamiliar to many of us, except as we have heard the disastrous results of the attempts to place the opera of "Mazeppa" in London; the more remarkable because the composer's vogue is so great in his native Russia. The Symphony No. 5, in E minor, gave us an opportunity to understand his powers, and also to acquire a relish for further things of the kind to come. In the hands of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, such a composition is known to be safe, and it was with the most careful attention that the symphony was followed, through the quiet opening theme, the troubled excitement of the two succeeding movements, to the superb "andante maestoso" at the end.

It was the strangest music many of us had ever heard—delicate, seductive, fierce, furious, barbaric by turns; now lulling us into a sweet, holy calm; now tearing our very hearts out. With our eyes shut we could have told that this was the music of a nation the very children of which have fierce passions and sensitive nerves. The theme, the phrasing, was Slavic to the last degree; and tame, indeed, must be he whom such inspiriting instrumentation woul not excite. As in the Wagner number, the orchestra worked with a will; but with this difference—that as then they were on fire, now they seemed possessed. Still, every storm must have its subsidence, and at last there came that magnificent finale which, with truly royal pomp and splendor, carried the much-tortured theme to rest. The last strain died, the audience thundered, the concert was over. Mr. Nikisch's second rehearsal of the Brooklyn season is on Friday afternoon, Dec. 9, followed as usual by the concert the next evening.

Adv. [illegible] York, N. Y.

Date 11-4

[illegible]

Cockertown—Clinton L. Lloyd and Josep[illegible] Coult.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The First Concert of the Series, and an Overflowing House.

The first of the five concerts announced here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening to a packed house, even to the available standing room.

The programme, made up with characteristic taste and discretion, presented but three orchestral numbers, the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy of Tschaikowsky, the Queen Mab schirzo from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony of Berlioz, and Schumann's unique symphony in D minor.

Miss Emma Juch assisted singing the "Oberon" aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," and Leigh's "Lorelei," both with the orchestra, the former with much dramatic fervor and effect, marred by a lately developed tendency to vibrato, and the latter rather tamely. She was, however, several times recalled after each. The Tschaikowsky fantasy was played with wonderfully lucid expression. The spirit of the composition was preserved perfectly, while the characteristic tendency to barbaric rhythm—less pronounced in this than in most of his works—was refined, without losing its native color.

The Berlioz number is a work of great difficulty, a very trifle of over zeal or carelessness destroying its beauty entirely. All its airy and fantastic delicacy and imaginative caprices were brought out with perfect precision and unity, while in the daintily and dreamily poetic spirit of its interpretation there was, as nearly as in any purely material thing could be, the shadowy suggestion of "the horns of elf-land faintly blowing."

The Schumann symphony showed the firm intellectual quality of the orchestra's training in another way entirely. Once or twice one could have asked for a little more breadth and virality of expression, but the lack was slight. The flowing and graceful romanza of the second movement was given with great feeling and effect, the transitions accomplished with perfect grace, the work of the strings was superb, and the shading—barring the slight want noted—and the phrasing scarcely less admirable.

There is no orchestra in the country in which more complete and charming homogeneity of interpretation has been attained. None in which the conductor has more profoundly impressed his own interpretative ideas on the players, or achieved more refinement and delicacy of phrasing and shading.

The poetic beauty and warmth and the superb unity of feeling and expression in nearly all its work quite atone for the occasional lack of breadth before remarked.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date [illegible]

WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Concert This Season—An Admirable Performance.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's course last evening was in every respect a successful and satisfactory one. Chickering Hall was crowded with an appreciative and sympathetic audience, and the performance not only elicited hearty and long-continued applause at its different stages, but it was accompanied throughout by that well-pleased attention which is an equally significant indication of favor.

Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," which was the opening number, made an extremely agreeable impression on those who listened to its first production by the Boston orchestra three seasons ago. It shows many of the characteristics of the composer in a striking manner, and the admirable performance of it by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra last evening illustrated them to good advantage.

Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo from the composer's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony was played with a delicacy that well suited the dainty texture of the composition and the subtle charm that pervades it. Its technical difficulties were easily mastered by these admirable performers. An excellent [illegible] formance of Schumann's D minor symphony brought the concert to a close, and in this, as in the other orchestral numbers, the precision and delicacy of the strings and the beauty of tone evoked from them were especially noticeable.

Miss Emma Juch was the singer of the evening, her selections being the scene and air "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and Liszt's elaborate and beautiful setting of Heine's "Die Loreley." Miss Juch is in many ways an accomplished and admirable vocalist, and her vocal skill and intelligence as a singer have made steady progress while she has been before the public. She sang the Liszt selection with charming beauty of enunciation and grace of delivery. In the great scene from "Oberon" she labored somewhat and was not so satisfactory, but she was thrice recalled and her singing was evidently very acceptable to the audience.

Clipping from Telegram, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, will give its first concert to-morrow evening at a quarter past eight o'clock. The programme includes the overture to "Sakuntala," the aria from "Oberon," "Ocean! thou mighty monster," with Miss Juch as soloist; the Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" song with orchestra, "Loreley," Miss Juch, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor.

EVENING POST, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-4

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The best evidence of the popularity in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the sign of "Standing Room Only" displayed in front of Chickering Hall at 7:30 last evening, and the presence of men who wanted to buy tickets of those who were so fortunate as to have them. The principal number on the programme was Schumann's fourth symphony, with which Mr. Nikisch some years ago first introduced himself; and again he interpreted it with that free and poetic modification of tempo which is the life of emotional music; the rush and excitement of the finale was sufficient to have awakened the most apathetic audience, and last evening's audience was not at all apathetic.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasy was another number in which the Boston orchestra was delightful to hear. In listening to Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo one could not suppress the thought how much more interestingly Weber and Mendelssohn have musically mirrored the fairy world than Berlioz, because their melodic ideas are interesting, whereas Berlioz gives us little but dainty orchestral tricks which, as some one has said, make the orchestra "sound through the wrong end of an opera-glass," but which leave the feelings cold.

Miss Emma Juch sang with much dramatic effect, for which she was recalled four or five times, Liszt's superb setting of the Loreley legend. If she was less successful in Weber's great "Oberon" aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," this was partly the fault of Weber, who, after approaching, in "Euryanthe," the true vocal style, had a partial relapse in "Oberon" (written for London) into the older and more instrumental style of vocalism, in which agility is a prime consideration. Liszt avoided that error as carefully as the late Robert Franz.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date [illegible]

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Brooklyn musical season opened yesterday afternoon with the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, in the Academy of Music. In spite of the discouraging conduct of the weather, the house was full, and the audience, which sat till the end of the concert, displayed the keenest interest in the performance. Last season when Mr. Nikisch made his first appearance on the Brooklyn Academy stage, two persons in the audience welcomed him. Yesterday afternoon general applause greeted his appearance. It begins to look as if the good people of Brooklyn had discovered that there were other conductors than Theodore Thomas.

The programme performed yesterday afternoon was a most attractive one. The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. The solo artist was Miss Emma Juch, who sang the same two numbers that she had sung on the previous evening in New-York. It is pleasant to add that she sang them better.

It is not necessary at this time to make any extended comment on the instrumental numbers of yesterday's rehearsal. In all justice to a great composer, however, it should be said that Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony makes a deeper impression with every repetition. It is a master work, and it stands to-day as one of the finest symphonic productions of the modern romantic school. It was magnificently played yesterday afternoon, and it held the audience spellbound.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-3

[illegible] there, the full measure of appreciation due her, she must, being, as is generally understood, interested in the management of the company, know where to place the blame.

The first rehearsal and concert for this season of the Symphony Society are to be given in Music Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The orchestral numbers are Beethoven's third symphony, Grieg's suite for strings, "Aus Holbergs Zeit," and the Parisian version of the bacchanals from "Tannhaeuser." The soloist is to be Miss Belle Cole, who will sing Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn" and Handel's "Empio diro dui Sei."

Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra are to give a concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music this evening for which the public rehearsal was held yesterday afternoon. These entertainments are given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, an organization which has been more steady in its loyalty to Theodore Thomas than any similar body in the neighborhood.

The important event of the week in music was the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, a review of which I gave yesterday. It is gratifying to be able to record the most successful inauguration of this series of concerts. * * * Next week the Bostonians return, and we will again listen to the pretty strains of "Robin Hood."

RECORDER, New York, N. Y.

Date 11-5

The Brooklyn Philharmonic.

The first public rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music in that city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, played. The programme consisted of Goldmark's gorgeously colored "Sakuntala" overture, the introduction and finale to "Tristan and Isolde," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor. Miss Emma Juch was the singer, and repeated the Weber aria and Liszt's "Loreley," which she gave in this city Thursday evening. She sang much better on this occasion.

The audience was large and the orchestra played with its usual elastic swing and rhythmic freedom. Most noteworthy was the Goldmark overture, while the symphony was given in unimpeachable fashion. The regular concert occurs this evening.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 11-4

[illegible]

TWO LITTLE MUSICAL NOTES.

The Adamowski Quartet Club, consisting of T. Adamowski, A. Moldauer, Max Zach and J. Adamowski, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its first concert for the season at the New Century Drawing Room yesterday afternoon before a good-sized and very "select" audience, composed almost exclusively of ladies. The programme, comprising Mozart's quartet in G major, No. 12, Gade's quartet in D major, op. 63, and a duet for violin and piano, by T. Adamowski, was faultlessly rendered.

Mr. and Mrs. Max Heinrichs will give two song recitals to-day at the New Century Drawing room, one in the afternoon at three, and one in the evening at eight. Each programme will be different.

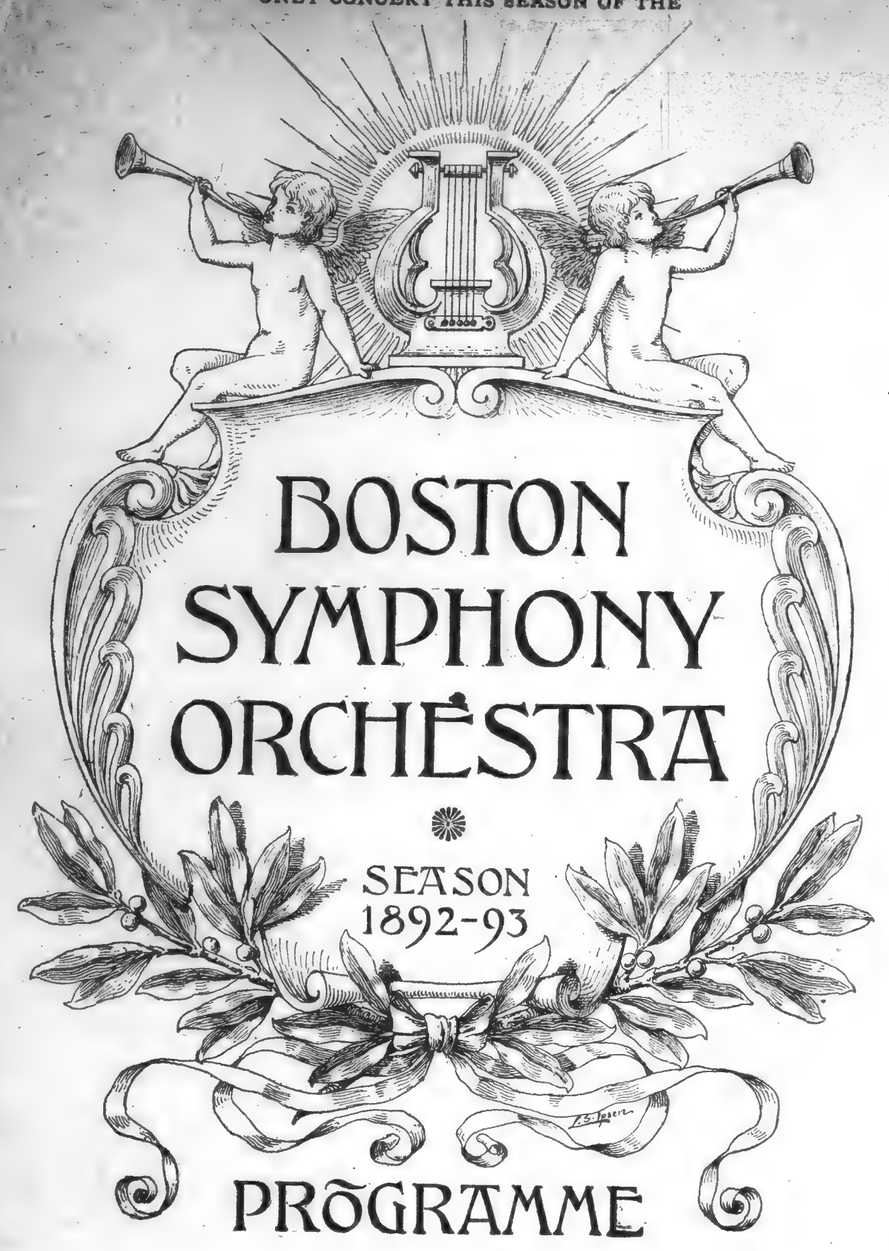
[36]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, - BALTIMORE.

Monday Evening, October 31, at 8 o'clock.

ONLY CONCERT THIS SEASON OF THE



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Tuesday Evening, November 1, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

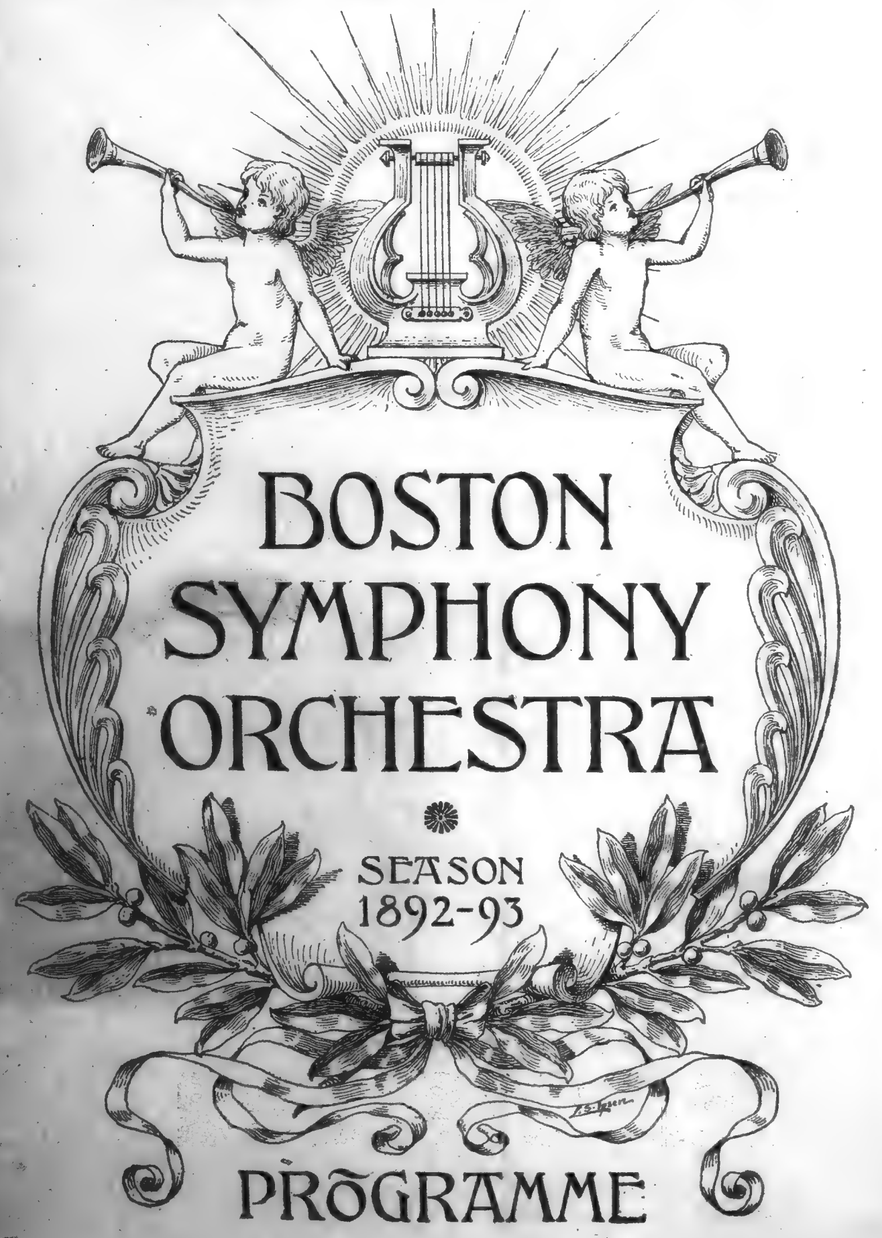
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, November 2, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

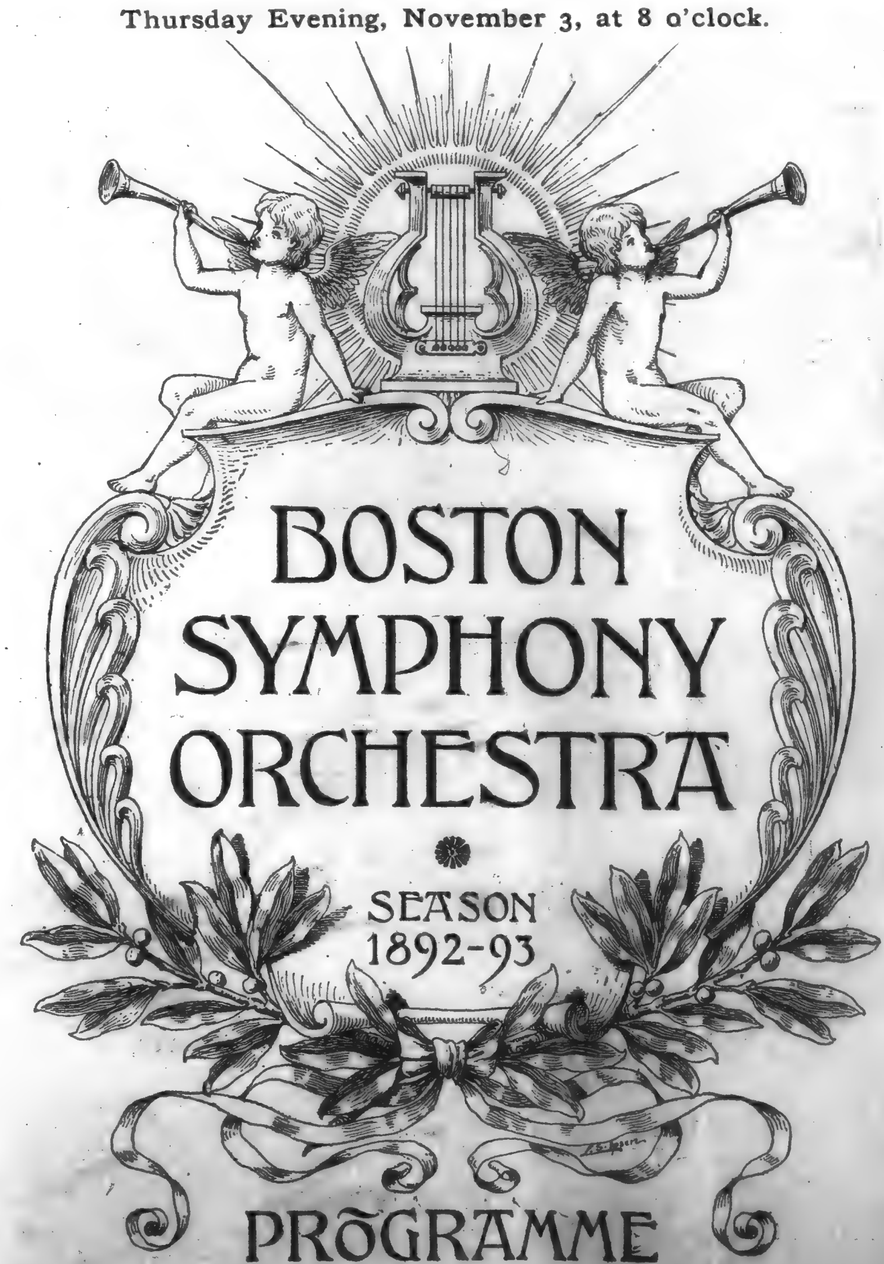
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, November 3, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

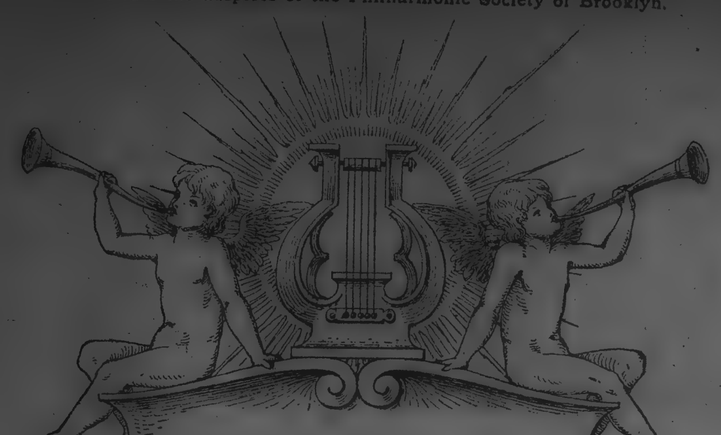
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Nov. 4, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 5, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Tuesday Evening, Nov. 22
Thursday Evening, Dec. 29
1892

TWELFTH SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Four Grand Concerts
Mechanics' Hall, Worcester

Thursday Evening, Feb. 16
Tuesday Evening, March 28
1893

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, gave the second concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Lalo: Quartet for Strings, in E-flat major, opus 19. (First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin No. 1, in A minor, opus 105.
Schubert: Quartet for Strings, in D minor.

The Lalo quartet was a surprise indeed! One is not prepared nowadays to find a Frenchman writing anything so unforced, sunny, well-wrought, one might even say, so classic in spirit as the first Allegro of this quartet. Throughout the movement one finds the composer really possessed with a musical idea; he has something to say and says it naturally and musically. Even his bits of imitative writing add not only to the scholastic, but to the intrinsically musical value and beauty of his work; the imitation comes in so plainly of its own accord, with so much grace and geniality, that one feels it to be an inspiration, not merely a piece of good workmanship. Of the Adagio non troppo one almost hesitates to say all that this first hearing suggests; the first impression was (or seemed) almost too good to be trustworthy. No doubt there is in this movement a good deal of very harsh harmony, produced by free dissonances of an exceedingly daring and irregular sort; the leading of the voices is by no means invariably according to Hoyle. But this harshness never seems involuntary or meaningless; the composer walks his rough path with a very sure step, and shows that he knows perfectly well whither he is going. Moreover, this movement gives the impression of genuine depth of thought and feeling; instead of the too common French "sublimity," which is often sheer tall-talking, one finds in it real Gemüth and tragic power. If this Adagio turns out to wear well, we shall be tempted to place it at the head of all we know of contemporary French musical production. The ensuing Allegro con fuoco (Scherzo) seemed a little vague and groping at first, but was found to get itself happily out of the wood at last. The finale left no particularly distinct impression upon us—perhaps because the intent listening to which the first two movements invited had rather worn out our receptive power.

Schumann's beautiful A-minor sonata was played with admirable fire and mastery by Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Johns holding his own creditably in the pianoforte part. When an artist goes sincerely and earnestly to work to play a piece of great music as well as lies in him, without trickery or any false glitter, he cannot but command respect; still in this case, looking at [illegible] performance from the point of view of the [illegible] that comes to enjoy music and be edified, one must say that something more [illegible] to be expected than a pianist's [illegible] on his own

The great (and long) Schubert quartet is one of those things of undeniable beauty which pall upon one a little after many hearings. Schubert spoke words of gold, if you will, but he often took a terrible time about it. One trembles to think of what this D minor quartet of his would be with all the repeats made! As it is, we are free to own that it tired us: the scale on which the work is laid out is out of all proportion to the amount and character of the matter it contains. It is great, it is beautiful, it is full of genius: but to us, in this year of grace 1892, its room is more welcome than its company—especially with the thermometer way up in the seventh position.

Of the style in which both quartets were played nothing but the warmest admiration is to be expressed. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schröder once more covered themselves with glory. The third concert will be given on Monday evening, Nov. 21.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

ate..... 11-8

...MPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE.

The sale for the subscribes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra course opens at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s, Thursday, at 9 A. M. Checks for position will be given out at 7 o'clock and six seats only allowed on one choice. The sale opens to the public Saturday morning. The success of this orchestra, which has just completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Philadelphia has been phenomenal. In New York every seat for the course was sold and in the other cities enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch. The management had expected that Mme. Nordica would open the course on Nov. 22, but unfortunately she will not reach this country until three days later. At present writing it is undecided just which soloists will appear on this date, but it will be announced as soon as it is known.

fine vocal in[illegible] the man who can sing [illegible] as [illegible]

Inter Ocean Chicago Ill

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

APOLLO MUSICAL CLUB.

In forming an estimate of the progress of musical matters in Chicago, a city which has

Mme. Lillian Nordica is to return to America Nov. 20 to fill concert and oratorio engagements already made for her by Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. FIGARO

Publishers:

Sonnabend, den 5. Nov. 1892.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Aus Providence, R. I.

Providence, 3. Nov. '92.

Daß das erste Konzert des „Boston Symphonie Orchester" auch in dieser Saison von einem außergewöhnlichen künstlerischen Erfolge begleitet war, brauchen wir wohl kaum zu bemerken. Diese Konzerte haben jetzt endlich unter dem musikalisch gebildeten Publikum festen Fuß gefaßt und versprechen, jetzt reiche pekuniäre Früchte zu tragen. Wo Alles so vortrefflich gespielt wurde, halten wir es nicht für nöthig, die Einzelleistungen zu besprechen. Frl. Emma Juch, welche uns ja als tüchtig geschulte Sängerin bekannt ist, war die Solistin des Abends. Die Künstlerin sang, das Publikum sah und hörte, und Emma Juch siegte. Auf stürmisches Verlangen mußte sie sich zu einem Dacapo verstehen, was in den aristokratischen Symphonie-Konzerten eine große Seltenheit ist, da Herr Nikisch nicht dieser Unsitte, welche besonders in unseren Konzerten sehr eingerissen ist, huldigt, und Herr Nickisch hat dafür den besonderen Dank der Recensenten. Wir bemerkten, daß Herr Konzertmeister Kneisel fehlte, dafür saß Herr Löffler, welcher auch schon jetzt über zehn Jahre Mitglied dieses Orchesters ist, an dessen Stelle. Das Programm stellte sich, wie folgt, zusammen: Ouverture-Fantasie von Tschaikowsky; Arie „Ocean Du Ungeheuer" von Weber; Scherzo "Queen Male" von Berlioz; Lorelei von Liszt für Sopran mit Orchester (hier hatte man leider die Orchesterstimmen vergessen und mußte Herr Nickisch die Begleitung auf dem Klavier spielen, das er mit bekannter Tüchtigkeit that.) Zuletzt Schumann's Symphonie in D moll.

In dem ersten „Star Course Concert", welches vorige Woche stattfand, war auch Frl. Emma Juch die Hauptsolistin. Das Konzert war sehr gut besucht und Frl. Juch erntete wohlverdienten Beifall.

„Unser" Reeves ist jetzt wohlbestallter Dirigent der Gilmore'schen Kapelle geworden, doch ehe er sich hier ganz verabschiedet, finden noch die üblichen Abschieds-Konzerte statt. Auch ein anderer Bläser hat in der letzten Zeit viel Furore gemacht, es ist dies der wohlbekannte Baß-Clarinettist Herr Edwin A. Skott. So haben es sich verschiedene Preß-Clubs zur Ehre angerechnet, Herrn Scott als Gast und Solist zu bewirthen. Denselben hat er auch schon viele Genüsse bereitet, und er erweist sich als Zierde und Stütze eines jeden größeren Orchesters. Wie uns Herr Reeves mit einer gewissen Genugthuung mittheilt, hat der Vorstand der „Industrial Exhibition" in Portland, Ore., ihn mit einer goldenen diamantenbesetzten Uhr bedacht. Hier kann man wirklich sagen: „Glück kommt nie allein."

Der Knaben-Sopranist Cyril Tyler gab hier zwei Konzerte, welche aber nicht gut besucht waren. Es war dies wieder einmal ein Beweis, daß das hiesige Publikum sehr schwer zum Besuch von Konzerten zu bringen ist, welche nicht von vornherein eine gewisse Garantie in musikalischer Hinsicht bieten. Die Leistungen des Knaben waren wohl in ihrer Art mustergültig, doch standen die Leistungen der anderen Mitwirkenden unter dem künstlerischen Niveau, welches wir als Maßstab für eine Kunstleistung anlegen.

Im „Opera House" hatten wir diese Woche ein anziehendes Repertoir. Die bekannte Annie Pixlie trat in drei verschiedenen Stücken auf: "Miss Blythe of Duluth", "The Deacon's Daughter" und "The Stormy Petral."

Nächste Woche also etwas hoch musikalisches. Die „Mapleson Opera Co." wird in der nächsten Woche „Fadette", mit Laura Schirmer-Mapleson in der Hauptrolle, zur Aufführung bringen.

Herm. Mueller.

Clipping from Telegram Worcester Mass

Date.....

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Sale of Seats Opens for the Series on Thursday.

The subscribers to the Boston symphony orchestra course will remember that the sale opens at 9 o'clock at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s on Thursday morning. Checks will be given out for position at 7 a. m. and no more than six tickets can be purchased at a time. The sale will be open to the public on Saturday at 9 a. m. The success of this orchestra, which Saturday completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, has been phenomenal. In New York, the home of the Damrosch orchestra, every seat was sold for the course and the enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch in the other cities visited. Worcester is fortunate in having this course.

[38]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Nov. 4, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 5, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. . .

Tuesday Evening, Nov. 22
Thursday Evening, Dec. 29
1892

TWELFTH SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

Four Grand Concerts

Mechanics' Hall, Worcester

Thursday Evening, Feb. 16
Tuesday Evening, March 28
1893

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, gave the second concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Lalo: Quartet for Strings, in E-flat major, opus 19. (First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin No. 1, in A minor, opus 105.
Schubert: Quartet for Strings, in D minor.

The Lalo quartet was a surprise indeed! One is not prepared nowadays to find a Frenchman writing anything so unforced, sunny, well-wrought, one might even say, so classic in spirit as the first Allegro of this quartet. Throughout the movement one finds the composer really possessed with a musical idea; he has something to say and says it naturally and musically. Even his bits of imitative writing add not only to the scholastic, but to the intrinsically musical value and beauty of his work; the imitation comes in so plainly of its own accord, with so much grace and genuality, that one feels it to be an inspiration, not merely a piece of good workmanship. Of the Adagio non troppo one almost hesitates to say all that this first hearing suggests; the first impression was (or seemed) almost too good to be trustworthy. No doubt there is in this movement a good deal of very harsh harmony, produced by free dissonances of an exceedingly daring and irregular sort; the leading of the voices is by no means invariably according to Hoyle. But this harshness never seems involuntary or meaningless; the composer walks his rough path with a very sure step, and shows that he knows perfectly well whither he is going. Moreover, this movement gives the impression of genuine depth of thought and feeling; instead of the too common French "sublimity," which is often sheer tail-lashing, one finds in it real Gemüth and tragic power. If this Adagio turns out to wear well, we shall be tempted to place it at the head of all we know of contemporary French musical production. The ensuing Allegro con fuoco (Scherzo) seemed a little vague and groping at first, but was found to get itself happily out of the wood at last. The finale left no particularly distinct impression upon us—perhaps because the intent listening to which the first two movements invited had rather worn out our receptive power.

Schumann's beautiful A-minor sonata was played with admirable fire and mastery by Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Johns holding his own creditably in the pianoforte part. When an artist goes sincerely and earnestly to work to play a piece of great music as well as lies in him, without trickery or any false glitter, he cannot but command respect; still in this case, looking at the performance from the point of view of the audience that comes to enjoy music and be edified thereby, one must say that something more is legitimately to be expected than a pianist's creditably holding his own.

The great (and long) Schubert quartet is one of those things of undeniable beauty which pall upon one a little after many hearings. Schubert spoke words of gold, if you will, but he often took a terrible time about it. One trembles to think of what this D minor quartet of his would be with all the repeats made! As it is, we are free to own that it tired us: the scale on which the work is laid out is out of all proportion to the amount and character of the matter it contains. It is great, it is beautiful, it is full of genius: but to us, in this year of grace 1892, its room is more welcome than its company—especially with the thermometer way up in the seventh position.

Of the style in which both quartets were played nothing but the warmest admiration is to be expressed. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schröder once more covered themselves with glory. The third concert will be given on Monday evening, Nov. 21.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

ute.....

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE.

The sale for the subscribes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra course opens at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s, Thursday, at 9 A. M. Checks for position will be given out at 7 o'clock and six seats only allowed on one choice. The sale opens to the public Saturday morning. The success of this orchestra, which has just completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Philadelphia has been phenomenal. In New York every seat for the course was sold and in the other cities enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch. The management had expected that Mme. Nordica would open the course on Nov. 22, but unfortunately she will not reach this country until three days later. At present writing it is undecided just which soloists will appear on this date, but it will be announced as soon as it is known.

financial ... the man who can sing ... as act.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

APOLLO MUSICAL CLUB.

In forming an estimate of the progress of musical matters in Chicago, a city which has ...

Mme. Lillian Nordica is to return to America Nov. 20 to fill concert and oratorio engagements already made for her by Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. FIGARO

Publishers:

Sonnabend, den 5. Nov. 1892.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Aus Providence, R. I.

Providence, 3. Nov. '92.

Daß das erste Konzert des „Boston Symphonie Orchester" auch in dieser Saison von einem außergewöhnlichen künstlerischen Erfolge begleitet war, brauchen wir wohl kaum zu bemerken. Diese Konzerte haben jetzt endlich unter dem musikalisch gebildeten Publikum festen Fuß gefaßt und versprechen, jetzt reiche pekuniäre Früchte zu tragen. Wo Alles so vortrefflich gespielt wurde, halten wir es nicht für nöthig, die Einzelleistungen zu besprechen. Frl. Emma Juch, welche uns ja als tüchtig geschulte Sängerin bekannt ist, war die Solistin des Abends. Die Künstlerin sang, das Publikum sah und hörte, und Emma Juch siegte. Auf stürmisches Verlangen mußte sie sich zu einem Dacapo verstehen, was in den aristokratischen Symphonie-Konzerten eine große Seltenheit ist, da Herr Nikisch nicht dieser Unsitte, welche besonders in unseren Konzerten sehr eingerissen ist, huldigt, und Herr Nickisch hat dafür den besonderen Dank der Recensenten. Wir bemerkten, daß Herr Konzertmeister Kneisel fehlte, dafür saß Herr Löffler, welcher auch schon jetzt über zehn Jahre Mitglied dieses Orchesters ist, an dessen Stelle. Das Programm stellte sich, wie folgt, zusammen: Ouvertüre-Fantasie von Tschaikowsky; Arie „Ocean Du Ungeheuer" von Weber; Scherzo "Queen Male" von Berlioz; Lorelei von Liszt für Sopran mit Orchester (hier hatte man leider die Orchesterstimmen vergessen und mußte Herr Nickisch die Begleitung auf dem Klavier spielen, das er mit bekannter Tüchtigkeit that.) Zuletzt Schumann's Symphonie in D moll.

In dem ersten „Star Course Concert", welches vorige Woche stattfand, war auch Frl. Emma Juch die Hauptsolistin. Das Konzert war sehr gut besucht und Frl. Juch erntete wohlverdienten Beifall.

„Unser" Reeves ist jetzt wohlbestallter Dirigent der Gilmore'schen Kapelle geworden, doch ehe er sich hier ganz verabschiedet, finden noch die üblichen Abschieds-Konzerte statt. Auch ein anderer Bläser hat in der letzten Zeit viel Furore gemacht, es ist dies der wohlbekannte Baß-Clarinettist Herr Edwin A. Skott. So haben es sich verschiedene Preß-Clubs zur Ehre angerechnet, Herrn Scott als Gast und Solist zu bewirthen. Denselben hat er auch schon viele Genüsse bereitet, und er erweist sich als Zierde und Stütze eines jeden größeren Orchesters. Wie uns Herr Reeves mit einer gewissen Genugthuung mittheilt, hat der Vorstand der „Industrial Exhibition" in Portland, Ore., ihn mit einer goldenen diamantenbesetzten Uhr bedacht. Hier kann man wirklich sagen: „Glück kommt nie allein."

Der Knaben-Sopranist Cyril Tyler gab hier zwei Konzerte, welche aber nicht gut besucht waren. Es war dies wieder einmal ein Beweis, daß das hiesige Publikum sehr schwer zum Besuch von Konzerten zu bringen ist, welche nicht von vornherein eine gewisse Garantie in musikalischer Hinsicht bieten. Die Leistungen des Knaben waren wohl in ihrer Art mustergültig, doch standen die Leistungen der anderen Mitwirkenden unter dem künstlerischen Niveau, welches wir als Maßstab für eine Kunstleistung anlegen.

Im „Opera House" hatten wir diese Woche ein anziehendes Repertoir. Die bekannte Annie Pixlie trat in drei verschiedenen Stücken auf: "Miss Blythe of Duluth", "The Deacon's Daughter" und "The Stormy Petral."

Nächste Woche also etwas hoch musikalisches. Die „Mapleson Opera Co." wird in der nächsten Woche „Fadette", mit Laura Schirmer-Mapleson in der Hauptrolle, zur Aufführung bringen.

Herm. Mueller.

Clipping from Telegraph
.....
Date.....

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Sale of Seats Opens for the Series on Thursday.

The subscribers to the Boston symphony orchestra course will remember that the sale opens at 9 o'clock at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s on Thursday morning. Checks will be given out for position at 7 a. m. and no more than six tickets can be purchased at a time. The sale will be open to the public on Saturday at 9 a. m. The success of this orchestra, which Saturday completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, has been phenomenal. In New York, the home of the Damrosch orchestra, every seat was sold for the course and the enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch in the other cities visited. Worcester is fortunate in having this course.

[38]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

FOUR GRAND CONCERTS

In Mechanics' Hall, Worcester

TUESDAY, November 22.
THURSDAY, December 29.
THURSDAY, February 16.
TUESDAY, March 28.

Evenings at 7.45.

- ASSISTING ARTISTS -

Madame Nordica,
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch,
Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler,
Mr. Alwin Schroeder,
And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, Five Dollars.

The sale of season tickets to Subscribers only opens at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, Thursday, November 10, at 9 A.M.

The public sale of season tickets opens at the same place, Saturday, November 12.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well and favorably known in Worcester that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement. Assurance is given that no efforts will be spared to make these concerts brilliant events of the season, and worthy the attention of every lover of music.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Worcester programmes such of these as prove most attractive and worthy. The programmes will also contain the usual number of sterling works, both of the old and of the modern school.

To add to the enjoyment of patrons, programme books will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by Mr. Wm. F. Apthorp, of the Boston "Evening Transcript."

The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of forty-eight performances in that city and the unprecedented sale for the New York series indicate an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the Orchestra.

There is every reason to expect a large demand for tickets for the Worcester concerts, and intending patrons are advised to make early applications for seats.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, gave the second concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Lalo: Quartet for Strings, in E-flat major, opus 19. (First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin No. 1, in A minor, opus 105.
Schubert: Quartet for Strings, in D minor.

The Lalo quartet was a surprise indeed! One is not prepared nowadays to find a Frenchman writing anything so unforced, sunny, well-wrought, one might even say, so classic in spirit as the first Allegro of this quartet. Throughout the movement one finds the composer really possessed with a musical idea: he has something to say and says it naturally and musically. Even his bits of imitative writing add not only to the scholastic, but to the intrinsically musical value and beauty of his work; the imitation comes in so plainly of its own accord, with so much grace and geniality, that one feels it to be an inspiration, not merely a piece of good workmanship. Of the Adagio non troppo one almost hesitates to say all that this first hearing suggests; the first impression was (or seemed) almost too good to be trustworthy. No doubt there is in this movement a good deal of very harsh harmony, produced by free dissonances of an exceedingly daring and irregular sort; the leading of the voices is by no means invariably according to Hoyle. But this harshness never seems involuntary or meaningless; the composer walks his rough path with a very sure step, and shows that he knows perfectly well whither he is going. Moreover, this movement gives the impression of genuine depth of thought and feeling; instead of the too common French "sublimity," which is often sheer tail-lashing, one finds in it real Gemüth and tragic power. If this Adagio turns out to wear well, we shall be tempted to place it at the head of all we know of contemporary French musical production. The ensuing Allegro con fuoco (Scherzo) seemed a little vague and groping at first, but was found to get itself happily out of the wood at last. The finale left no particularly distinct impression upon us—perhaps because the intent listening to which the first two movements invited had rather worn out our receptive power.

Schumann's beautiful A-minor sonata was played with admirable fire and mastery by Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Johns holding his own creditably in the pianoforte part. When an artist goes sincerely and earnestly to work to play a piece of great music as well as lies in him, without trickery or any false glitter, he cannot but command respect; still in this case, looking at the performance from the point of view of the audience that comes to enjoy music and be edified thereby, one must say that something more interesting is to be expected than a pianist's

The great (and long) Schubert quartet is one of those things of undeniable beauty which pall upon one a little after many hearings. Schubert spoke words of gold, if you will, but he often took a terrible time about it. One trembles to think of what this D minor quartet of his would be with all the repeats made! As it is, we are free to own that it tired us: the scale on which the work is laid out is out of all proportion to the amount and character of the matter it contains. It is great, it is beautiful, it is full of genius: but to us, in this year of grace 1892, its room is more welcome than its company—especially with the thermometer way up in the seventh position.

Of the style in which both quartets were played nothing but the warmest admiration is to be expressed. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schröder once more covered themselves with glory. The third concert will be given on Monday evening, Nov. 21.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date 11-8

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE.

The sale for the subscribes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra course opens at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s, Thursday, at 9 A. M. Checks for position will be given out at 7 o'clock and six seats only allowed on one choice. The sale opens to the public Saturday morning. The success of this orchestra, which has just completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Philadelphia has been phenomenal. In New York every seat for the course was sold and in the other cities enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch. The management had expected that Mme. Nordica would open the course on Nov. 22, but unfortunately she will not reach this country until three days later. At present writing it is undecided just which soloists will appear on this date, but it will be announced as soon as it is known.

...financial ... man who can sing ... as act.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

APOLLO MUSICAL CLUB.

In forming an estimate of the progress of musical matters in Chicago, a city which has

Mme. Lillian Nordica is to return to America Nov. 20 to fill concert and oratoric engagements already made for her by Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. FIGARO

Publishers:

Sonnabend, den 5. Nov. 1892.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Aus Providence, R. I.

Providence, 3. Nov. '92.

Daß das erste Konzert des „Boston Symphonie Orchester" auch in dieser Saison von einem außergewöhnlichen künstlerischen Erfolge begleitet war, brauchen wir wohl kaum zu bemerken. Diese Konzerte haben jetzt endlich unter dem musikalisch gebildeten Publikum festen Fuß gefaßt und versprechen, jetzt reiche pekuniäre Früchte zu tragen. Wo Alles so vortrefflich gespielt wurde, halten wir es nicht für nöthig, die Einzelleistungen zu besprechen. Frl. Emma Juch, welche uns ja als tüchtig geschulte Sängerin bekannt ist, war die Solistin des Abends. Die Künstlerin sang, das Publikum sah und hörte, und Emma Juch siegte. Auf stürmisches Verlangen mußte sie sich zu einem Dacapo verstehen, was in den aristokratischen Symphonie-Konzerten eine große Seltenheit ist, da Herr Nikisch nicht dieser Unsitte, welche besonders in unseren Konzerten sehr eingerissen ist, huldigt, und Herr Nickisch hat dafür den besonderen Dank der Recensenten. Wir bemerkten, daß Herr Konzertmeister Kneisel fehlte, dafür saß Herr Löffler, welcher auch schon jetzt über zehn Jahre Mitglied dieses Orchesters ist, an dessen Stelle. Das Programm stellte sich, wie folgt, zusammen: Ouverture-Fantasie von Tschaikowsky; Arie „Ocean Du Ungeheuer" von Weber; Scherzo "Queen Male" von Berlioz; Lorelei von Liszt für Sopran mit Orchester (hier hatte man leider die Orchesterstimmen vergessen und mußte Herr Nickisch die Begleitung auf dem Klavier spielen, das er mit bekannter Tüchtigkeit that.) Zuletzt Schumann's Symphonie in D moll.

In dem ersten „Star Course Concert", welches vorige Woche stattfand, war auch Frl. Emma Juch die Hauptsolistin. Das Konzert war sehr gut besucht und Frl. Juch erntete wohlverdienten Beifall.

„Unser" Reeves ist jetzt wohlbestallter Dirigent der Gilmore'schen Kapelle geworden, doch ehe er sich hier ganz verabschiedet, finden noch die üblichen Abschieds-Konzerte statt. Auch ein anderer Bläser hat in der letzten Zeit viel Furore gemacht, es ist dies der wohlbekannte Baß-Clarinettist Herr Edwin A. Skott. So haben es sich verschiedene Preß-Clubs zur Ehre angerechnet, Herrn Scott als Gast und Solist zu bewirthen. Denselben hat er auch schon viele Genüsse bereitet, und er erweist sich als Zierde und Stütze eines jeden größeren Orchesters. Wie uns Herr Reeves mit einer gewissen Genugthuung mittheilt, hat der Vorstand der „Industrial Exhibition" in Portland, Ore., ihn mit einer goldenen diamantenbesetzten Uhr bedacht. Hier kann man wirklich sagen: „Glück kommt nie allein."

Der Knaben-Sopranist Cyril Tyler gab hier zwei Konzerte, welche aber nicht gut besucht waren. Es war dies wieder einmal ein Beweis, daß das hiesige Publikum sehr schwer zum Besuch von Konzerten zu bringen ist, welche nicht von vornherein eine gewisse Garantie in musikalischer Hinsicht bieten. Die Leistungen des Knaben waren wohl in ihrer Art mustergültig, doch standen die Leistungen der anderen Mitwirkenden unter dem künstlerischen Niveau, welches wir als Maßstab für eine Kunstleistung anlegen.

Im „Opera House" hatten wir diese Woche ein anziehendes Repertoir. Die bekannte Annie Pixlie trat in drei verschiedenen Stücken auf: "Miss Blythe of Duluth", "The Deacon's Daughter" und "The Stormy Petral."

Nächste Woche also etwas hoch musikalisches. Die „Mapleson Opera Co." wird in der nächsten Woche „Fadette", mit Laura Schirmer-Mapleson in der Hauptrolle, zur Aufführung bringen.

Herm. Mueller.

Clipping from Telegram Worcester Mass.

Date

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Sale of Seats Opens for the Series on Thursday.

The subscribers to the Boston symphony orchestra course will remember that the sale opens at 9 o'clock at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s on Thursday morning. Checks will be given out for position at 7 a. m. and no more than six tickets can be purchased at a time. The sale will be open to the public on Saturday at 9 a. m. The success of this orchestra, which Saturday completed its first trip through New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, has been phenomenal. In New York, the home of the Damrosch orchestra, every seat was sold for the course and the enthusiasm was raised to the highest pitch in the other cities visited. Worcester is fortunate in having this course.

[38]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·
Season of 1892-93

Under the management of

C. A. Ellis, Music Hall,

Boston, Mass.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

REINECKE.	OVERTURE. "King Manfred."
MOZART.	ARIA from "The Marriage of Figaro."
VOLKMANN.	SERENADE FOR STRING ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
CHAMINADE.	a) CHANSON SLAVE.
BRAHMS.	b) SONNTAG.
GUIRAUD.	c) BERCEUSE.
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 3 in A minor. "Scotch."	Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.—Vivace non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

SOLOIST:

MISS ALICE WENTWORTH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal at the Academy on Friday was repeated on Saturday night before one of the largest audiences that has yet greeted Mr. Nikisch and his players. The beauty of the orchestral work, of which the TIMES had something to say on Saturday, was sufficient to excite new enthusiasm for this superb organization. Except on the possible side of over refinement there has seldom been an opportunity to criticise adversely the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch's method makes precision a certainty, but it as inevitably imperils the chances of a fresh, spontaneous effect, without which any art is at a serious loss. The players are so certain never to break away from the leader that the hearer learns to wish it were possible that they might. Allowing for the logic of the theory that it is the leader who is the actual performer of an orchestral piece, the men behind the instruments must be felt to be more than a highly evolved machine if the hearer is to be more than superficially moved. The Goldmark overture to "Sukuntala" was masterfully smooth and firm and powerful, but never had the ruggedness of passion. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the vorspiel to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" is at a tempo much slower than either that of Seidl or of Thomas and seems to us to lack in consequence a little of the Wagnerian energy. In the Tschaikowsky symphony (in E minor, op. 64) the orchestra was at the top of its fine powers.

Miss Juch was welcomed with great delight. "The "Oberon" aria is heavier music than Miss Juch manages in her most satisfactory way, but the "Lorely," of Liszt, called out the most winning traits of her always fascinating voice.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1892.

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be welcomed back after its successful tour in other cities. An exceptionally fine programme will be offered, with Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 11/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement that symphony concerts are to actually be given in Worcester has been hailed with joy by all classes, and the orchestra is so well and favorably known here that it seems the audiences should be limited only by the size of the hall.

Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, will play at the first concert. Mme. Nordica will not arrive in time.

Assurance is given that no efforts will be spared to make these concerts brilliant events of the season, and worthy the attention of every lover of music.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Worcester programs such of these as prove most attractive and worthy. The programs will also contain the usual number of sterling works, both of the old and of the modern school.

To add to the enjoyment of patrons, program books will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by William F. Apthorp of the Boston Evening Transcript.

The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of 48 performances in that city and the unprecedented sale for the New York series indicate an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the orchestra.

There is every reason to expect a large demand for tickets for the Worcester concerts, and intending patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. The sale of season tickets to subscribers only opens at Gorham's music store, Thursday, Nov. 10, at 9 A. M. Checks will be given out at 7 A. M. Six tickets on a choice only.

Clipping from Telegram Worcester Mass

Date..... 11/10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sale of Season Tickets Opens at Gorham's This Morning.

This morning at 9 o'clock the sale of season tickets to the Boston symphony orchestra will open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s for the subscribers. Checks for positions in line will be given out at 7 a. m., and only six seats can be bought at one time. The orchestra is so well known in Worcester that little need be said concerning it. While the management consider the orchestra the main feature and chief attraction, yet no efforts will be spared in securing the best of soloists.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for the series of 48 concerts in Boston, and he will bring the most attractive of these to Worcester. Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will open the course on Tuesday, November 22. At the second concert, December 29, Mme. Nordica will sing; on the third date, February 16, Mrs. Nikisch and Herr Alwin Schroder, 'cellist, will appear. The soloists for the final night, March 28, are as yet undecided.

A large audience is assured, for over 700 tickets are engaged by the subscribers, and patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. All purchasers of course tickets will receive by mail an analytical program book previous to each concert.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of

C. A. Ellis, Music Hall,

Boston, Mass.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, AT 7.45. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

REINECKE.	OVERTURE. "King Manfred."
MOZART.	ARIA from "The Marriage of Figaro."
VOLKMANN.	SERENADE FOR STRING ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
CHAMINADE.	a) CHANSON SLAVE.
BRAHMS.	b) SONNTAG.
GUIRAUD.	c) BERCEUSE.
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 3 in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.—Vivace non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

SOLOIST:

MISS ALICE WENTWORTH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 11/7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal at the Academy on Friday was repeated on Saturday night before one of the largest audiences that has yet greeted Mr. Nikisch and his players. The beauty of the orchestral work, of which the TIMES had something to say on Saturday, was sufficient to excite new enthusiasm for this superb organization. Except on the possible side of over refinement there has seldom been an opportunity to criticise adversely the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch's method makes precision a certainty, but it as inevitably imperils the chances of a fresh, spontaneous effect, without which any art is at a serious loss. The players are so certain never to break away from the leader that the hearer learns to wish it were possible that they might. Allowing for the logic of the theory that it is the leader who is the actual performer of an orchestral piece, the men behind the instruments must be felt to be more than a highly evolved machine if the hearer is to be more than superficially moved. The Goldmark overture to "Sukuntala" was masterfully smooth and firm and powerful, but never had the ruggedness of passion. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the vorspiel to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" is at a tempo much slower than either that of Seidl or of Thomas and seems to us to lack in consequence a little of the Wagnerian energy. In the Tschaikowsky symphony (in E minor, op. 64) the orchestra was at the top of its fine powers.

Miss Juch was welcomed with great delight. "The "Oberon" aria is heavier music than Miss Juch manages in her most satisfactory way, but the "Lorely," of Liszt, called out the most winning traits of her always fascinating voice.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1892.

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be welcomed back after its successful tour in other cities. An exceptionally fine programme will be offered, with Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date 11/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement that symphony concerts are to actually be given in Worcester has been hailed with joy by all classes, and the orchestra is so well and favorably known here that it seems the audiences should be limited only by the size of the hall.

Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, will play at the first concert. Mme. Nordica will not arrive in time.

Assurance is given that no efforts will be spared to make these concerts brilliant events of the season, and worthy the attention of every lover of music.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Worcester programs such of these as prove most attractive and worthy. The programs will also contain the usual number of sterling works, both of the old and of the modern school.

To add to the enjoyment of patrons, program books will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by William F. Apthorp of the Boston Evening Transcript.

The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of 48 performances in that city and the unprecedented sale for the New York series indicate an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the orchestra.

There is every reason to expect a large demand for tickets for the Worcester concerts, and intending patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. The sale of season tickets to subscribers only opens at Gorham's music store, Thursday, Nov. 10, at 9 A. M. Checks will be given out at 7 A. M. Six tickets on a choice only.

Clipping from Telegram Worcester Mass

Date 11/10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sale of Season Tickets Opens at Gorham's, This Morning.

This morning at 9 o'clock the sale of season tickets to the Boston symphony orchestra will open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s for the subscribers. Checks for positions in line will be given out at 7 a. m., and only six seats can be bought at one time. The orchestra is so well known in Worcester that little need be said concerning it. While the management consider the orchestra the main feature and chief attraction, yet no efforts will be spared in securing the best of soloists.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for the series of 48 concerts in Boston, and he will bring the most attractive of these to Worcester. Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will open the course on Tuesday, November 22. At the second concert, December 29, Mme. Nordica will sing; on the third date, February 16, Mrs. Nikisch and Herr Alwin Schroder, 'cellist, will appear. The soloists for the final night, March 28, are as yet undecided.

A large audience is assured, for over 700 tickets are engaged by the subscribers, and patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. All purchasers of course tickets will receive by mail an analytical program book previous to each concert.

[39]

BOSTON, November 1, 1892.

Mr. C. A. Ellis takes pleasure in announcing that he has completed arrangements with Madame Nordica for appearances in concert and oratorio in America from December 1, 1892, to March 1, 1893. At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last, Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Leeds, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, she will devote herself to concert engagements during the months above-named.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

REINECKE.	OVERTURE. "King Manfred."
MOZART.	ARIA from "The Marriage of Figaro."
VOLKMANN.	SERENADE FOR STRING ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
CHAMINADE.	a) CHANSON SLAVE.
BRAHMS.	b) SONNTAG.
GUIRAUD.	c) BERCEUSE.
MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 3 in A minor. "Scotch." Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.—Vivace non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

SOLOIST:

MISS ALICE WENTWORTH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal at the Academy on Friday was repeated on Saturday night before one of the largest audiences that has yet greeted Mr. Nikisch and his players. The beauty of the orchestral work, of which the TIMES had something to say on Saturday, was sufficient to excite new enthusiasm for this superb organization. Except on the possible side of over refinement there has seldom been an opportunity to criticise adversely the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Nikisch's method makes precision a certainty, but it as inevitably imperils the chances of a fresh, spontaneous effect, without which any art is at a serious loss. The players are so certain never to break away from the leader that the hearer learns to wish it were possible that they might. Allowing for the logic of the theory that it is the leader who is the actual performer of an orchestral piece, the men behind the instruments must be felt to be more than a highly evolved machine if the hearer is to be more than superficially moved. The Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala" was masterfully smooth and firm and powerful, but never had the ruggedness of passion. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the vorspiel to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" is at a tempo much slower than either that of Seidl or of Thomas and seems to us to lack in consequence a little of the Wagnerian energy. In the Tschaikowsky symphony (in E minor, op. 64) the orchestra was at the top of its fine powers.

Miss Juch was welcomed with great delight. "The "Oberon" aria is heavier music than Miss Juch manages in her most satisfactory way, but the "Lorely," of Liszt, called out the most winning traits of her always fascinating voice.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1892.

This afternoon and tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be welcomed back after its successful tour in other cities. An exceptionally fine programme will be offered, with Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 11/9

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement that symphony concerts are to actually be given in Worcester has been hailed with joy by all classes, and the orchestra is so well and favorably known here that it seems the audiences should be limited only by the size of the hall.

Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, will play at the first concert. Mme. Nordica will not arrive in time.

Assurance is given that no efforts will be spared to make these concerts brilliant events of the season, and worthy the attention of every lover of music.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for performance at the forty-eight concerts which constitute the Boston season. It is his intention to include in the Worcester programs such of these as prove most attractive and worthy. The programs will also contain the usual number of sterling works, both of the old and of the modern school.

To add to the enjoyment of patrons, program books will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The analytical and descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be prepared by William F. Apthorp of the Boston Evening Transcript.

The sale of every seat in Boston Music Hall for the series of 48 performances in that city and the unprecedented sale for the New York series indicate an extraordinary interest in the coming season of the orchestra.

There is every reason to expect a large demand for tickets for the Worcester concerts, and intending patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. The sale of season tickets to subscribers only opens at Gorham's music store, Thursday, Nov. 10, at 9 A. M. Checks will be given out at 7 A. M. Six tickets on a choice only.

Clipping from Telegram Worcester Mass

Date..... 11/10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sale of Season Tickets Opens at Gorham's. This Morning.

This morning at 9 o'clock the sale of season tickets to the Boston symphony orchestra will open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s for the subscribers. Checks for positions in line will be given out at 7 a. m., and only six seats can be bought at one time. The orchestra is so well known in Worcester that little need be said concerning it. While the management consider the orchestra the main feature and chief attraction, yet no efforts will be spared in securing the best of soloists.

Mr. Nikisch has been fortunate in securing a great number of interesting novelties for the series of 48 concerts in Boston, and he will bring the most attractive of these to Worcester. Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will open the course on Tuesday, November 22. At the second concert, December 29, Mme. Nordica will sing; on the third date, February 16, Mrs. Nikisch and Herr Alwin Schroder, 'cellist, will appear. The soloists for the final night, March 28, are as yet undecided.

A large audience is assured, for over 700 tickets are engaged by the subscribers, and patrons are advised to make early applications for seats. All purchasers of course tickets will receive by mail an analytical program book previous to each concert.

[39]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 12, 1892.

The Symphony concerts will be resumed this evening. A symphony by Saint-Saëns and an orchestral "Humoresque" by Humperdink will be new to Boston. Mr. Adamowski will play a violin concerto by Ernst, and Beethoven's second sonata will complete the bill.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The second concert of the Kneisel series was given on Monday, when the novelty offered was a quartette by Lalo, some of whose larger compositions have been heard with great pleasure in the Symphony concerts. This is a work to interest the student and possibly to please the musician, but which cannot attract even the connoisseur—still less the average concert-goer. It is too gloomy and severe, too deliberate a development of sombre moods, too much an appropriation of the forms of music merely because the composer could not command other means for the expression of his serious and almost bitter thoughts. Once, indeed, in the third movement, does Lalo give utterance to real music and encourage it to speak out in fluent form and move with untrammeled measure, and then the free rhythm, the bright accent and the current melody are very welcome. The quartette is all genuine—there can be no doubt of that; but it reveals feelings with which even a chamber audience can sympathize, set out in grave and almost abstruse formulation. The work was beautifully rendered, as also was the D-minor quartette of Schubert with which the concert ended. Schumann's piano and violin sonata came between the quintettes, rendered perfectly by Mr. Kneisel, but rather dryly and heavily by Mr. Johns.

Telegram Worcester M
Clipping from
Date 1.14

Symphony Concert Sales.

The sale of seats for the series of symphony concerts, the first of which is to be given in Mechanics hall, November 22, opened yesterday at Gorham's briskly. Only subscribers were allowed to take place in line. They availed themselves in large numbers of the opportunity to get first choice of seats. The sale will open to the public tomorrow.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.
1 WEYBOSSET ST.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its second concert at Infantry hall next Wednesday evening.

Since their last visit to this city, Mr. Nikisch and his musicians have played to a succession of great and brilliant audiences in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The ready recognition of the merits of the orchestra and its worthy conductor in these cities by both the critics and the public affords indisputable and highly edifying evidence of its value as a musical organization. Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the concert hour, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons.

The soloists at Wednesday's concert will be Miss Priscilla White and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the popular violoncellist.

The program laid out is as follows:

Overture—"King Manfred".....Reinecke
Aria—"Tod Jesu".....Graun
Suite—"Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Soli for violoncello.....
a) Andante.....Molique
b) Cappriccio.....Kleugel
Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony in A minor (Scotch).....
.....Mendelssohn

The sale of single tickets opens tomorrow (Monday) morning at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, takes place at Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening. Since its last visit the orchestra has appeared in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The extraordinary financial result of the six concerts given in those cities, a success unprecedented in the history of any similar organization, was won by actual merit. The playing of the orchestra is simply unsurpassed, and is growing more exquisite with each returning year. The orchestra on Wednesday will be accompanied by Miss Priscilla White, a young soprano, whose delightful vocalism made a great impression at the recent Worcester festival. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will also be heard in solos for the violincello. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; aria, "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet," Graun; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; soli for violincello, (a), Andante, Molique; (b), Cappriccio, Klengel; Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; Symphony in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn. The sale of single tickets opens to-morrow morning at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH must have been conscious as he faced the large audience in Chickering Hall last Thursday evening that the popularity of his band had not waned since last spring; rather, indeed, that it had waxed. It was literally a gala night and the hall early in the evening displayed the legend "Standing Room Only," for every seat was filled and the walls downstairs and upstairs were fringed with music loving humanity. Indeed, a stranger might have well supposed that this city seldom heard orchestral music, and it seldom does hear the superior mode of playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is the program that was discussed, a facsimile from Mr. W. F. Apthort's book of the music performed:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Andante non tanto quasi moderato (F sharp minor), 4-4.
Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
Aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Miss Juch.
"Queen Mab" scherzo, from the symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann
I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
Lively (D minor), 2-4.
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
Trio: the same tempo (B flat major), 3-4.
IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
Lively (D major), 4-4.
Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

This program, ranging from romanticism to ultra-modernity, was one in which the peculiar musical personality of Mr. Nikisch had ample scope and a test one as far as the technic of the orchestra was concerned. Primarily the Boston band is an emotional one, its brilliancy being but a secondary consideration. There is not its counterpart on this continent for crisp, elastic and homogeneous tone. Its responsiveness is marvelous, hence the impression it creates of being one huge, sonorous, exquisitely fashioned instrument played upon exquisitely by its leader. There was little to cavil at on Thursday night either at the mechanism or readings; perhaps a faint suspicion of impurity in the brass, otherwise the performance was almost an ideal one.

The Tschaikowsky overture fantasy is no novelty, and though in form and feeling it is distinctly program music it avoids the vicious realism of music of that class and aims rather at subtle suggestion than mock realistic effects; a superb piece of modern music charged to the full with the intensity, often hysterical and theatric, of this age. It teems with rich harmonies and is almost overladen with color, but at bottom it is good music, beautiful music, and some pages of it will rank its composer with the immortals. Tschaikowsky has employed all the resources of our latter day orchestra, and the sweep, virility, almost majesty of his workmanship, in this work at least, should free him from the charge which might be justly brought against some of his contemporaries, i. e., a lack of elevation and dignity of style. He has a great temperament and is tremendously in earnest and his brush paints for us the woe and passion of Shakespeare's lovers. The dramatic situation is sensed finely and fierce pain and passion run riot in the score. Somebody once said that Berlioz' scores smelt of blood; this score of Tschaikowsky smells of love, burning, rapturous love—the love that only asks to live but a day. The prodigality of rhythms, the gorgeousness of instrumentation and the loving attention to detail so characteristic of this master were all brought out by Mr. Nikisch's imperious baton.

The "Queen Mab," that most daring of scherzos, was a veritable technical tour de force—a Meissonier sketch of exceeding and tender delicacy. Of the symphony there need little be said. It is one of Mr. Nikisch's favorites, and while he makes a few radical changes in tempi yet it was well played, the brilliancy of the last movement being most noteworthy. The new arrangement of the orchestra gives forth a most compact and almost formidable tone quality. As to the string department there can be but one verdict—its like is rarely heard. The singer of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, and she was most warmly received indeed. Artistic, musical to a degree, her style shows to advantage in Liszt's charming but slightly artificial "Loreley" (a tender old Volkslied framed in fire gilt). In Weber's great aria she lacked breadth of voice rather than intention. Nature, so generous in its gifts to Miss Juch, has denied her this much, and her performance was but a succès d'estime.

To be frank, soloists at the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts are fifth wheels to the wagon. The orchestra is the soloist, after all. The next concert occurs Thursday evening, December 8.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, took place last Saturday night at the Academy of Music in that city. It was preceded by the usual public rehearsal last Friday afternoon. The audience was large and, for Brooklyn, positively enthusiastic. The instrumental portion of the program consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Wagner's "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," and Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony—the fifth. That it was beautifully played throughout under Mr. Nikisch goes without saying. Miss Juch was the soloist, giving the same numbers as she did at last Thursday night's concert. She sang infinitely better, however. Dr. Dvorak was an interested listener with Mrs. F. B. Thurber, in President Sheldon's box. The second rehearsal and concert take place December 9 and 10.

THE MUSICAL HERALD.

November, 1892.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The first concert of the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music hall, Saturday evening, October 22. There was a large demand for season tickets at the auction sales in September, and in certain instances extravagant prices were paid. The speculators were present at the sale in full force, and it is believed currently that in their greed they overreached themselves. Long lists of seats that are still in the market have appeared in newspapers of the town.

The programme of the first concert was as follows: Beethoven's C minor symphony; "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," and Wagner's "Kaiser" march. When Mr. Nikisch gave the first reading of the symphony under his direction (November, 1889) there was an animated discussion in print and conversation concerning the real or alleged liberties taken by him. His version of '89 was an exaggeration of the Wagner-Richter reading with sundry departures of his own invention. His manner of declaiming the famous first five measures was criticized severely, and yet Schindler affirms that Beethoven wished this opening to be taken as an Andante con moto, and he intimates that the allegro con brio begins at the sixth measure. At the same time this statement was not regarded as binding by the orchestral conductors immediately after Beethoven's death, or by their successors, and it did not become a concert hall tradition. Other points in the detail of the performance of '89 provoked heated discussion, and the performance as a whole was to some "an inspiration," to others an exhibition of a hankering after sensationalism. Mr. Nikisch gave last month a different reading, one that was eminently sane and musical. There was no seeking after unusual effects, there was an absence of exaggeration. There was an occasional lack of precision in the attack of the wood-wind, but, with this exception, the symphony and the Wagner numbers were well played.

The "Kaiser" march is better adapted for an open-air scene of rejoicing than for a hall devoted to the cultivation of pure and noble music. I trust that I shall not be accused of blasphemy if I refuse to bow the knee at the mention of this march, which seems to me intrinsically vulgar and unworthy of the reputation of the composer.

The programme of the second concert, given October 22, included Reinecke's overture "King Manfred," Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor. The overture and the symphony were played here for the first time. It is easy to dismiss the music of Reinecke with good-natured indifference or to apply to it the definition of Athenæus, "Music softens moroseness of temper; it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy"; but, after all, is there not something in the remark of Hanslick, viz., that Reinecke has always avoided affectation as well as all that which is crude or ugly or bizarre? It is true that as a composer he has but little to say; but with what loving care does he treasure and repeat the musical opinions of Mendelssohn and Schumann! His workmanship is always of excellent quality. He has a fine sense of proportion, and he knows the legitimate and well approved means of instrumental expression. At the same time I doubt if there is one to-day who, having heard the overture that Saturday night, can remember distinctly a theme or the expression or the elaboration of it.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is to the Reinecke overture as a strong and rebellious liquor is to sterilized milk. It is a singular work, not to be rashly praised, not to be hooted down. The finale is riotous beyond endurance. Instead of applying local color with a brush, Tschaikowsky emptied the paint pot with a jerk. The first movement is constructed with skill, although there is the habitual prolixity complained of by Cesar Cui in the thematic development. In a political speech it may be well to constantly present the same idea in cunning disguises; but in the first movement of this symphony the repetition leads the hearer to question the worth of the original statement. The slow movement is again too long, and condensation would have intensified the sentiment and the passion. The waltz, which takes the place of the scherzo, is delicate and piquant, and the instrumentation is more noticeable than the melodic character. It is an interesting work, in spite of the objections before mentioned.

There are conservatives in the audience who are accustomed to protest against the barbaric muse of Russia, and still lament the death of Mendelssohn as though music were then interred in one and the same grave. Perhaps if these honest people were to listen to orchestral works by Dargomijsky, Balakireff, Rimsy-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Moussorgsky and other radical Russians, they might then regard Tschaikowsky as a moderate man, or as a Russian Reinecke; indeed he is called by his colleagues a "cosmopolitan" and not a "national" musician.

The solo part of the Saint-Saens pianoforte concerto was played by Mr. Carl Stasny with a greater display of care and discretion than brilliancy or emotion.

The symphony orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass, with the pulsatile instruments, form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and right, with the exception of the double-basses, which, in groups, fringe the back of the stage and the further sides. The historical and descriptive notes to the programs are prepared by Mr. William F. Apthorp.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 1892.

The second Kneisel quartette concert was given in Chickering hall last Monday evening, Mr. Clayton Johns being the pianist. The programme was: Quartette, E flat, op. 19, Lalo; Sonata for pianoforte and violin, A minor, Schumann; Quartette, d minor, Schubert. The Lalo quartette was given its first Boston performance. It is a decidedly serious composition. The Schubert quartette was superbly played by the musicians. Mr. Johns was thoroughly painstaking in the Sonata. The concert was of the high musical excellence which now is a forgone conclusion when the Kneisel quartette appears.

Mr. Francis W. Perry, the vocal teacher whose studio was burned out in the fire at the Knickerbocker building last Sunday night, will take other rooms in the same building. Mr. Perry can be consulted on Wednesday and Saturday mornings till eleven o'clock.

The Symphony orchestra's first tour in New York and Brooklyn this seasas was a decided success.

Mma. Nordica, the prima donna, otherwise Lily Norton, will shortly marry. The prospective bridegroom began his career as an officer in the Austrian cavalry, but resigned his commission to go upon the lyric stage, and in future the musical couple will follow their profession together.—Chicago Indicator.

[40]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 12, 1892.

The Symphony concerts will be resumed this evening. A symphony by Saint-Saëns and an orchestral "Humoresque" by Humperdink will be new to Boston. Mr. Adamowski will play a violin concerto by Ernst, and Beethoven's second sonata will complete the bill.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The second concert of the Kneisel series was given on Monday, when the novelty offered was a quartette by Lalo, some of whose larger compositions have been heard with great pleasure in the Symphony concerts. This is a work to interest the student and possibly to please the musician, but which cannot attract even the connoisseur—still less the average concert-goer. It is too gloomy and severe, too deliberate a development of sombre moods, too much an appropriation of the forms of music merely because the composer could not command other means for the expression of his serious and almost bitter thoughts. Once, indeed, in the third movement, does Lalo give utterance to real music and encourage it to speak out in fluent form and move with untrammeled measure, and then the free rhythm, the bright accent and the current melody are very welcome. The quartette is all genuine—there can be no doubt of that; but it reveals feelings with which even a chamber audience can sympathize, set out in grave and almost abstruse formulation. The work was beautifully rendered, as also was the D-minor quartette of Schubert with which the concert ended. Schumann's piano and violin sonata came between the quintettes, rendered perfectly by Mr. Kneisel, but rather dryly and heavily by Mr. Johns.

Telegram Worcester
Clipping from

.....

Date..... 1892

Symphony Concert Sales.

The sale of seats for the series of symphony concerts, the first of which is to be given in Mechanics hall, November 22, opened yesterday at Gorham's briskly. Only subscribers were allowed to take place in line. They availed themselves in large numbers of the opportunity to get first choice of seats. The sale will open to the public tomorrow.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.
2 WEYBOSSET ST.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its second concert at Infantry hall next Wednesday evening.

Since their last visit to this city, Mr. Nikisch and his musicians have played to a succession of great and brilliant audiences in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The ready recognition of the merits of the orchestra and its worthy conductor in these cities by both the critics and the public affords indisputable and highly edifying evidence of its value as a musical organization. Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the concert hour, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons.

The soloists at Wednesday's concert will be Miss Priscilla White and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the popular violincellist.

The program laid out is as follows:

Overture—"King Manfred".....Reinecke
Aria—"Tod Jesu".....Graun
Suite—"Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Soli for violoncello.....
a) Andante.....Molique
b) Cappriccio.....Kleugel
Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony in A minor (Scotch).....
.....Mendelssohn

The sale of single tickets opens tomorrow (Monday) morning at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, takes place at Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening. Since its last visit the orchestra has appeared in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The extraordinary financial result of the six concerts given in those cities, a success unprecedented in the history of any similar organization, was won by actual merit. The playing of the orchestra is simply unsurpassed, and is growing more exquisite with each returning year. The orchestra on Wednesday will be accompanied by Miss Priscilla White, a young soprano, whose delightful vocalism made a great impression at the recent Worcester festival. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will also be heard in solos for the violincello. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; aria, "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet," Graun; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; soli for violincello, (a), Andante, Molique; (b), Cappriccio, Klengel; Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; Symphony in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn. The sale of single tickets opens to-morrow morning at O'Connor's flower store, 170 Westminster street.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH must have been conscious as he faced the large audience in Chickering Hall last Thursday evening that the popularity of his band had not waned since last spring; rather, indeed, that it had waxed. It was literally a gala night and the hall early in the evening displayed the legend "Standing Room Only," for every seat was filled and the walls downstairs and upstairs were fringed with music loving humanity. Indeed, a stranger might have well supposed that this city seldom heard orchestral music, and it seldom does hear the superior mode of playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is the program that was discussed, a facsimile from Mr. W. F. Apthort's book of the music performed:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Andante non tanto quasi moderato (F sharp minor), 4-4.
Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
Aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Miss Juch.
"Queen Mab" scherzo, from the symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann
I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
Lively (D minor), 2-4.
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
Trio: the same tempo (B flat major), 3-4.
IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
Lively (D major), 4-4.
Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

This program, ranging from romanticism to ultra-modernity, was one in which the peculiar musical personality of Mr. Nikisch had ample scope and a test one as far as the technic of the orchestra was concerned. Primarily the Boston band is an emotional one, its brilliancy being but a secondary consideration. There is not its counterpart on this continent for crisp, elastic and homogeneous tone. Its responsiveness is marvelous, hence the impression it creates of being one huge, sonorous, exquisitely fashioned instrument played upon exquisitely by its leader. There was little to cavil at on Thursday night either at the mechanism or readings; perhaps a faint suspicion of impurity in the brass, otherwise the performance was almost an ideal one.

The Tschaikowsky overture fantasy is no novelty, and though in form and feeling it is distinctly program music it avoids the vicious realism of music of that class and aims rather at subtle suggestion than mock realistic effects; a superb piece of modern music charged to the full with the intensity, often hysterical and theatric, of this age. It teems with rich harmonies and is almost overladen with color, but at bottom it is good music, beautiful music, and some pages of it will rank its composer with the immortals. Tschaikowsky has employed all the resources of our latter day orchestra, and the sweep, virility, almost majesty of his workmanship, in this work at least, should free him from the charge which might be justly brought against some of his contemporaries, i. e., a lack of elevation and dignity of style. He has a great temperament and is tremendously in earnest and his brush paints for us the woe and passion of Shakespeare's lovers. The dramatic situation is sensed finely and fierce pain and passion run riot in the score. Somebody once said that Berlioz' scores smelt of blood; this score of Tschaikowsky smells of love, burning, rapturous love—the love that only asks to live but a day. The prodigality of rhythms, the gorgeousness of instrumentation and the loving attention to detail so characteristic of this master were all brought out by Mr. Nikisch's imperious baton.

The "Queen Mab," that most daring of scherzos, was a veritable technical tour de force—a Meissonier sketch of exceeding and tender delicacy. Of the symphony there need little be said. It is one of Mr. Nikisch's favorites, and while he makes a few radical changes in tempi yet it was well played, the brilliancy of the last movement being most noteworthy. The new arrangement of the orchestra gives forth a most compact and almost formidable tone quality. As to the string department there can be but one verdict—its like is rarely heard. The singer of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, and she was most warmly received indeed. Artistic, musical to a degree, her style shows to advantage in Liszt's charming but slightly artificial "Loreley" (a tender old Volkslied framed in fire gilt). In Weber's great aria she lacked breadth of voice rather than intention. Nature, so generous in its gifts to Miss Juch, has denied her this much, and her performance was but a succès d'estime.

To be frank, soloists at the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts are fifth wheels to the wagon. The orchestra is the soloist, after all. The next concert occurs Thursday evening, December 8.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, took place last Saturday night at the Academy of Music in that city. It was preceded by the usual public rehearsal last Friday afternoon. The audience was large and, for Brooklyn, positively enthusiastic. The instrumental portion of the program consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Wagner's "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," and Tschaikowsky's E minor symphony—the fifth. That it was beautifully played throughout under Mr. Nikisch goes without saying. Miss Juch was the soloist, giving the same numbers as she did at last Thursday night's concert. She sang infinitely better, however. Dr. Dvorak was an interested listener with Mrs. F. B. Thurber, in President Sheldon's box. The second rehearsal and concert take place December 9 and 10.

THE MUSICAL HERALD.

November, 1892.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The first concert of the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music hall, Saturday evening, October 22. There was a large demand for season tickets at the auction sales in September, and in certain instances extravagant prices were paid. The speculators were present at the sale in full force, and it is believed currently that in their greed they overreached themselves. Long lists of seats that are still in the market have appeared in newspapers of the town.

The programme of the first concert was as follows: Beethoven's C minor symphony; "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," and Wagner's "Kaiser" march. When Mr. Nikisch gave the first reading of the symphony under his direction (November, 1889) there was an animated discussion in print and conversation concerning the real or alleged liberties taken by him. His version of '89 was an exaggeration of the Wagner-Richter reading with sundry departures of his own invention. His manner of declaiming the famous first five measures was criticized severely, and yet Schindler affirms that Beethoven wished this opening to be taken as an andante con moto, and he intimates that the allegro con brio begins at the sixth measure. At the same time this statement was not regarded as binding by the orchestral conductors immediately after Beethoven's death, or by their successors, and it did not become a concert hall tradition. Other points in the detail of the performance of '89 provoked heated discussion, and the performance as a whole was to some "an inspiration," to others an exhibition of a hankering after sensationalism. Mr. Nikisch gave last month a different reading, one that was eminently sane and musical. There was no seeking after unusual effects, there was an absence of exaggeration. There was an occasional lack of precision in the attack of the wood-wind, but, with this exception, the symphony and the Wagner numbers were well played.

The "Kaiser" march is better adapted for an open-air scene of rejoicing than for a hall devoted to the cultivation of pure and noble music. I trust that I shall not be accused of blasphemy if I refuse to bow the knee at the mention of this march, which seems to me intrinsically vulgar and unworthy of the reputation of the composer.

The programme of the second concert, given October 22, included Reinecke's overture "King Manfred," Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor. The overture and the symphony were played here for the first time. It is easy to dismiss the music of Reinecke with good-natured indifference or to apply to it the definition of Athenæus, "Music softens moroseness of temper; it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy"; but, after all, is there not something in the remark of Hanslick, viz., that Reinecke has always avoided affectation as well as all that which is crude or ugly or bizarre? It is true that as a composer he has but little to say; but with what loving care does he treasure and repeat the musical opinions of Mendelssohn and Schumann! His workmanship is always of excellent quality. He has a fine sense of proportion, and he knows the legitimate and well approved means of instrumental expression. At the same time I doubt if there is one to-day who, having heard the overture that Saturday night, can remember distinctly a theme or the expression or the elaboration of it.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is to the Reinecke overture as a strong and rebellious liquor is to sterilized milk. It is a singular work, not to be rashly praised, not to be hooted down. The finale is riotous beyond endurance. Instead of applying local color with a brush, Tschaikowsky emptied the paint pot with a jerk. The first movement is constructed with skill, although there is the habitual prolixity complained of by Cesar Cui in the thematic development. In a political speech it may be well to constantly present the same idea in cunning disguises; but in the first movement of this symphony the repetition leads the hearer to question the worth of the original statement. The slow movement is again too long, and condensation would have intensified the sentiment and the passion. The waltz, which takes the place of the scherzo, is delicate and piquant, and the instrumentation is more noticeable than the melodic character. It is an interesting work, in spite of the objections before mentioned.

There are conservatives in the audience who are accustomed to protest against the barbaric muse of Russia, and still lament the death of Mendelssohn as though music were then interred in one and the same grave. Perhaps if these honest people were to listen to orchestral works by Dargomijsky, Balakireff, Rimsy-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Moussorgsky and other radical Russians, they might then regard Tschaikowsky as a moderate man, or as a Russian Reinecke; indeed he is called by his colleagues a "cosmopolitan" and not a "national" musician.

The solo part of the Saint-Saens pianoforte concerto was played by Mr. Carl Stasny with a greater display of care and discretion than brilliancy or emotion.

The symphony orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass, with the pulsatile instruments, form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and right, with the exception of the double-basses, which, in groups, fringe the back of the stage and the further sides. The historical and descriptive notes to the programs are prepared by Mr. William F. Apthorp.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 1892.

The second Kneisel quartette concert was given in Chickering hall last Monday evening, Mr. Clayton Johns being the pianist. The programme was: Quartette, E flat, op. 19, Lalo; Sonata for pianoforte and violin, A minor, Schumann; Quartette, d minor, Schubert. The Lalo quartette was given its first Boston performance. It is a decidedly serious composition. The Schubert quartette was superbly played by the musicians. Mr. Johns was thoroughly painstaking in the Sonata. The concert was of the high musical excellence which now is a forgone conclusion when the Kneisel quartette appears.

Mr. Francis W. Perry, the vocal teacher whose studio was burned out in the fire at the Knickerbocker building last Sunday night, will take other rooms in the same building. Mr. Perry can be consulted on Wednesday and Saturday mornings till eleven o'clock.

The Symphony orchestra's first tour in New York and Brooklyn this seasas was a decided success.

Mma. Nordica, the prima donna, otherwise Lily Norton, will shortly marry. The prospective bridegroom began his career as an officer in the Austrian cavalry, but resigned his commission to go upon the lyric stage, and in future the musical couple will follow their profession together.—Chicago Indicator.

[40]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert had an ideal appetizer in Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 2 in A minor. Despite the psychical nature of this work is not really symphonic it is replete with charming details, and the harmony of its moods is inimitable. The allegro marcato in A minor has a quaint and somewhat brusque figure which is partially used in the allegro affusionato as the subject of a superbly developed tonal fugue. The adagio is naive in sentiment and quaintly elegiac, its chief theme being refined and poetial on the one hand and impressively dignified on the other. It is treated in free form and yet with a deep spirttuality of sentiment that is simply enchanting. A sterling frestissimo concludes the work brilliantly. Aside from the rich invention shown in this symphony no musician will fail to admire its abundant scholarship, its seriousness of purpose, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least the successful effort to give unity to the various movements by a masterly use in the finale of material which had its introduction in at least one of the previous movements. The plan of development shows an ingenious blending of the new spirit that came in with Liszt, Wagner and Saint Saens with the old symyhonic methods. The Humoresque for orchestra by E. Humperdink meagrely disguises its intrinsic feebleness and sterility beneath a morbid and puffed up manner that is anything but entertaining.

The Ernst Concerto will hardly stand either now or in the future, though it doubtless may have in the past, on its merits as a musical composition. Such mediocre interest as it creates is quite evenly divided between the orchestra and the solo violin, but a more mortal concerto has seldom been heard in a symphony concert. As a whole it makes the impression of having superficially served the virtuoso's ambition to create furore. The meagre instrumentation that it contains is discreet and becoming while drearily unimportant. That refined and highly cultivated technique, that genial subjectivity combined with repose which Mr. Adamowski so invariably exhibits were as usual the characteristics of his performance that constantly charmed. It seems needless to add that the popular violinist was persistently applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm.

Aside from the Saint Saens' symphony the concert had another feature which all present without regard to musical caste or creed could enjoy. The work, while it is not held in such high favor as several of its associates in the immortal series of nine to which it so worthily belongs, was at the time of its birth of matchless importance to the greatest of tone poets. It was the first work of Beethoven that conquered his adverse critics by grasping more satisfactorily than he had done before the academic forms which had been imposed on music by the scholastics and pedagogues of his time. No consciousness of form is imposed by it upon the hearer. Far from it. Here Beethoven takes full possession of the bountiful inheritance that had been left by Haydn, but with a transcendently warm feeling for art which Haydn seldom attained. The martial attacks in the first allegro were loyally observed by Mr. Nikisch, and without the slighest degree of extravagance, but with an ardor that throughout the opening movement was amply under control. The merry mood and the sparkling wit of the scherzo, the inexhaustible changes in the motives as well as in their connections and transformations were wonderfully well presented. The lorghetto, which despite its length so constantly enraptures, was admirably played and with what Ferdinand Ries calls the second scherzo of the work, namely, the finale in alla breve time, the concert was brought to a triumphant close.

SECOND CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

There was no mistaking the musical mood of Mr. Kneisel and his associates at their delightful chamber concert in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The far-famed ensemble seemed never so excellent. Such absolutely accurate playing, so unmistakably loyal in spirit and in truth, has seldom been heard here. Indeed all that seemed needed to make the concert the very worthiest success in the Kneisel Quartet's record was a more interesting repertoire. It can not in truth be affirmed that Edouard Lalo's quartet in E flat, opus 19, is a genuine creation. Evidently composed by a serious, high-minded and well-schooled musician, it is nevertheless a labored and polite example of an academic kind of chamber music the artistic right to be of which is difficult to determine. Edouard Lalo is not wholly unknown here and among musicians he is widely esteemed. An initial experience in this vicinity with his ability as a composer was at a symphony concert several years ago, when Mr. C. M. Loeffler produced his Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra. Here his talent was shown to be of a piquantly individual kind, varied and felicitous, 'tis true, quite informal and spontaneous, yet somewhat too prolific of exuberant ornamentation, while sensuously mellifluous. The work performed on Monday evening is of uniform cast; its technics are apparently without blemish—that is to say, so far as a single hearing could enable one to determine; but it is plainly not a masterpiece. It is the product of talent, of culture also, but not of genius. Its themes are dignified and respectable, without being either elevating or noble. In brief, all that Lalo has to say in this quartet is piously and correctly said, but the tone language throughout is tediously uninteresting. The sonata for piano and violin in A minor by Robert Schumann was played by Messrs. Kneisel and Johns. The pianoforte part was conscientiously played yet in the allegro affetuoso especially without any real cantabile. The performance of Mr. Johns throughout was too constantly below the level of Mr. Kneisel's masterly reading and it lacked virility, depth and passion. The Schubert quartet with which the concert was brought to a close possesses all that charming melodiousness, perspicuity and unaffectedness which are the predominating traits of all of Schubert's music. It was exquisitly played. C. L. C.

It was on a festive occasion that one young woman confided to another that music was fascinating, of course; but that she for her part, could not keep her eyes from Mr. Nikisch's right cuff. "It kept showing more and more as he waved his baton," she said, "and my mind was entirely given over to wondering if it was slipping down or his coat sleeve slipping up." "What bothered me," returned her companion, "was the man who managed the drums. Whenever he turned the screws I couldn't help thinking of hot and cold water faucets, and it really quite interfered with my enjoyment of the music." "Yes," sighed the other, "and wasn't Emma Juch's Empire gown a good deal like a Mother Hubbard, after all?"

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphony, A-minor op. 55, Saint-Saens; Concerto for violin, F-sharp minor, Ernst; Humoresque, for orchestra, E. Humperdink; and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The Saint-Saëns symphony was new to these concerts and the Humperdink work was new to Boston. Of the latter, we can only marvel that it should have found a place on the programmes of the Symphony concerts. As music it does not rise much above the beer-garden level, and as humor it is saddening. In the land of its birth, those who heard it may have rolled from their chairs to the ground in the fit of uncontrollable laughter it aroused; but to those lacking in the volatility and the sprightliness of the German nature, the work is more calculated to draw forth burning tears than expressions of mirth. As far as we could discover, Mr. Humperdink's humor was chiefly confined to the plagiarizing of a few bars of the march theme of Raff's "Lenore." It is dreary fooling. The Saint Saëns symphony is a charming work, always chaste in style, bright in effect and delightful in the grace that animates it throughout. It is a splendid example of brilliant brevity and masterly modesty. It was finely played from beginning to end, the gem of an adagio especially so. The Beethoven symphony received excellent treatment. The first movement was exceedingly well read and performed. The slow movement was, perhaps, given with over much of rigidity and a little of roughness, but the interpretation, as a whole, left little to be desired. The Ernst concerto has become irremediably aged. It has weak hams, and its eyes purge thick amber and plum tree gum. The solo part was played by Mr. T. Adamowski, whose intonation was not always true, whose tone was often weak and thin, and whose performance generally was not up to his best standard. He was twice recalled with much heartiness. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 8, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, A-minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; and "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell is to be the soloist.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, gave their second concert in this season's series, in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet, E flat, op. 19, Lalo; Sonate for pianoforte and violin, A-minor, Schumann; Quartet, D-minor, Schubert. The Lalo selection was heard for the first time, on this occasion. It is not a work to please on a single hearing, for it is not easy to grasp at the composer's intention, beyond the fact that he is desperately in earnest. Of music, pure and simple, there is but little here; but of daring harmonies, startling modulations, clever but ineffective polyphony, and thoughtful and ingenious counterpoint, there is enough and to spare. The spirit of the music is lofty, but its meaning is vague and unsatisfying. Of geniality there is not a trace, and of any seeming spontaneity in invention there is no more. The impression constantly suggested was that the composer struggled constantly to say something unlike anything that had been said before, and to say it in a way unlike any o her known way. In other words, the work is labored to excess, and though it is scholarly, refined, free from trite conventionalities, and pervaded by a certain sombre dignity, it is dry, uninspiring, and perhaps a little wearisome. In the third movement there is a gleam of sunshine, but for the rest there is an immense effort to arise to utterances that were scarcely worth the trouble taken to give them voice, or that, at least, add nothing to illustrate the beautiful and the uplifting in art. It may go without saying that it was perfectly read and played, as was also the noble Schubert Quartet. The players have never vouchsafed a more finished and more artistic performance than was accorded the latter work. Mr. Kneisel was heard with delightful results in the Sonata. It is to be regretted that the piano part was not interpreted by an artist of equal experience and ability.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, Miss Marguerite Hall, assisting. The programme is: Quartet, G major, Mozart; Songs; and Quartet D major, op. 63, Gade,

The Honeybrook Graphic,

Published Every Friday Morning,

HONEYBROOK, CHESTER CO., PA.

JESSE I. DAUMAN,

EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1892.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Orchestra Opens the Season at the Academy Brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Wednesday evening, November 2, to a crowded house. The superb organization which Mr. Nikisch commands has never appeared in better form. Its tone was rich and smooth and its execution exact and clean, and the important feature of the program, Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, was played in a way that left nothing to be sought. Emma Juch captured the audience in Liszt's "Lorely." This was the first of five concerts. The others will come on December 7, January 11, February 5 and March 15. Lovers of good music should procure seats on time by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, 1221 Chestnut street.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1892.

The Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Artful Simplicity of Camille Saint-Saens.

News and Gossip at Home and Abroad.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, A minor.....Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, F sharp.....Ernst
Humoresque.....E. Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The novelty was the Humoresque for orchestra by Mr. E. Humperdink. Humperdink is a name that suggests Koog-Zaandijk or Zaltbommel as a birthplace, with the scenic accompaniments of dikes and windmills, but it is said that Mr. Humperdink is a Bavarian and the teacher of Siegfried Wagner. That he is a Bavarian is not impossible; that he teaches the son of Wagner is an excuse for ingenious speculation. The questions "How?" and "What?" naturally arise. Siegfried is no longer a boy, and his father did not propose that he should be a musician. The Humoresca, or Humoreske, or Humoresque, is a form of musical entertainment found in the writings of Schumann, Rubinstein, Heller and Grieg, and its name seems to be derived in accordance with the principle of lucus a non lucendo. The piece by Humperdink is no exception, and there is no humor in the idea or the carrying out of the idea. The professional musical jester is apt to be a wet blanket. There are few who can write up to the level of such a title. It is an open question whether music per se, absolute music, can convey a humorous or a laughable idea. There may be an expression of the grotesque, of the bizarre; a noble strain may be burlesqued as in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, but the amusement of the hearer is skin deep, and arises chiefly from the fact that he has been previously warned of the impending jest. Then again, humor may seem of different meaning to Mr. Humperdink, for, according to the ancients, melancholy itself, "melancholy, cold and dry, thick, black and sour," is one of the four humors, and analogous to an element and an age of man. Mr. Humperdink has seasoned his melancholy with fluid extracts of Raff and Meyerbeer (if I am not mistaken), and thus aroused a desire in the sitter at table to taste these composers in their full strength; just as frozen puddings whet the appetite of a victim of alcohol and do not quench the raging fire within. The stolidity of the purpose of Mr. Humperdink is no doubt praiseworthy, and his Humoresque shows that he is a safe and a serious companion for a young man. But such compositions, even when they find a publisher in Germany, have no place in a Symphony concert in Boston.

***

The A minor symphony of Saint-Saens was played for the first time in these concerts. It is a thoroughly delightful and skillfully constructed work. First of all, it is without padding, without vain repetitions. The technical skill shown perhaps most nakedly in the first movement is not that of the pedagogue, but of the well-bred man of the world who by chance finds himself in the society of scientists and enters into the conversation with intelligence and yet with modesty. His knowledge is simply a part of his pleasure in life; he does not exist for its display. Furthermore, please note the amiable ease with which Saint-Saens solves his problems. In the three movements that follow he enjoys himself. The adagio is a temporary fit of contemplation, but the man does not withdraw from the world so completely or for so long a time that he becomes morose or unintelligible. It is a pleasant reverie finely expressed in music. There are no soul-writhings, no violent gesturing, no sullen imprecations that escape the barrier of clenched teeth. This adagio is beautiful and simple music. And in the scherzo and the finale, although there is pronounced melody that dances, although there are effects gained by appeals to the feet and by rhythmic surprises, there is not a touch of the commonplace, not a suspicion of vulgarity. The refinement of the composer is contagious; the instruments are never noisy; they do not interrupt; they each in turn say their say, and each knows how to listen to his neighbor. It is seldom in these days that we are fortunate enough to have an opportunity of finding such a combination of skill, simplicity, grace and beauty. Our modern composers, wish not only to tickle, "they must also chafe. Let a palate become accustomed to black pepper, and it will desire paprika, and then cayenne. Finally these spices, too, will refuse to create an impression," and then aqua-fortis is poured in quantity. But in this work of an eminently modern Frenchman there is a keen appreciation of the value of artistic simplicity.

***

This symphony was played exceedingly well, and so, in the main, was the symphony by Beethoven. The opening measures of the larghetto of the latter were not sung frankly enough; there was an exaggeration of the nuances, and nervous energy seemed at times misplaced.

***

Mr. T. Adamowski played the concert pathetique by H. W. Ernst. When Ernst played this concerto in manuscript in 1849, at a concert in Leipzig, there was an overture by Rietz and an aria by Flotow on the programme. It is said that Ernst then made a profound impression by his surpassing skill, but we live under a different dispensation, and Mr. Adamowski is not an Ernst. The piece itself seems intrinsically trivial, and its technical difficulties without genuine purpose. The chief theme is, like many that are found in forgotten salon-compositions, bound up in old-fashioned volumes, between "The Wrecker's Daughter Quickstep" and "Gen. Persifor F. Smith's March." It bears a strong resemblance to tunes popular in the negro minstrel "grand-ohio"; tunes that accompany the verbal statement of a lover's floral tribute or tell of a picture with its face turned toward the wall. The concerto presents great difficulties to the performer; and Mr. Adamowski apparently realized this fact, for his playing was not of the marked excellence that characterized his solo work of last year. His intonation was not always pure, and his tone was at times thin and dry. He was applauded heartily at the close.

***

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal and concert of this week will be as follows: Brahms's third symphony; MacDowell's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, A minor; Menuet des Follets and Danse des Sylphes, Berlioz, and Liszt's "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the pianist.

...Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY MORNING.
VOL. XCII, NO. 136.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. T. Adamowski.

Director Arthur Nikisch has seldom succeeded better in providing an enjoyable evening's entertainment for the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts than in the selection and arrangement of last evening's programme. It had a symphony at each end, to be sure, but the works, with the intervening compositions, afforded a constant source of pleasure and left a most satisfying impression of the event.

The symphony in A minor, No. 2, op. 55, by Camille Saint-Saens, made the opening of the programme, the work having had but a single hearing here, years ago, when the Harvard Symphony orchestra was in existence. It is in strong contrast to the latter symphonic writings of this famous French composer, as it is entirely lacking in the quaint conceits and bizarre effects in which he so delights. The second movement is a gem in the way of a romanza, and its graceful measures have a charm which is seldom realized in the more recent works of Saint-Saens. The odd and original scherzo is equally pleasing in its way, and the prestissimo, which ends the work, affords a brilliant finale to this most enjoyable symphony.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, and this very popular violinist is to be commended for his choice of Ernst's concerto in F sharp minor for his annual appearance as a soloist in these concerts. The one movement of which the work consists is built upon a wonderfully melodious theme, which is worked out with constantly fascinating variations, which afford rare opportunities for the skilful soloist, and present ever pleasing and varied tone colorings in the orchestration. The concerto is admirably suited to such a player as Mr. Adamowski, whose pure, true tones, artistic finish and sympathetic characteristics all found a fine display in its performance. The theme was sung in its simplest form, with delightful taste and expression, and its variations were given with faultless skill. Mr. Adamowski commanded the applause of his audience, as he has often done in former years, and he has never more honestly won the commendation of his hearers than on this occasion.

A bright and decidedly captivating "Humoresque" for orchestra, by Humperdink, gave Director Nikisch an opportunity to show the technical skill of his organization to good advantage, and a most satisfying reading of the second of the Beethoven symphonies ended the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell, pianist, and the programme will consist of Brahm's symphony No. 3 in F major, MacDowell's concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in A minor, Berlioz's menuet des Follets and danse des sylphes from "Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1892.

The audience at the Symphony concert Saturday evening was entertained by Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor; Ernst's concerto for the violin in F sharp minor, Humperdink's orchestral humoresque and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. It was a strange programme, but afforded variety, and was evidently appreciated, judging from the enthusiasm of the audience. The first piece has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra, although it has been once given in Boston. It is a beautiful work, artistic in its composition and affording opportunities for light and shade that were amply improved under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. The allegro appassionato was perhaps the most pleasing movement.

Mr. Adamowski was not heard at his best. For some reason he was not in tune with the orchestra, and several instances of false intonation were apparent. In execution, however, he exhibited his usual ability.

The "Humoresque" was heard for the first time in Boston, and was something of a surprise. It is an odd number, not particularly attractive and not likely to become a great favorite.

The Beethoven symphony was rendered in a masterly manner. All the movements were treated artistically, especially the first, and it served as a fitting termination for an excellent concert.

The programme for next Saturday will be symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for the pianoforte in A minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and "Tasso," Litszt. The soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

[41]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert had an ideal appetizer in Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 2 in A minor. Despite the psychical nature of this work is not really symphonic it is replete with charming details, and the harmony of its moods is inimitable. The allegro marcato in A minor has a quaint and somewhat brusque figure which is partially used in the allegro affusionato as the subject of a superbly developed tonal fugue. The adagio is naive in sentiment and quaintly elegiac, its chief theme being refined and poetial on the one hand and impressively dignified on the other. It is treated in free form and yet with a deep spirttuality of sentiment that is simply enchanting. A sterling frestissimo concludes the work brilliantly. Aside from the rich invention shown in this symphony no musician will fail to admire its abundant scholarship, its seriousness of purpose, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least the successful effort to give unity to the various movements by a masterly use in the finale of material which had its introduction in at least one of the previous movements. The plan of development shows an ingenious blending of the new spirit that came in with Liszt, Wagner and Saint Saens with the old symyhonic methods. The Humoresque for orchestra by E. Humperdink meagrely disguises its intrinsic feebleness and sterility beneath a morbid and puffed up manner that is anything but entertaining.

The Ernst Concerto will hardly stand either now or in the future, though it doubtless may have in the past, on its merits as a musical composition. Such mediocre interest as it creates is quite evenly divided between the orchestra and the solo violin, but a more mortal concerto has seldom been heard in a symphony concert. As a whole it makes the impression of having superficially served the virtuoso's ambition to create furore. The meagre instrumentation that it contains is discreet and becoming while drearily unimportant. That refined and highly cultivated technique, that genial subjectivity combined with repose which Mr. Adamowski so invariably exhibits were as usual the characteristics of his performance that constantly charmed. It seems needless to add that the popular violinist was persistently applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm.

Aside from the Saint Saens' symphony the concert had another feature which all present without regard to musical caste or creed could enjoy. The work, while it is not held in such high favor as several of its associates in the immortal series of nine to which it so worthily belongs was at the time of its birth of matchless importance to the greatest of tone poets. It was the first work of Beethoven that conquered his adverse critics by grasping more satisfactorily than he had done before the academic forms which had been imposed on music by the scholastics and pedagogues of his time. No consciousness of form is imposed by it upon the hearer. Far from it. Here Beethoven takes full possession of the bountiful inheritance that had been left by Haydn, but with a transcendently warm feeling for art which Haydn seldom attained. The martial attacks in the first allegro were loyally observed by Mr. Nikisch, and without the slighest degree of extravagance, but with an ardor that throughout the opening movement was amply under control. The merry mood and the sparkling wit of the scherzo, the inexhaustible changes in the motives as well as in their connections and transformations were wonderfully well presented. The lorghetto, which despite its length so constantly enraptures, was admirably played and with what Ferdinand Ries calls the second scherzo of the work, namely, the finale in alla breve time, the concert was brought to a triumphant close.

SECOND CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

There was no mistaking the musical mood of Mr. Kneisel and his associates at their delightful chamber concert in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The far-famed ensemble seemed never so excellent. Such absolutely accurate playing, so unmistakably loyal in spirit and in truth, has seldom been heard here. Indeed all that seemed needed to make the concert the very worthiest success in the Kneisel Quartet's record was a more interesting repertoire. It can not in truth be affirmed that Edouard Lalo's quartet in E flat, opus 19, is a genuine creation. Evidently composed by a serious, high-minded and well-schooled musician, it is nevertheless a labored and polite example of an academic kind of chamber music the artistic right to be of which is difficult to determine. Edouard Lalo is not wholly unknown here and among musicians he is widely esteemed. An initial experience in this vicinity with his ability as a composer was at a symphony concert several years ago, when Mr. C. M. Loeffler produced his Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra. Here his talent was shown to be of a piquantly individual kind, varied and felicitous, 'tis true, quite informal and spontaneous, yet somewhat too prolific of exuberant ornamentation, while sensuously mellifluous. The work performed on Monday evening is of uniform cast; its technics are apparently without blemish—that is to say, so far as a single hearing could enable one to determine; but it is plainly not a masterpiece. It is the product of talent, of culture also, but not of genius. Its themes are dignified and respectable, without being either elevating or noble. In brief, all that Lalo has to say in this quartet is piously and correctly said, but the tone language throughout is tediously uninteresting. The sonata for piano and violin in A minor by Robert Schumann was played by Messrs. Kneisel and Johns. The pianoforte part was conscientiously played yet in the allegro affetuoso especially without any real cantabile. The performance of Mr. Johns throughout was too constantly below the level of Mr. Kneisel's masterly reading and it lacked virility, depth and passion. The Schubert quartet with which the concert was brought to a close possesses all that charming melodiousness, perspicuity and unaffectedness which are the predominating traits of all of Schubert's music. It was exquisitly played.

C. L. C.

It was on a festive occasion that one young woman confided to another that music was fascinating, of course; but that she for her part, could not keep her eyes from Mr. Nikisch's right cuff. "It kept showing more and more as he waved his baton," she said, "and my mind was entirely given over to wondering if it was slipping down or his coat sleeve slipping up." "What bothered me," returned her companion, "was the man who managed the drums. Whenever he turned the screws I couldn't help thinking of hot and cold water faucets, and it really quite interfered with my enjoyment of the music." "Yes," sighed the other, "and wasn't Emma Juch's Empire gown a good deal like a Mother Hubbard, after all?"

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphony, A-minor op. 55, Saint-Saëns; Concerto for violin, F-sharp minor, Ernst; Humoresque, for orchestra, E. Humperdink; and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The Saint-Saëns symphony was new to these concerts and the Humperdink work was new to Boston. Of the latter, we can only marvel that it should have found a place on the programmes of the Symphony concerts. As music it does not rise much above the beer-garden level, and as humor it is saddening. In the land of its birth, those who heard it may have rolled from their chairs to the ground in the fit of uncontrollable laughter it aroused; but to those lacking in the volatility and the sprightliness of the German nature, the work is more calculated to draw forth burning tears than expressions of mirth. As far as we could discover, Mr. Humperdink's humor was chiefly confined to the plagiarizing of a few bars of the march theme of Raff's "Lenore." It is dreary fooling. The Saint Saëns symphony is a charming work, always chaste in style, bright in effect and delightful in the grace that animates it throughout. It is a splendid example of brilliant brevity and masterly modesty. It was finely played from beginning to end, the gem of an adagio especially so. The Beethoven symphony received excellent treatment. The first movement was exceedingly well read and performed. The slow movement was, perhaps, given with over much of rigidity and a little of roughness, but the interpretation, as a whole, left little to be desired. The Ernst concerto has become irremediably aged. It has weak hams, and its eyes purge thick amber and plum tree gum. The solo part was played by Mr. T. Adamowski, whose intonation was not always true, whose tone was often weak and thin, and whose performance generally was not up to his best standard. He was twice recalled with much heartiness. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, A-minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; and "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell is to be the soloist.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Clayton Johns, gave their second concert in this season's series, in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet, E flat, op. 19, Lalo; Sonata for pianoforte and violin, A-minor, Schumann; Quartet, D minor, Schubert. The Lalo selection was heard for the first time, on this occasion. It is not a work to please on a single hearing, for it is not easy to grasp at the composer's intention, beyond the fact that he is desperately in earnest. Of music, pure and simple, there is but little here; but of daring harmonies, startling modulations, clever but ineffective polyphony, and thoughtful and ingenious counterpoint, there is enough and to spare. The spirit of the music is lofty, but its meaning is vague and unsatisfying. Of geniality there is not a trace, and of any seeming spontaneity in invention there is no more. The impression consantly suggested was that the composer struggled constantly to say something unlike anything that had been said before, and to say it in a way unlike any other known way. In other words, the work is labored to excess, and though it is scholarly, refined, free from trite conventionalities, and pervaded by a certain sombre dignity, it is dry, uninspiring, and perhaps a little wearisome. In the third movement there is a gleam of sunshine, but for the rest there is an immense effort to arise to utterances that were scarcely worth the trouble taken to give them voice, or that, at least, add nothing to illustrate the beautiful and the uplifting in art. It may go without saying that it was perfectly read and played, as was also the noble Schubert Quartet. The players have never vouchsafed a more finished and more artistic performance than was accorded the latter work. Mr. Kneisel was heard with delightful results in the Sonata. It is to be regretted that the piano part was not interpreted by an artist of equal experience and ability.

The first in the series of three concerts by the Adamowski Quartet, will take place in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, Miss Marguerite Hall, assisting. The programme is: Quartet, G major, Mozart; Songs; and Quartet D major, op. 63 Gade.

Germantown Graphic,

Published Every Friday Morning,

GERMANTOWN, CHESTER CO., PA.

JESSE I. DAUMAN,

EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1892.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Opens the Season at the Academy Brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the first concert of the season at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Wednesday evening, November 2, to a crowded house. The superb organization which Mr. Nikisch commands has never appeared in better form. Its tone was rich and smooth and its execution exact and clean, and the important feature of the program, Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, was played in a way that left nothing to be sought. Emma Juch captured the audience in Liszt's "Lorely." This was the first of five concerts. The others will come on December 7, January 11, February 5, and March 15. Lovers of good music should procure seats on time by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, 1221 Chestnut street.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1892.

The Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Artful Simplicity of Camille Saint-Saens.

News and Gossip at Home and Abroad.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, A minor.....Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, F sharp.....Ernst
Humoresque.....E. Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The novelty was the Humoresque for orchestra by Mr. E. Humperdink. Humperdink is a name that suggests Koog-Zaandijk or Zaltbommel as a birthplace, with the scenic accompaniments of dikes and windmills, but it is said that Mr. Humperdink is a Bavarian and the teacher of Siegfried Wagner. That he is a Bavarian is not impossible; that he teaches the son of Wagner is an excuse for ingenious speculation. The questions "How?" and "What?" naturally arise. Siegfried is no longer a boy, and his father did not propose that he should be a musician. The Humoresca, or Humoreske, or Humoresque, is a form of musical entertainment found in the writings of Schumann, Rubinstein, Heller and Grieg, and its name seems to be derived in accordance with the principle of lucus a non lucendo. The piece by Humperdink is no exception, and there is no humor in the idea or the carrying out of the idea. The professional musical jester is apt to be a wet blanket. There are few who can write up to the level of such a title. It is an open question whether music per se, absolute music, can convey a humorous or a laughable idea. There may be an expression of the grotesque, of the bizarre; a noble strain may be burlesqued as in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, but the amusement of the hearer is skin deep, and arises chiefly from the fact that he has been previously warned of the impending jest. Then again, humor may seem of different meaning to Mr. Humperdink, for, according to the ancients, melancholy itself, "melancholy, cold and dry, thick, black and sour," is one of the four humors, and analogous to an element and an age of man. Mr. Humperdink has seasoned his melancholy with fluid extracts of Raff and Meyerbeer (if I am not mistaken), and thus aroused a desire in the sitter at table to taste these composers in their full strength; just as frozen puddings whet the appetite of a victim of alcohol and do not quench the raging fire within. The stolidity of the purpose of Mr. Humperdink is no doubt praiseworthy, and his Humoresque shows that he is a safe and a serious companion for a young man. But such compositions, even when they find a publisher in Germany, have no place in a Symphony concert in Boston.

***

The A minor symphony of Saint-Saens was played for the first time in these concerts. It is a thoroughly delightful and skillfully constructed work. First of all, it is without padding, without vain repetitions. The technical skill shown perhaps most nakedly in the first movement is not that of the pedagogue, but of the well-bred man of the world who by chance finds himself in the society of scientists and enters into the conversation with intelligence and yet with modesty. His knowledge is simply a part of his pleasure in life; he does not exist for its display. Furthermore, please note the amiable ease with which Saint-Saens solves his problems. In the three movements that follow he enjoys himself. The adagio is a temporary fit of contemplation, but the man does not withdraw from the world so completely or for so long a time that he becomes morose or unintelligible. It is a pleasant reverie finely expressed in music. There are no soul-writhings, no violent gesturing, no sullen imprecations that escape the barrier of clenched teeth. This adagio is beautiful and simple music. And in the scherzo and the finale, although there is pronounced melody that dances, although there are effects gained by appeals to the feet and by rhythmic surprises, there is not a touch of the commonplace, not a suspicion of vulgarity. The refinement of the composer is contagious; the instruments are never noisy; they do not interrupt; they each in turn say their say, and each knows how to listen to his neighbor. It is seldom in these days that we are fortunate enough to have an opportunity of finding such a combination of skill, simplicity, grace and beauty. Our modern composers, wish not only to tickle, "they must also chafe. Let a palate become accustomed to black pepper, and it will desire paprika, and then cayenne. Finally these spices, too, will refuse to create an impression," and then aqua-fortis is poured in quantity. But in this work of an eminently modern Frenchman there is a keen appreciation of the value of artistic simplicity.

***

This symphony was played exceedingly well, and so, in the main, was the symphony by Beethoven. The opening measures of the larghetto of the latter were not sung frankly enough; there was an exaggeration of the nuances, and nervous energy seemed at times misplaced.

***

Mr. T. Adamowski played the concert pathetique by H. W. Ernst. When Ernst played this concerto in manuscript in 1849, at a concert in Leipzig, there was an overture by Rietz and an aria by Flotow on the programme. It is said that Ernst then made a profound impression by his surpassing skill, but we live under a different dispensation, and Mr. Adamowski is not an Ernst. The piece itself seems intrinsically trivial, and its technical difficulties without genuine purpose. The chief theme is, like many that are found in forgotten salon-compositions, bound up in old-fashioned volumes, between "The Wrecker's Daughter Quickstep" and "Gen. Persifor F. Smith's March." It bears a strong resemblance to tunes popular in the negro minstrel "grand-olio"; tunes that accompany the verbal statement of a lover's floral tribute or tell of a picture with its face turned toward the wall. The concerto presents great difficulties to the performer; and Mr. Adamowski apparently realized this fact, for his playing was not of the marked excellence that characterized his solo work of last year. His intonation was not always pure, and his tone was at times thin and dry. He was applauded heartily at the close.

***

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal and concert of this week will be as follows: Brahms's third symphony; MacDowell's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, A minor; Menuet des Follets and Danse des Sylphes, Berlioz, and Liszt's "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 136.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1892.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. T. Adamowski.

Director Arthur Nikisch has seldom succeeded better in providing an enjoyable evening's entertainment for the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts than in the selection and arrangement of last evening's programme. It had a symphony at each end, to be sure, but the works, with the intervening compositions, afforded a constant source of pleasure and left a most satisfying impression of the event.

The symphony in A minor, No. 2, op. 55, by Camille Saint-Saens, made the opening of the programme, the work having had but a single hearing here, years ago, when the Harvard Symphony orchestra was in existence. It is in strong contrast to the latter symphonic writings of this famous French composer, as it is entirely lacking in the quaint conceits and bizarre effects in which he so delights. The second movement is a gem in the way of a romanza, and its graceful measures have a charm which is seldom realized in the more recent works of Saint-Saens. The odd and original scherzo is equally pleasing in its way, and the prestissimo, which ends the work, affords a brilliant finale to this most enjoyable symphony.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, and this very popular violinist is to be commended for his choice of Ernst's concerto in F sharp minor for his annual appearance as a soloist in these concerts. The one movement of which the work consists is built upon a wonderfully melodious theme, which is worked out with constantly fascinating variations, which afford rare opportunities for the skilful soloist, and present ever pleasing and varied tone colorings in the orchestration. The concerto is admirably suited to such a player as Mr. Adamowski, whose pure, true tones, artistic finish and sympathetic characteristics all found a fine display in its performance. The theme was sung in its simplest form, with delightful taste and expression, and its variations were given with faultless skill. Mr. Adamowski commanded the applause of his audience, as he has often done in former years, and he has never more honestly won the commendation of his hearers than on this occasion.

A bright and decidedly captivating "Humoresque" for orchestra, by Humperdink, gave Director Nikisch an opportunity to show the technical skill of his organization to good advantage, and a most satisfying reading of the second of the Beethoven symphonies ended the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell, pianist, and the programme will consist of Brahm's symphony No. 3 in F major, MacDowell's concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in A minor, Berlioz's menuet des Follets and danse des sylphes from "Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1892.

The audience at the Symphony concert Saturday evening was entertained by Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor; Ernst's concerto for the violin in F sharp minor, Humperdink's orchestral humoresque and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. It was a strange programme, but afforded variety, and was evidently appreciated, judging from the enthusiasm of the audience. The first piece has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra, although it has been once given in Boston. It is a beautiful work, artistic in its composition and affording opportunities for light and shade that were amply improved under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. The allegro appassionato was perhaps the most pleasing movement.

Mr. Adamowski was not heard at his best. For some reason he was not in tune with the orchestra, and several instances of false intonation were apparent. In execution, however, he exhibited his usual ability.

The "Humoresque" was heard for the first time in Boston, and was something of a surprise. It is an odd number, not particularly attractive and not likely to become a great favorite.

The Beethoven symphony was rendered in a masterly manner. All the movements were treated artistically, especially the first, and it served as a fitting termination for an excellent concert.

The programme for next Saturday will be symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for the pianoforte in A minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and "Tasso," Litszt. The soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

[41]

...Y, NOV. 13, 1892.

SYMPHONY SEASON.

Two Novelties at Last Evening's Concert in Music Hall.

The ensemble proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was plainly illustrated last evening by the almost faultless interpretation of the Beethoven second or "perfect" symphony, a work filled with melody and sunshine and not a portrayal of a struggle from darkness to light, like the fifth and ninth.

The theme of the first movement is very simple and harmonious and appeals even to the uneducated ear. This motif is wonderfully worked out and retains its distinctive trait throughout the development of the idea.

Beautifully the orchestra played the number. From the dainty introduction on the strings, through the noble orchestration and more varied themes of the second and third parts up to the capricious finale, their work was deserving of naught but praise, and the effect on the audience was most marked, the selection receiving the heartiest indorsement of the evening.

Saint-Saens' symphony No. 2 was given for the first time at these concerts. The work was originally scored for a small orchestra, and seems better suited for a smaller body of players than to the Symphony force.

It is a light composition written in a rather unusual manner, one might say it contained "musical surprises," with a lively tarantella for the finale, which was finely given last evening. The niece deviates somewhat from the accepted symphonic form, and is characterized by the author's brilliancy of style and peculiar treatment of the opening theme.

Mr. Adamowski played the Heinrich Ernst concerto in a delightful manner. "Humoresque," for orchestra, proved uninteresting, for which the composer and not the performers are to blame.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert this week will be Brahms' symphony No. 3 in F major; concerto for piano in A minor, MacDowell; minuet and dance from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. MacDowell will be the soloist.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 10-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

GOOD PROGRAM AND SUCCESSFUL OPENING SALE OF TICKETS.

The extraordinary financial result of the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last week, in their series of six concerts in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York, a success unprecedented in the history of any similar organization, and even of their own, was not obtained by any sensational advertising or over-friendly press notices, but was won on actual merit.

The playing of the orchestra is simply unsurpassed, and is growing more exquisite with each returning year. Its work at the late festival was easily the best ever done in Worcester, and the coming series of concerts by this organization in this city will prove an extraordinary interesting and pleasing series.

It is pleasant to be able to say that the financial success of the local course seems assured.

Program for the first concert:

Goldmark, Overture "Sakuntala."

Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, C minor.

Wagner, "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde."

Soli for pianoforte (a), Rameau, Gavotte and variations; (b), Schubert-Tausig, March Militaire.

Tschaikowski, Symphony No. 5; Soloist, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Concerts begin at 7.45 sharp.

The sale of tickets, which opened at Gorham's music store yesterday morning, despite the weather, brought out about two-thirds of the subscribers, and resulted in the cash receipts reaching $2500.

This is perfectly satisfactory to the management, and is a much better opening day than first day's sale in Providence last season, despite the larger population there, and the fact that last year was the first time Providence receipts had met the expenses of the concerts. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's numbers were sent by wire from Chicago, and are not only eminently suited to the balance of the program but are well calculated to display the brilliant pianist's best abilities in a marked degree.

A season of congratulations over the result of the opening sale followed throughout the day among music lovers. The program numbers are all novelties here, and will have their first performance in Worcester, except the overture and the concerto. The public sale will occur Saturday morning at 9 A. M.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 11-11

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Big Sale of Seats—Programme of First Concert.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Course yesterday proved a pleasant surprise for the management, for despite the storm about $2500 was taken. Such interest shown on so stormy a day certainly argues well for the financial success of the course, and if successful this year undoubtedly such a course will become a permanent thing in Worcester.

The past week's tour of the large cities of the East has shown the best qualities of the orchestra—precision, perfect subordination of the individual to the general effect, with exquisite delicacy and finish of tone and manipulation.

The programme for the first concert, Nov. 22, is as follows:—

Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala;" Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in C minor; Wagner, "Vorspeil" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde"; soli for pianoforte, (a) Rameau, gavotte and variations, (b) Schubert-Tausig, march militaire; Tschaikowski, Symphony No. 5. The soloist is to be Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The concerts will begin promptly at 7:15 as the orchestra returns to Boston the same night, and the doors will positively be closed during the performance of each number. The doors are to be thrown open to the audience [illegible] desires that subscribers [illegible] for their [illegible]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Saint-Saens: Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Opus 55.
Ernst: Concerto for violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23.
Humperdink: Humoresque for orchestra.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 36.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Saint-Saëns's A minor symphony has not been given here since its first performance in this city by the Harvard Musical Association in 1880. Although written nearly forty years ago it may safely be reckoned as belonging to the modern French school of composition, and goes far—in one way, at least—toward reconciling one to that by no means immaculate school. In spite of the length of the work, its musical character and the modest orchestra for which it is scored point to the composer's probably looking upon it somewhat in the light of a "petite symphonie" as belonging to that domain which lies between chamber-music and grand orchestral writing of the modern sort — the domain to which most of the Haydn and Mozart symphonies are now to be relegated. It is, in one respect, refreshing to find a modern Frenchman writing anything for orchestra that is so purely musical, so unstrenuous and reserved in expression, as this symphony, and which at the same time is so carefully wrought, which shows so much clever and sincere work. On the other hand, it is a little disappointing and depressing to note how merely superficially his task took possession of the composer, how his cleverness is, in the end, nothing more nor deeper than cleverness, how all the contrapuntal and fugal writing he has put into it seems to have appealed to his fancy rather as an attractive task than to have been the spontaneously chosen form through which a vital and compelling inspiration sought to find outward expression. It is curious that, while the present school of French composers have had probably the best, strictest and most thorough contrapuntal education of any musicians now going, they can so seldom bring themselves to put really their whole heart into contrapuntal work: it is a task of which some of them often acquit themselves admirably well, but still it is a task to them, something to be got through with by dint of skill and cleverness, but not a thing for their whole soul to revel in. At best, they show—as Saint-Saëns has in this symphony—that they find it an attractive task. When Saint-Saëns has got through the exposition of his fugato in the first movement, you do not hear him heave a sigh of relief (as Gounod and Massenet too often are impelled to do in similar cases); the labor has not tired him out, and he is still fresh for more of the same kind. When he calls upon the fugue, he does more than merely leave his card. Still, it is very like a call of ceremony, for all that; not like the visit of a lover to his mistress. To throw aside all simile, clever, charming, aye, learned as Saint-Saëns shows himself in this symphony, and brilliantly as it is written, he never really unbends in it, he preserves throughout a certain air of man-of-the-world correctness of bearing, full of refinement and charm, but not stirring to one's enthusiasm. And here is just the disheartening point: to find that a man like Saint-Saëns, who can do this sort of thing so well, should take so shallow a delight in doing it, should find so little genuine inspiration in it. Only see how differently he goes to work when he has to write a "Phaéton" or a "Danse macabre!" Then the whole man is revealed to you, frankly, outspokenly, full of genuine vivacity and spontaneity; and if, in such moments of expansiveness, something a little coarse and vulgar shine through the polished surface, it is at least real and human. Here, in this symphony, all is polished and refined; but the man's whole heart is not in it, it sounds like something written to show what he could do, as groundbait to catch some opera director. Still, its charm is undeniable; the little adagio especially is a gem of delicacy and grace.

Of the new "Humoresque" by Humperdink one need only say that it is not worth playing, and certainly not worth talking about.

Beethoven's D major symphony made a glorious close to a programme in which there was much to commend, much that was interesting, if, upon the whole, too little real genius. The symphony was well and spiritedly played, but not with quite the fine finish that we have heard more than once before.

Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto has long been at once the ambition and the terror of aspiring violionists; it has a reputation very like that of Henselt's F minor pianoforte concerto—of being the most difficult thing for the instrument in existence. Whether it is not rather hard-pushed in this respect by some things by Spohr, as the Henselt concerto certainly is by some things by Brahms and others, we are not competent to determine. Certain it is, however, that the style, and especially the key, in which it is written make it an almost inordinately difficult piece of execution. Legends are still whispered from ear to ear of how Ernst himself, when at his best, would excite the wildest enthusiasm with it, and then at other times, when feeling out of sorts, would play it horribly out of tune. To us, apart from its difficulty, it seems almost an unique work of its class; there is much admirable workmanship in it, both the solo instrument and the orchestra are treated with the greatest skill throughout; it does not in the least sound like a concerto written by a great virtuoso to show himself off; it is far too sincere and musician-like for that. Only the thematic material of which it is built is so hopelessly trivial, and, what is more, so antiquated in its triviality, that it is very hard to listen to seriously. It is eminently a work that has had its day. Mr. Adamowski conquered its many difficulties very successfully, only one could not but feel that the exertion of so doing drew rather heavily upon his powers. We have heard him play more soulfully and with more brilliancy of effect on other occasions. Whether or not he could, in any case, have infused musical life and vigor into those trite phrases is perhaps not worth speculating upon; but the work seemed to give him little chance for showing that grace of style and poignancy of sentiment for which he is justly noted. He did much admirable playing, but, as a whole, it was not to be accounted one of his finest efforts. Que diable aussi allait il faire dans cette maudite galère? It is a desideratum that certain compositions could be proved dead and past the hope of resurrection, so that no one should try henceforth to galvanize them into a semblance of life again. Of course violinists will ask: "What, then, shall we play?" To which not unnatural question, it must be admitted, the answer is not quite self-evident. The impression Mr. Adamowski made upon the audience was all that could have been desired, for he was enthusiastically applauded and twice recalled. And if we cannot quite join in with this enthusiasm with all desirable heartiness, Mr. Adamowski has only his previous playing, of other and better things, to thank for it.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall.

The musical season may be said to have opened formally on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall. The demand for tickets for this popular series of symphonic concerts is so great that before 8 o'clock of that evening the ominous sign of "Standing Room Only," met the eyes of late comers, and many carriages rolled sadly homeward without leaving their occupants. The popularity of this excellent orchestra has been justly earned, and is well merited, while their New York audiences are the creme de la creme of beauty, fashion and elegance. It must also be admitted that Mr. Nikisch has infinite tact and discretion in the art of program making, and that, as a natural result his programs never weary the listener. On this occasion the evening opened with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasy, which is conceded to be one of the finest examples of the work of that talented composer. Tschaikowsky may be said to be one of the leaders in the extremely modern school of composition, and his works are frequently bizarre to the verge of eccentricity.

In this work he has not ventured to any extreme measures, and has yet shown originality and true inspiration in the tone picture of the famous lovers whose unhappy fate has tested the genius of so many artists in the portrayal. The love theme is one of the most exquisite things that Tschaikowsky has given us, with its softly blending harmonies and richly melodious flow of tones. Rightly enough, the composer has treated it as the central point upon which all else hangs. It does not appear at once, but follows after the solemn chant, which shows the strong religious vein that abounds in the love tale, and the turbulent theme of the street brawls of the two families whose feud is the basis of the story. Softly and most gently it steals in, typical of that love that crept in unawares upon the two hearts. Other themes intervene and occupy the scene for a moment, but love returns again and again to the attack until triumphantly it sweeps all before it, and the full force of the orchestra dwells upon the beautiful theme that renders the overture one of great power and beauty.

Like all the modern writers, Tschaikowsky possesses the art of infusing an amount of intensity and passion into his music that exercises a potent sway upon his hearers. Those who know the delicate art of Mr. Nikisch can comprehend what consummate skill he would show in working up a scheme of this kind to a thrillingly dramatic climax that would evoke a storm of enthusiasm from the audience.

The next orchestral number was the "Queen Mab" scherzo of Berlioz, whose mastery of the resources of the orchestra was marvelous. This scherzo is one of the most unique compositions in existence, and stands alone as an example of what human ingenuity can do in giving a tonal description of Shakspere's tricksy sprite. A critic said once that all the instruments "sounded through the wrong end of an opera-glass." The difficulties of the score are great and every instrument is kept supernaturally busy, still everything is microscopic in treatment. The buzzing whirr of tone is not as heavy as that we hear in a garden on a fair summer's eve from the concert of bugs, insects, and other creatures who lend their assistance to make night melodious as well as beautiful.

The scherzo was most daintily played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The soloist of the occasion was our rising young American soprano, Miss Emma Juch, who essayed the two dramatic arias, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's "Loreley."

Miss Juch has only recently entered into the field of dramatic music, and she displays no little aptitude for the change. Her singing of the Lorely was especially fine. Her voice is imbued with sympathy and dramatic feeling, and the finer shades of meaning of Liszt's effective song were given with a refined touch that brought an instantaneous response from the audience, while the pure and limpid toned voice provoked admiration. The concert was brought to a close with Schumann's D. Minor Symphony.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date..... 11-12

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SILENCE OF THE HILLS.

The windy forest, rousing from its sleep
Voices its heart in hoarse Titanic war,
The ocean bellows from its rocky shore
The cataract that haunts the rugged steep
Makes mighty music in its headlong leap,
The clouds have voices and the rivers pour
Their floods in thunders down to ocean's floor,—
The hills alone mysterious silence keep.
They cannot rend the ancient chain that bars
Their iron lips, nor answer back the sea,
That calls to them far off in vain; the stars
They cannot hail, nor their wild brooks—Ah me,
What cries from out the stony hearts will break
In God's great day, when all that sleep shall wake.

—William Prescott Foster.

Mme. Nordica will sing in Lewiston probably some time in December. She is under management, in this American tour, of Mr. C. A. Ellis the Boston Symphony manager and her tour will extend from Dec. 1 to March 1. Since she sang in Lewiston last winter she has been filling her engagement at the Covent Garden, Royal Italian Opera, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris. She has sung during the spring season of 1892 at the Richter concerts and at the London Symphony concerts (Mr. Henschel's.) In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the festivals at Gloucester, Leeds and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan opera house, she will devote herself to concert engagements during the months above named. Her management was in Lewiston to-day and the arragements are complete. This is good news for Lewiston and Auburn admirers of the distinguished Maine songstress.

The days of grace of Treasurer Rawson of the Lewiston Brigade Band are about up and very soon, if he doesn't return, the boys will be [illegible] interest on the $400. Mr. Rawson was a fine performer on bass instruments, receiving his training in the [42]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 1892.

SYMPHONY SEASON.

Two Novelties at Last Evening's Concert in Music Hall.

The ensemble proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was plainly illustrated last evening by the almost faultless interpretation of the Beethoven second or "perfect" symphony, a work filled with melody and sunshine and not a portrayal of a struggle from darkness to light, like the fifth and ninth.

The theme of the first movement is very simple and harmonious and appeals even to the uneducated ear. This motif is wonderfully worked out and retains its distinctive trait throughout the development of the idea.

Beautifully the orchestra played the number. From the dainty introduction on the strings, through the noble orchestration and more varied themes of the second and third parts up to the capricious finale, their work was deserving of naught but praise, and the effect on the audience was most marked, the selection receiving the heartiest indorsement of the evening.

Saint-Saens' symphony No. 2 was given for the first time at these concerts. The work was originally scored for a small orchestra, and seems better suited for a smaller body of players than to the Symphony force.

It is a light composition written in a rather unusual manner, one might say it contained "musical surprises," with a lively tarantella for the finale, which was finely given last evening. The niece deviates somewhat from the accepted symphonic form, and is characterized by the author's brilliancy of style and peculiar treatment of the opening theme.

Mr. Adamowski played the Heinrich Ernst concerto in a delightful manner. "Humoresque," for orchestra, proved uninteresting, for which the composer and not the performers are to blame.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert this week will be Brahms' symphony No. 3 in F major; concerto for piano in A minor, MacDowell; minuet and dance from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. MacDowell will be the soloist.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 11-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

GOOD PROGRAM AND SUCCESSFUL OPENING SALE OF TICKETS.

The extraordinary financial result of the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last week, in their series of six concerts in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York, a success unprecedented in the history of any similar organization, and even of their own, was not obtained by any sensational advertising or over-friendly press notices, but was won on actual merit.

The playing of the orchestra is simply unsurpassed, and is growing more exquisite with each returning year. Its work at the late festival was easily the best ever done in Worcester, and the coming series of concerts by this organization in this city will prove an extraordinary interesting and pleasing series.

It is pleasant to be able to say that the financial success of the local course seems assured.

Program for the first concert:

Goldmark, Overture "Sakuntala."

Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, C minor.

Wagner, "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde."

Soli for pianoforte (a), Rameau, Gavotte and variations; (b), Schubert-Tausig, March Militaire.

Tschaikowski, Symphony No. 5; Soloist, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Concerts begin at 7.45 sharp.

The sale of tickets, which opened at Gorham's music store yesterday morning, despite the weather, brought out about two-thirds of the subscribers, and resulted in the cash receipts reaching $2500.

This is perfectly satisfactory to the management, and is a much better opening day than first day's sale in Providence last season, despite the larger population there, and the fact that last year was the first time Providence receipts had met the expenses of the concerts. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's numbers were sent by wire from Chicago, and are not only eminently suited to the balance of the program but are well calculated to display the brilliant pianist's best abilities in a marked degree.

A season of congratulations over the result of the opening sale followed throughout the day among music lovers. The program numbers are all novelties here, and will have their first performance in Worcester, except the overture and the concerto. The public sale will occur Saturday morning at 9 A. M.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.

Date..... 11-12

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Big Sale of Seats—Programme of First Concert.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Course yesterday proved a pleasant surprise for the management, for despite the storm about $2500 was taken. Such interest shown on so stormy a day certainly argues well for the financial success of the course, and if successful this year undoubtedly such a course will become a permanent thing in Worcester.

The past week's tour of the large cities of the East has shown the best qualities of the orchestra—precision, perfect subordination of the individual to the general effect, with exquisite delicacy and finish of tone and manipulation.

The programme for the first concert, Nov. 22, is as follows:—

Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala;" Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in C minor; Wagner, "Vorspeil" and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde"; soli for pianoforte, (a) Rameau, gavotte and variations, (b) Schubert-Tausig, march militaire; Tschaikowski, Symphony No. 5. The soloist is to be Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The concerts will begin promptly at 7:45 as the orchestra returns to Boston the same night, and the doors will positively be closed during the performance of each number. To-morrow the sale is thrown open to the public. The management desires that subscribers who have not called for their tickets will do so at once.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Saint-Saens: Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Opus 55.
Ernst: Concerto for violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23.
Humperdink: Humoresque for orchestra.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 36.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Saint-Saëns's A minor symphony has not been given here since its first performance in this city by the Harvard Musical Association in 1880. Although written nearly forty years ago it may safely be reckoned as belonging to the modern French school of composition, and goes far—in one way, at least—toward reconciling one to that by no means immaculate school. In spite of the length of the work, its musical character and the modest orchestra for which it is scored point to the composer's probably looking upon it somewhat in the light of a "petite symphonie" as belonging to that domain which lies between chamber-music and grand orchestral writing of the modern sort — the domain to which most of the Haydn and Mozart symphonies are now to be relegated. It is, in one respect, refreshing to find a modern Frenchman writing anything for orchestra that is so purely musical, so unstrenuous and reserved in expression, as this symphony, and which at the same time is so carefully wrought, which shows so much clever and sincere work. On the other hand, it is a little disappointing and depressing to note how merely superficially his task took possession of the composer, how his cleverness is, in the end, nothing more nor deeper than cleverness, how all the contrapuntal and fugal writing he has put into it seems to have appealed to his fancy rather as an attractive task than to have been the spontaneously chosen form through which a vital and compelling inspiration sought to find outward expression. It is curious that, while the present school of French composers have had probably the best, strictest and most thorough contrapuntal education of any musicians now going, they can so seldom bring themselves to put really their whole heart into contrapuntal work: it is a task of which some of them often acquit themselves admirably well, but still it is a task to them, something to be got through with by dint of skill and cleverness, but not a thing for their whole soul to revel in. At best, they show—as Saint-Saëns has in this symphony—that they find it an attractive task. When Saint-Saëns has got through the exposition of his fugato in the first movement, you do not hear him heave a sigh of relief (as Gounod and Massenet too often are impelled to do in similar cases); the labor has not tired him out, and he is still fresh for more of the same kind. When he calls upon the fugue, he does more than merely leave his card. Still, it is very like a call of ceremony, for all that; not like the visit of a lover to his mistress. To throw aside all simile, clever, charming, aye, learned as Saint-Saëns shows himself in this symphony, and brilliantly as it is written, he never really unbends in it, he preserves throughout a certain air of man-of-the-world correctness of bearing, full of refinement and charm, but not stirring to one's enthusiasm. And here is just the disheartening point: to find that a man like Saint-Saëns, who can do this sort of thing so well, should take so shallow a delight in doing it, should find so little genuine inspiration in it. Only see how differently he goes to work when he has to write a "Phaéton" or a "Danse macabre!" Then the whole man is revealed to you, frankly, outspokenly, full of genuine vivacity and spontaneity; and if, in such moments of expansiveness, something a little coarse and vulgar shine through the polished surface, it is at least real and human. Here, in this symphony, all is polished and refined; but the man's whole heart is not in it, it sounds like something written to show what he could do, as groundbait to catch some opera director. Still, its charm is undeniable; the little adagio especially is a gem of delicacy and grace.

Of the new "Humoresque" by Humperdink one need only say that it is not worth playing, and certainly not worth talking about.

Beethoven's D major symphony made a glorious close to a programme in which there was much to commend, much that was interesting, if, upon the whole, too little real genius. The symphony was well and spiritedly played, but not with quite the fine finish that we have heard more than once before.

Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto has long been at once the ambition and the terror of aspiring violionists; it has a reputation very like that of Henselt's F minor pianoforte concerto—of being the most difficult thing for the instrument in existence. Whether it is not rather hard-pushed in this respect by some things by Spohr, as the Henselt concerto certainly is by some things by Brahms and others, we are not competent to determine. Certain it is, however, that the style, and especially the key, in which it is written make it an almost inordinately difficult piece of execution. Legends are still whispered from ear to ear of how Ernst himself, when at his best, would excite the wildest enthusiasm with it, and then at other times, when feeling out of sorts, would play it horribly out of tune. To us, apart from its difficulty, it seems almost an unique work of its class; there is much admirable workmanship in it, both the solo instrument and the orchestra are treated with the greatest skill throughout; it does not in the least sound like a concerto written by a great virtuoso to show himself off; it is far too sincere and musician-like for that. Only the thematic material of which it is built is so hopelessly trivial, and, what is more, so antiquated in its triviality, that it is very hard to listen to seriously. It is eminently a work that has had its day. Mr. Adamowski conquered its many difficulties very successfully, only one could not but feel that the exertion of so doing drew rather heavily upon his powers. We have heard him play more soulfully and with more brilliancy of effect on other occasions. Whether or not he could, in any case, have infused musical life and vigor into those trite phrases is perhaps not worth speculating upon; but the work seemed to give him little chance for showing that grace of style and poignancy of sentiment for which he is justly noted. He did much admirable playing, but, as a whole, it was not to be accounted one of his finest efforts. Que diable aussi allait il faire dans cette maudite galère? It is a desideratum that certain compositions could be proved dead and past the hope of resurrection, so that no one should try henceforth to galvanize them into a semblance of life again. Of course violinists will ask: "What, then, shall we play?" To which not unnatural question, it must be admitted, the answer is not quite self-evident. The impression Mr. Adamowski made upon the audience was all that could have been desired, for he was enthusiastically applauded and twice recalled. And if we cannot quite join in with this enthusiasm with all desirable heartiness, Mr. Adamowski has only his previous playing of other and better things, to thank for it.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall.

The musical season may be said to have opened formally on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall. The demand for tickets for this popular series of symphonic concerts is so great that before 8 o'clock of that evening the ominous sign of "Standing Room Only," met the eyes of late comers, and many carriages rolled sadly homeward without leaving their occupants. The popularity of this excellent orchestra has been justly earned, and is well merited, while their New York audiences are the creme de la creme of beauty, fashion and elegance. It must also be admitted that Mr. Nikisch has infinite tact and discretion in the art of program making, and that, as a natural result his programs never weary the listener. On this occasion the evening opened with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasy, which is conceded to be one of the finest examples of the work of that talented composer. Tschaikowsky may be said to be one of the leaders in the extremely modern school of composition, and his works are frequently bizarre to the verge of eccentricity.

In this work he has not ventured to any extreme measures, and has yet shown originality and true inspiration in the tone picture of the famous lovers whose unhappy fate has tested the genius of so many artists in the portrayal. The love theme is one of the most exquisite things that Tschaikowsky has given us, with its softly blending harmonies and richly melodious flow of tones. Rightly enough, the composer has treated it as the central point upon which all else hangs. It does not appear at once, but follows after the solemn chant, which shows the strong religious vein that abounds in the love tale, and the turbulent theme of the street brawls of the two families whose feud is the basis of the story. Softly and most gently it steals in, typical of that love that crept in unawares upon the two hearts. Other themes intervene and occupy the scene for a moment, but love returns again and again to the attack until triumphantly it sweeps all before it, and the full force of the orchestra dwells upon the beautiful theme that renders the overture one of great power and beauty.

Like all the modern writers, Tschaikowsky possesses the art of infusing an amount of intensity and passion into his music that exercises a potent sway upon his hearers. Those who know the delicate art of Mr. Nikisch can comprehend what consummate skill he would show in working up a scheme of this kind to a thrillingly dramatic climax that would evoke a storm of enthusiasm from the audience.

The next orchestral number was the "Queen Mab" scherzo of Berlioz, whose mastery of the resources of the orchestra was marvelous. This scherzo is one of the most unique compositions in existence, and stands alone as an example of what human ingenuity can do in giving a tonal description of Shakspere's tricksy sprite. A critic said once that all the instruments "sounded through the wrong end of an opera-glass." The difficulties of the score are great and every instrument is kept supernaturally busy, still everything is microscopic in treatment. The buzzing whirr of tone is not as heavy as that we hear in a garden on a fair summer's eve from the concert of bugs, insects, and other creatures who lend their assistance to make night melodious as well as beautiful.

The scherzo was most daintily played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The soloist of the occasion was our rising young American soprano, Miss Emma Juch, who essayed the two dramatic arias, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's "Loreley."

Miss Juch has only recently entered into the field of dramatic music, and she displays no little aptitude for the change. Her singing of the Lorely was especially fine. Her voice is imbued with sympathy and dramatic feeling, and the finer shades of meaning of Liszt's effective song were given with a refined touch that brought an instantaneous response from the audience, while the pure and limpid toned voice provoked admiration. The concert was brought to a close with Schumann's D. Minor Symphony.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date..... 11-12

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SILENCE OF THE HILLS.

The windy forest, rousing from its sleep
Voices its heart in hoarse Titanic war,
The ocean bellows from its rocky shore
The cataract that haunts the rugged steep
Makes mighty music in its headlong leap,
The clouds have voices and the rivers pour
Their floods in thunders down to ocean's floor,—
The hills alone mysterious silence keep.
They cannot rend the ancient chain that bars
Their iron lips, nor answer back the sea,
That calls to them far off in vain; the stars
They cannot hail, nor their wild brooks—Ah me,
What cries from out the stony hearts will break
In God's great day, when all that sleep shall wake.

—William Prescott Foster.

Mme. Nordica will sing in Lewiston probably some time in December. She is under management, in this American tour, of Mr. C. A. Ellis the Boston Symphony manager and her tour will extend from Dec. 1 to March 1. Since she sang in Lewiston last winter she has been filling her engagement at the Covent Garden, Royal Italian Opera, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris. She has sung during the spring season of 1892 at the Richter concerts and at the London Symphony concerts (Mr. Henschel's.) In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the festivals at Gloucester, Leeds and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan opera house, she will devote herself to concert engagements during the months above named. Her management was in Lewiston to-day and the arragements are complete. This is good news for Lewiston and Auburn admirers of the distinguished Maine songstress.

The days of grace of Treasurer Rawson of the Lewiston Brigade Band are about up and very soon, if he doesn't return, the boys will be wanting interest on the $400. Mr. Rawson was a fine performer on bass instruments, receiving his training in the [42]

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Chesvan 21, 5653, November 11, 1892

In recording a concert such as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday night of last week, the chronicler of musical events is apt to be led away by his enthusiasm, a condition that in this case is certainly pardonable. So much has been written of this superb orchestra, and all in its praise, that it is difficult to say anything more without having recourse to a collection of adjectives to describe its superlative merit. All the more, therefore, is it a most grateful obligation to note the successful opening of this season's series of concerts which took place at Chickering Hall last Thursday evening before an audience of representative music lovers that completely crowded the concert room. It is safe to say, too, that when the large audience dispersed, it was with the consciousness of having passed an evening of keen enjoyment. The programme was one which afforded the orchestra every opportunity to display its best work and Mr. Nikisch his masterful interpretation of some of the most beautiful music written, abounding in wealth of tonal eloquence. It consisted of Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz's "Queen Mab," scherzo from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet" and Schumann's D minor symphony, and it is not exaggerating to say that all of these compositions were superbly played. There were times when the instrumental language was positively thrilling and seemed to come from a body of inspired performers, who responded so eloquently to the direction of their animated conductor. Mr. Nikisch's conception of the Tschaikowsky Overture was essentially dramatic, and as it is one of the composer's finest works, the effects produced in the performance were stirring The soloist of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, who sang Weber's aria "Ocean! thou mighty monster," and Liszt's song "Lorely." She was decidedly at her best in the beautiful song, Weber's great aria exacting more voice and dramatic power than Miss Juch possesses. The next concert will be given on Thursday evening, December 8th.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 16.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first of a series of three subscription concerts in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. The quartet was assisted by Miss Marguerite Hall, whose song recitals have attracted so much attention. The programme was a carefully selected one, and comprised Mozart's quartet in G major and Gade's quartet in D major.

The first number was played with exquisite taste, particularly the finale, which was the most striking movement. Gade's quartet is always well received, and was rendered in a masterly manner and with excellent effect.

Miss Hall sang four songs, all of the type for which her voice is so well suited, and that she pleased her audience was more than evident, as applause was hearty and enthusiastic. Mrs. S. B. Field was the accompanist.

The next concert will be given on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 20, and Mr. Sherwood will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 16, 1892,

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Adamowski Quartet Recital.

The Adamowski String Quartet gave their initial concert this season, the first of a series of three, in Chickering Hall, yesterday afternoon. The audience was a fair one, and if not enthusiastic, quite appreciative.

Miss Marguerite Hall, the assisting soloist, contributed a number of songs, rendered with commendable taste, particularly the old English ballads, "Phyllis" (Arne), and "Nymphs and Shepherds" (Purcell) vocal gems which are welcome on any modern programme, sometimes a relief, adding to the reputation she is making as a finished artist.

Mozart's quartette in G major, a charming example of the purity and melody of its school, was very acceptable, every movement receiving musicianly treatment. Of the Gade quartette in D major—a suitable contrast to the foregoing—the scherzo movement (allegretto-vivace) evoked hearty applause. Mr. T. Adamowski's tone is perfect, but the cello lacked rather the mellow quality which one loves to hear—most likely the fault of the instrument. The second concert will be given on Tuesday, 20th December.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 139.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 16, 1892.

First of the Adamowski String Quartet Concerts.

The resumption of the concerts of the Adamowski quartet for the season of 1892-93 at Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, was a source of great pleasure to all who have come to realize the value of the annual appearances of this admirable organization. The popularity of Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-players, Messrs. A. Moldauer, Max Zach and J. Adamowski, has been well established in earlier seasons, and the high standing of the quartet was well maintained yesterday.

The programme consisted of Mozart's quartet in C major, No. 12; an that by N. W. Gade in D major, op. 63, both of which compositions were well worth the careful preparation given. In the graceful movements of the Mozart quartet the playing of Mr. Adamowski and his associates was well calculated to meet satisfactorily the severest criticism, and some especially fine playing was done in the menuetta. The Gade quartet was given an equally good reading, and the delightful andante was made memorable by the faultless fashion in which it was interpreted. Both quartets were heartily enjoyed and the large audience showed its appreciation of the good work done by the player in a most pronounce fashion.

Miss Marguerite Hall was the soloist, and the charming manner in which she sang the old songs of "Phyllis," by Arne, and "Nymphs and Shepherds," by Purcell, quite won her audience, while her other numbers, "When Fairyland Was Young" and "O Swallow, Swallow," by Arthur Somerville, gave almost equal gratification.

Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 20, is the date of the next concert, and Mr. W. H. Sherwood will be the soloist.

SOUSA'S DESCRIPTIVE MUSIC.

In the first concert programme announced at Music Hall by Bandmaster Sousa's new military band, considerable prominence will be given to a new descriptive composition by Bandmaster Sousa called "Good-by," which depicts some imaginary experience in the organization in a remarkably clever way. It has created a great amount of fun wherever it has been played. The new band is now on the New England circuit, and makes its first appearance here at Music Hall next Sunday evening. It is made up of the best musicians in the country, and its concert here will be a revelation of the possibilities of a reed and brass band. The soloists to assist next Sunday evening are Mme. Marcella Linoh, a wonderfully brilliant colorateur singer; Sig. Galassi, the popular baritone; Sig. Liberati, the cornet soloist, and Sig. Rafayolo, the euphonium player.

GEORGE GROSSMITH IN NEW YORK.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 15, 1892. That delightful entertainer, George Grossmith, began his American tour in Chickering Hall tonight in a series of three humorous and musical recitals.

This was Mr. Grossmith's first appearance in New York, though his Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B., and other characters of Gilbert & Sullivan's comic operas were long ago well known to the amusement public of this country as unexcelled pieces of work. He was greeted as almost an old acquaintance, and there was every sign that this will not be the only visit that Mr. Grossmith will pay to New York; at least in his satirical monologue entertainments.

Of course, his art, which ought to be mentioned first, must have refinement, or it would not have completely captivated a representative audience as it did tonight. In his keen sense of humor, facial expression and apt illustrations he out-Americans Americans.

The programme was bright, and even hackneyed subjects were placed in a new light. The imitation of the young lady playing the piano caused a conservatory professor to laugh, and his rendering of an old fashioned Italian opera duet was so delicious in all details that the Wagnerites in the house placed him on a pedestal.

An imitation of the average society pianist was followed, for example, with a bright exposition of how some men compose music, taking Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" and manufacturing, or rather pounding it, into a waltz.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, November 16, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 16, 1892.

The Adamowski Quartet.

The first of a series of three subscription concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. This popular quartet is always sure to meet with an enthusiastic welcome from its audiences, and the concert was ushered in with considerable enthusiasm. The membership does not differ from that of last year. Mozart's quartet in G major, No. 12, was the first number played and the treatment of this well-known composition was most acceptable.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Adamowski Quartet

The Adamowski Quartet (Mr. Timothée Adamowski, Mr. A. Moldauer, Mr. Max Zach, Mr. Joseph Adamowski) gave its first concert of the season in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Quartet in G major, No. 12.
Arne: Phyllis.
Purcell: "Nymphs and shepherds."
Somervelle: "When fairy-land was young," "O swallow, swallow."
Gade: Quartet in D major, Opus 63.
Miss Marguerite Hall was the singer.

The ever beautiful Mozart quartet was excellently well played; but where the Quartet did its best work, perhaps the best it has ever done, was in the quartet by Gade. We are always glad to see this admirable composer, who at one time bid fair to be unduly forgotten here, figure on a programme. No matter who may have come up since the time when his works were standard parts of our current repertory, we cannot afford to lose his graceful, poetic genius. The quartet played by the Adamowskis is a fine example of him in his best mood, and all its varied beauties were shown forth in their true estate in the playing.

Miss Hall charmed her audience with her singing, as she did at her own concerts last week, albeit that on this occasion she made one or two slips from accurate pitch. But the beauty of her phrasing and her innate warmth of style were as admirable as ever.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDA

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last night for the second time this season. A large and enthusiastic audience listened to their superb rendering of an unusually interesting programme, in the make-up of which the modern school of orchestral composition was largely represented. The opening number was the overture to Karl Reinecke's opera "King Manfred," a work which, while not of striking originality, abounds in graceful melody and well-balanced orchestration. It afforded an opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's players to display their wonderful skill in shading, the point in which they particularly excel all other similar organizations. The second orchestral number was Edvard Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the four sharply contrasted movements of which were given with remarkable effect. The last movement, in which the imps and demons are supposed to chase Peer Gynt about through the halls of the mountain King, driving him to distraction, was redemanded. It is questionable musc, but undeniably effective in its demoniacal descriptiveness. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony (No. 3, in A-minor) made a brilliant and satisfactory finish to the evening's performance.

The soloists were Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincello. Miss White came practically "unheralded and unknown," and proved a most agreeable surprise. Her first number was the aria "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu, a showy bit of vocalization set to sacred words, in the singing of which Miss White proved herself to be a thoroughly capable bravura singer. Ophelia's death scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," which she chose for her second selection, is a rather ambitious flight for an ordinary soprano, as it is calculated to tax to the utmost the powers of the greatest prima donna. It may be said at once that Miss White not only successfully surmounted its appalling vocal difficulties, but displayed a high degree of dramatic ability, which, joined with her powerful and pleasing voice, stamp her as a singer of much more than ordinary gifts.

Mr. Schroeder played an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel in his usual finished and artistic manner. We have never had a better 'cello player than Mr. Schroeder, who is equally at home in the broad legarto style of playing and the rendering of brilliant tours de force. Mr. Nikisch accompanied him at the piano in the skillful manner which has made him almost as renowned an accompanist as conductor.

The concert as a whole was one of the best of the many delightful ones which the famous orchestra has furnished us. The programme was a well-balanced and thoroughly pleasing one, and it would be heard to imagine it better performed. The audience was thoroughly en rapport with the artists, and manifested their pleasure by the warmest and heartiest applause. The next symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 14.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1892.

The program of the fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra, November 12, was as follows:

Symphony, A minor.....Saint Saëns
Concerto for violin, F sharp minor.....Ernst
Humoresque for orchestra.....Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The feature of Saturday evening was the symphony by Saint-Saëns, and yet it is doubtful whether the audience appreciated fully this delightful work. Its workmanship is too fine, perhaps; there are no nerve shattering effects; there is no profoundity that is akin to bathos. The musician rejoices in the contrapuntal seriousness of the first movement, which is free from pedagogic baldness and severity. Saint-Saëns is too much of a man of the world to insist on his learning, just as he is too well bred to attempt to startle by sensational means. How simple and how beautiful is the short adagio! The scherzo is a charming example of French refinement and piquancy in melody, harmony and instrumentation; the finale is not merely a brilliant signature and flourish; there is something said, something that is worth the remembering. It is true that the work is free from volcanic emotion and the deep intellectuality that is the brother of dull obscurity. It is eminently sane. The thought is often expressed in epigrams. The composer does not hammer his ideas into the hearer by anxious repetition; he admits frankly that the hearer has intelligence. He is even content with suggesting in certain instances, and leaves the hearer to his own devices. There are no trombones, tuba or harp, and in the second movement the horns, trumpets and drums are silent. But when an instrument speaks it is with reason, and when it is delivered of speech its mission is accomplished and it is silent.

Humperdink is not a familiar name to students of music or concert goers. It is said that he is a Bavarian and a hard student. Like most professedly humorous pieces of music this humoresque is a cheap and dreary thing. It might not be out of place as a stopgap in the program of a German watering place Sunday afternoon entertainment, but it is not humorous in conception or in instrumentation. The suggestion of the march in Raff's "Lenore" is brought into juxtaposition with a reminiscence of Meyerbeer, but there is no point in the piece, and there is no reason why such a composition should be played in a symphony concert.

Mr. Adamowski played the Ernst concerto for violin, and although he was applauded loudly his performance was by no means beyond the reach of criticism. It is true that this vehicle for virtuosoship is a severe strain on the performer, and if the ancient saw is to be commended Mr. Adamowski is to be praised for firing his arrow at the sun. His intonation was not always pure, his tone was often thin and dry, and as a whole the concerto was beyond his capacity. As played by him the concerto seemed hopelessly old fashioned, and at the same time trivial and dull. We are told that Ernst produced a great effect with it, but Ernst was a remarkable violinist and we live under another musical consulship.

The orchestral numbers were played in the main exceedingly well, although a few exceptions might have been taken to the reading of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony; for the first theme was not given frankly, but with exaggeration in the observance and the interpolation of nuances. Mr. MacDowell will play the solo part of his A minor concerto for piano next Saturday, and the other numbers of the program will be Brahms' third symphony, the "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes" of Berlioz, and Liszt's "Tasso."

* * *

THERE are composers of more than ordinary talent and marked temperament who cannot brook a string quartet. They dream of color, they weave their day thoughts in colored stuffs, they plot color even when they appear unoccupied in street cars. They have been known to compare a string quartet to cold veal.

When there are musicians who are thus chilled or bored, it is a surprising fact that tickets for the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet are in eager demand in this city, and the concerts are apparently relished keenly. It is true that the ensemble playing is worthy of the highest praise, for it is distinguished by purity of tone, precision, admirable phrasing and artistic subordination of the players, one to each other; but artistic excellence or artistic perfection does not, unfortunately, compel popular appreciation. Nor are the men and women who, as pianists or singers, are advertised as assistants so unknown that the element of curiosity to be gratified enters into the problem. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Busoni, Sherwood, Jordan and Whiting are familiar names, and their deeds are already recorded in the chronicles of the town. The factor of individuality may be eliminated. It remains, however, that while to the great majority of concert goers a string quartet is an acquired taste, like unto olives or tomatoes, the Kneisel concerts are crowded, and the hearers wear the appearance of ineffable rapture in the exercise of a solemn function.

The second of a series of eight of these concerts was given Monday evening, November 7. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist, and the program was as follows:

Quartet, E flat, op. 19.....Lalo
Sonata for piano and violin, A minor.....Schumann
Quartet, D minor.....Schubert

The quartet by Lalo was heard for the first time in this town, and I am not able to find any notice of its performance in this country during the last ten years. It is not a grateful composition, and it has none of the elements of instantaneous popularity. With the exception of a few measures in the third movement, an allegro con fuoco, there is no hint or suggestion of the Spanish inheritance and French atmosphere that might well have influenced the composer. Born in Lille, of Spanish ancestors, Lalo studied with a German named Baumann, and he took his models from the other side of the Rhine. This quartet is not unlike his career—a steady working against obstacles. There is little thematic beauty or originality, and on the other hand there is a shunning of the commonplace, and perhaps a too fastidious turning of the back on anything that might at once tickle the ears of the hearer. The quartet sounds as though the man himself was addressing an audience with the sole purpose of performing a set duty prepared alike for praise or blame, careless of everything without himself. It is his face set to music—the face seen in the etching in Imbert's "Nouveaux Profils de Musiciens." Now this white haired, white bearded gentleman with a rigid stand up collar might be a retired stock broker, who lived in a pinched way because he paid every cent due his creditors, or a Don Quixote, who sought vainly his ideal in a café of the main boulevards; or a mugwump of the original pattern, who set his face against family traditions and enjoyed his temporary unpopularity. I have seldom heard a composition that was so devoid of sensuousness, or so free from any of the attributes of beauty as it is commonly rated. To be sure Thomas Hardy suggests that "it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempé may be a gaunt waste in Thule: human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a sombreness distasteful to our race when it was young." In this quartet, however, there is more of "the sand dunes of Scheveningen" than "the mournful sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain," which is "absolutely consonant with the moods of the more thinking among mankind." And at the same time the hearer respects the composer, though he is severe, inexorable and grim. He rubs his ears and asks if this is the Lalo of the pieces written for Sarasate, or the maker of the music of "Le Roi d'Ys."

It is perhaps needless to add that the playing of the members of the quartet was excellent throughout the evening, and the masterly performance of the second movement of the posthumous quartet of Schubert made a profound impression. Mr. Kneisel played the violin part of the Schumann sonata with taste, but Mr. Johns has neither the technic nor the temperament to play such music or to participate in concerts of so high a grade. His tone is dry, his piano is cottony, his forte is feeble clattering, and he does not atone for technical shortcomings by any pronounced display of musical "native moments."

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last night for the second time this season. A large and enthusiastic audience listened to their superb rendering of an unusually interesting programme, in the make-up of which the modern school of orchestral composition was largely represented. The opening number was the overture to Karl Reinecke's opera "King Manfred," a work which, while not of striking originality, abounds in graceful melody and well-balanced orchestration. It afforded an opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's players to display their wonderful skill in shading, the point in which they particularly excel all other similar organizations. The second orchestral number was Edvard Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the four sharply contrasted movements of which were given with remarkable effect. The last movement, in which the imps and demons are supposed to chase Peer Gynt about through the halls of the mountain King, driving him to distraction, was redemanded. It is questionable musc, but undeniably effective in its demoniacal descriptiveness. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony (No. 3, in A-minor) made a brilliant and satisfactory finish to the evening's performance.

The soloists were Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincello. Miss White came practically "unheralded and unknown," and proved a most agreeable surprise. Her first number was the aria "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu, a showy bit of vocalization set to sacred words, in the singing of which Miss White proved herself to be a thoroughly capable bravura singer. Ophelia's death scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," which she chose for her second selection, is a rather ambitious flight for an ordinary soprano, as it is calculated to tax to the utmost the powers of the greatest prima donna. It may be said at once that Miss White not only successfully surmounted its appalling vocal difficulties, but displayed a high degree of dramatic ability, which, joined with her powerful and pleasing voice, stamp her as a singer of much more than ordinary gifts.

Mr. Schroeder played an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel in his usual finished and artistic manner. We have never had a better 'cello player than Mr. Schroeder, who is equally at home in the broad legarto style of playing and the rendering of brilliant tours de force. Mr. Nikisch accompanied him at the piano in the skillful manner which has made him almost as renowned an accompanist as conductor.

The concert as a whole was one of the best of the many delightful ones which the famous orchestra has furnished us. The programme was a well-balanced and thoroughly pleasing one, and it would be heard to imagine it better performed. The audience was thoroughly en rapport with the artists, and manifested their pleasure by the warmest and heartiest applause. The next symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 14.

The Telegram.
EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Charms a Large Audience.

An hour and a-half of enchantment was experienced in Infantry hall last night by one of the fashionable audiences which always collects to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra go through one of its unsurpassable programs. This was the second concert in the course, and in some ways it was so unique that it will be a subject of delightful retrospection for the majority of those who attended.

While the program was not so heavy nor so gay as some Conductor Nikisch has prepared, it contained one number which independent of any surroundings, would almost furnish entertainment sufficient for an entire evening. This was the serious suite from "Pere Gynt," a strange musical production by Edward Grieg, which was offered as a sort of seasoning for the balance of the selections. The conspicuous parts of the suite were a funeral march, grandly played by the violins, and the closing section, a species of wild, flighty and unearthly music, such as fitly suggested the sport the imps were having with their terrified victim. This latter was cleverly carried from one stage of development to the next, the instruments increasing the volume of tone as the episode advanced, and flinging the air from one set to another, till finally the kettledrums and symbols burst in with short punctuating crashes, answered by the strings in unison, and a long and startling crescendo terminating in a quick, sudden wind-up by the band.

The other leading work was the symphony No. 8, in A minor, by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. The composer has entertwined some ideas which decidedly savor of Scotland and her jaunty ballads, and almost encourage the inference that Mendelssohn was actually undertaking to write a score expressly for the transmission of the sentiments of the bonnie Highlands. The program was introduced by the overture to "Koenig Manfred," Karl Reinecke, composer, in which some exquisite harp and trombone playing is arranged for.

Miss Priscilla White of Boston appeared as the vocal soloist, and if it should be her experience to again favor Providence with the charm of her fresh, strong and very tuneful voice, she will find a most friendly reception ready for her acknowledgment. She sang Grau's "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet," from "Der Tod Jesu," and Ophelia's dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. In both cases she completely captured her auditors, and held them as long as her throat gave forth its rich and mellow stream. Her high notes were perfect, true to the pitch, steady, smooth and powerful, or soft and pearly, as the circumstances required. A lack of passionate injection and of the snap and vigor which further study will impart, were the only salient points on which improvement could be asked, in order to make Miss White's work even all around.

Alwin Schroeder performed two 'cello solos, an andante from Molique and a capriccio by Klengel. The velocity, daintiness and beauty of the utterances he drew from the instrument was, in each particular, marvellous and electrifying.

The third concert will take place Dec. 14.

[44]

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Adamowski Quartet

The Adamowski Quartet (Mr. Timothée Adamowski, Mr. A. Moldauer, Mr. Max Zach, Mr. Joseph Adamowski) gave its first concert of the season in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Quartet in G major, No. 12.
Arne: Phyllis.
Purcell: "Nymphs and shepherds."
Somervelle: "When fairy-land was young," "O swallow, swallow."
Gade: Quartet in D major, Opus 63.
Miss Marguerite Hall was the singer.

The ever-beautiful Mozart quartet was excellently well played; but where the Quartet did its best work, perhaps the best it has ever done, was in the quartet by Gade. We are always glad to see this admirable composer, who at one time bid fair to be unduly forgotten here, figure on a programme. No matter who may have come up since the time when his works were standard parts of our current repertory, we cannot afford to lose his graceful, poetic genius. The quartet played by the Adamowskis is a fine example of him in his best mood, and all its varied beauties were shown forth in their true estate in the playing.

Miss Hall charmed her audience with her singing, as she did at her own concerts last week, albeit that on this occasion she made one or two slips from accurate pitch. But the beauty of her phrasing and her innate warmth of style were as admirable as ever.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, THURSDA

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last night for the second time this season. A large and enthusiastic audience listened to their superb rendering of an unusually interesting programme, in the make-up of which the modern school of orchestral composition was largely represented. The opening number was the overture to Karl Reinecke's opera "King Manfred," a work which, while not of striking originality, abounds in graceful melody and well-balanced orchestration. It afforded an opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's players to display their wonderful skill in shading, the point in which they particularly excel all other similar organizations. The second orchestral number was Edvard Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the four sharply contrasted movements of which were given with remarkable effect. The last movement, in which the imps and demons are supposed to chase Peer Gynt about through the halls of the mountain King, driving him to distraction, was redemanded. It is questionable musc, but undeniably effective in its demoniacal descriptiveness. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony (No. 3, in A-minor) made a brilliant and satisfactory finish to the evening's performance.

The soloists were Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincello. Miss White came practically "unheralded and unknown," and proved a most agreeable surprise. Her first number was the aria "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu, a showy bit of vocalization set to sacred words, in the singing of which Miss White proved herself to be a thoroughly capable bravura singer. Ophelia's death scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," which she chose for her second selection, is a rather ambitious flight for an ordinary soprano, as it is calculated to tax to the utmost the powers of the greatest prima donna. It may be said at once that Miss White not only successfully surmounted its appalling vocal difficulties, but displayed a high degree of dramatic ability, which, joined with her powerful and pleasing voice, stamp her as a singer of much more than ordinary gifts.

Mr. Schroeder played an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel in his usual finished and artistic manner. We have never had a better 'cello player than Mr. Schroeder, who is equally at home in the broad legarto style of playing and the rendering of brilliant tours de force. Mr. Nikisch accompanied him at the piano in the skillful manner which has made him almost as renowned an accompanist as conductor.

The concert as a whole was one of the best of the many delightful ones which the famous orchestra has furnished us. The programme was a well-balanced and thoroughly pleasing one, and it would be heard to imagine it better performed. The audience was thoroughly en rapport with the artists, and manifested their pleasure by the warmest and heartiest applause. The next symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 14.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1892.

The program of the fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra, November 12, was as follows:

Symphony, A minor.....Saint Saëns
Concerto for violin, F sharp minor.....Ernst
Humoresque for orchestra.....Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The feature of Saturday evening was the symphony by Saint-Saëns, and yet it is doubtful whether the audience appreciated fully this delightful work. Its workmanship is too fine, perhaps; there are no nerve shattering effects; there is no profoundity that is akin to bathos. The musician rejoices in the contrapuntal seriousness of the first movement, which is free from pedagogic baldness and severity. Saint-Saëns is too much of a man of the world to insist on his learning, just as he is too well bred to attempt to startle by sensational means. How simple and how beautiful is the short adagio! The scherzo is a charming example of French refinement and piquancy in melody, harmony and instrumentation; the finale is not merely a brilliant signature and flourish; there is something said, something that is worth the remembering. It is true that the work is free from volcanic emotion and the deep intellectuality that is the brother of dull obscurity. It is eminently sane. The thought is often expressed in epigrams. The composer does not hammer his ideas into the hearer by anxious repetition; he admits frankly that the hearer has intelligence. He is even content with suggesting in certain instances, and leaves the hearer to his own devices. There are no trombones, tuba or harp, and in the second movement the horns, trumpets and drums are silent. But when an instrument speaks it is with reason, and when it is delivered of speech its mission is accomplished and it is silent.

Humperdink is not a familiar name to students of music or concert goers. It is said that he is a Bavarian and a hard student. Like most professedly humorous pieces of music this humoresque is a cheap and dreary thing. It might not be out of place as a stopgap in the program of a German watering place Sunday afternoon entertainment, but it is not humorous in conception or in instrumentation. The suggestion of the march in Raff's "Lenore" is brought into juxtaposition with a reminiscence of Meyerbeer, but there is no point in the piece, and there is no reason why such a composition should be played in a symphony concert.

Mr. Adamowski played the Ernst concerto for violin, and although he was applauded loudly his performance was by no means beyond the reach of criticism. It is true that this vehicle for virtuosoship is a severe strain on the performer, and if the ancient saw is to be commended Mr. Adamowski is to be praised for firing his arrow at the sun. His intonation was not always pure, his tone was often thin and dry, and as a whole the concerto was beyond his capacity. As played by him the concerto seemed hopelessly old fashioned, and at the same time trivial and dull. We are told that Ernst produced a great effect with it, but Ernst was a remarkable violinist and we live under another musical consulship.

The orchestral numbers were played in the main exceedingly well, although a few exceptions might have been taken to the reading of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony; for the first theme was not given frankly, but with exaggeration in the observance and the interpolation of nuances. Mr. MacDowell will play the solo part of his A minor concerto for piano next Saturday, and the other numbers of the program will be Brahms' third symphony, the "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes" of Berlioz, and Liszt's "Tasso."

* * *

THERE are composers of more than ordinary talent and marked temperament who cannot brook a string quartet. They dream of color, they weave their day thoughts in colored stuffs, they plot color even when they appear unoccupied in street cars. They have been known to compare a string quartet to cold veal.

When there are musicians who are thus chilled or bored, it is a surprising fact that tickets for the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet are in eager demand in this city, and the concerts are apparently relished keenly. It is true that the ensemble playing is worthy of the highest praise, for it is distinguished by purity of tone, precision, admirable phrasing and artistic subordination of the players, one to each other; but artistic excellence or artistic perfection does not, unfortunately, compel popular appreciation. Nor are the men and women who, as pianists or singers, are advertised as assistants so unknown that the element of curiosity to be gratified enters into the problem. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Busoni, Sherwood, Jordan and Whiting are familiar names, and their deeds are already recorded in the chronicles of the town. The factor of individuality may be eliminated. It remains, however, that while to the great majority of concert goers a string quartet is an acquired taste, like unto olives or tomatoes, the Kneisel concerts are crowded, and the hearers wear the appearance of ineffable rapture in the exercise of a solemn function.

The second of a series of eight of these concerts was given Monday evening, November 7. Mr. Clayton Johns was the pianist, and the program was as follows:

Quartet, E flat, op. 19.....Lalo
Sonata for piano and violin, A minor.....Schumann
Quartet, D minor.....Schubert

The quartet by Lalo was heard for the first time in this town, and I am not able to find any notice of its performance in this country during the last ten years. It is not a grateful composition, and it has none of the elements of instantaneous popularity. With the exception of a few measures in the third movement, an allegro con fuoco, there is no hint or suggestion of the Spanish inheritance and French atmosphere that might well have influenced the composer. Born in Lille, of Spanish ancestors, Lalo studied with a German named Baumann, and he took his models from the other side of the Rhine. This quartet is not unlike his career—a steady working against obstacles. There is little thematic beauty or originality, and on the other hand there is a shunning of the commonplace, and perhaps a too fastidious turning of the back on anything that might at once tickle the ears of the hearer. The quartet sounds as though the man himself was addressing an audience with the sole purpose of performing a set duty prepared alike for praise or blame, careless of everything without himself. It is his face set to music—the face seen in the etching in Imbert's "Nouveaux Profils de Musiciens." Now this white haired, white bearded gentleman with a rigid stand up collar might be a retired stock broker, who lived in a pinched way because he paid every cent due his creditors, or a Don Quixote, who sought vainly his ideal in a café of the main boulevards; or a mugwump of the original pattern, who set his face against family traditions and enjoyed his temporary unpopularity. I have seldom heard a composition that was so devoid of sensuousness, or so free from any of the attributes of beauty as it is commonly rated. To be sure Thomas Hardy suggests that "it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempé may be a gaunt waste in Thule: human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a sombreness distasteful to our race when it was young." In this quartet, however, there is more of "the sand dunes of Scheveningen" than "the mournful sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain," which is "absolutely consonant with the moods of the more thinking among mankind." And at the same time the hearer respects the composer, though he is severe, inexorable and grim. He rubs his ears and asks if this is the Lalo of the pieces written for Sarasate, or the maker of the music of "Le Roi d'Ys."

It is perhaps needless to add that the playing of the members of the quartet was excellent throughout the evening, and the masterly performance of the second movement of the posthumous quartet of Schubert made a profound impression. Mr. Kneisel played the violin part of the Schumann sonata with taste, but Mr. Johns has neither the technic nor the temperament to play such music or to participate in concerts of so high a grade. His tone is dry, his piano is cottony, his forte is feeble clattering, and he does not atone for technical shortcomings by any pronounced display of musical "native moments."

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last night for the second time this season. A large and enthusiastic audience listened to their superb rendering of an unusually interesting programme, in the make-up of which the modern school of orchestral composition was largely represented. The opening number was the overture to Karl Reinecke's opera "King Manfred," a work which, while not of striking originality, abounds in graceful melody and well-balanced orchestration. It afforded an opportunity for Mr. Nikisch's players to display their wonderful skill in shading, the point in which they particularly excel all other similar organizations. The second orchestral number was Edvard Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the four sharply contrasted movements of which were given with remarkable effect. The last movement, in which the imps and demons are supposed to chase Peer Gynt about through the halls of the mountain King, driving him to distraction, was redemanded. It is questionable musc, but undeniably effective in its demoniacal descriptiveness. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony (No. 3, in A-minor) made a brilliant and satisfactory finish to the evening's performance.

The soloists were Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincello. Miss White came practically "unheralded and unknown," and proved a most agreeable surprise. Her first number was the aria "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet" from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu, a showy bit of vocalization set to sacred words, in the singing of which Miss White proved herself to be a thoroughly capable bravura singer. Ophelia's death scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," which she chose for her second selection, is a rather ambitious flight for an ordinary soprano, as it is calculated to tax to the utmost the powers of the greatest prima donna. It may be said at once that Miss White not only successfully surmounted its appalling vocal difficulties, but displayed a high degree of dramatic ability, which, joined with her powerful and pleasing voice, stamp her as a singer of much more than ordinary gifts.

Mr. Schroeder played an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel in his usual finished and artistic manner. We have never had a better 'cello player than Mr. Schroeder, who is equally at home in the broad legarto style of playing and the rendering of brilliant tours de force. Mr. Nikisch accompanied him at the piano in the skillful manner which has made him almost as renowned an accompanist as conductor.

The concert as a whole was one of the best of the many delightful ones which the famous orchestra has furnished us. The programme was a well-balanced and thoroughly pleasing one, and it would be heard to imagine it better performed. The audience was thoroughly en rapport with the artists, and manifested their pleasure by the warmest and heartiest applause. The next symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 14.

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Charms a Large Audience.

An hour and a-half of enchantment was experienced in Infantry hall last night by one of the fashionable audiences which always collects to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra go through one of its unsurpassable programs. This was the second concert in the course, and in some ways it was so unique that it will be a subject of delightful retrospection for the majority of those who attended.

While the program was not so heavy nor so gay as some Conductor Nikisch has prepared, it contained one number which independent of any surroundings, would almost furnish entertainment sufficient for an entire evening. This was the serious suite from "Pere Gynt," a strange musical production by Edward Grieg, which was offered as a sort of seasoning for the balance of the selections. The conspicuous parts of the suite were a funeral march, grandly played by the violins, and the closing section, a species of wild, flighty and unearthly music, such as fitly suggested the sport the imps were having with their terrified victim. This latter was cleverly carried from one stage of development to the next, the instruments increasing the volume of tone as the episode advanced, and flinging the air from one set to another, till finally the kettledrum and symbols burst in with short punctuating crashes, answered by the strings in unison, and a long and startling crescendo terminating in a quick, sudden wind-up by the band.

The other leading work was the symphony No. 3, in A minor, by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. The composer has entertwined some ideas which decidedly savor of Scotland and her jaunty ballads, and almost encourage the inference that Mendelssohn was actually undertaking to write a score expressly for the transmission of the sentiments of the bonnie Highlands. The program was introduced by the overture to "Koenig Manfred," Karl Reinecke, composer, in which some exquisite harp and trombone playing is arranged for.

Miss Priscilla White of Boston appeared as the vocal soloist, and if it should be her experience to again favor Providence with the charm of her fresh, strong and very tuneful voice, she will find a most friendly reception ready for her acknowledgment. She sang Grau's "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet," from "Der Tod Jesu," and Ophelia's dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. In both cases she completely captured her auditors, and held them as long as her throat gave forth its rich and mellow stream. Her high notes were perfect, true to the pitch, steady, smooth and powerful, or soft and pearly, as the circumstances required. A lack of passionate injection and of the snap and vigor which further study will impart, were the only salient points on which improvement could be asked, in order to make Miss White's work even all around.

Alwin Schroeder performed two 'cello solos, an andante from Molique and a capriccio by Klengel. The velocity, daintiness and beauty of the utterances he drew from the instrument was, in each particular, marvellous and electrifying.

The third concert will take place Dec. 14.

[44]

gallery.' He ended with a neat quotation from one of the operas with which his name will always be associated."

When it became positively known that Mr. Grossmith was going on tour, many of the leading London papers — and not a few of those supposed to be in the "know" — commented, in no measured terms, on the folly of giving up a certainty for the uncertainty of trying to amuse provincial audiences with an "Entertainment Show" which might be said to be dead and buried, one gentleman going so far as to assure him that he would find it very different work to playing leading parts in one of the principal London theatres, and ventured a prophecy that "Grossmith," before he had done three months of his tour, would be back in London asking Mr. D'Oyley Carte for a re-engagement. The only offer he received since then was from Mr. George Edwards, lessee and manager of the Prince of Wales Theatre, to give a recital nightly at a salary of £100 a week,— an offer Mr. Grossmith was compelled to refuse.

Although every one wished him success, yet few had the courage to predict a success. Happily, the prophets were disappointed; and Mr. Grossmith's career since that time has been one of uninterrupted prosperity.

Boston Gazette

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL—FORTY YEARS OLD.

A music-loving correspondent reminds the readers of the Transcript of the fact that the Boston Music Hall has just completed the fortieth year of its existence. It is an illustration of how rapidly and with how little heed from us Time flies along—and all the more rapidly as the hair blanches and the crows leave the imprint of their tell-tale feet on aging temples—so that there seems to be a much shorter interval between the date of the Summer-street fire and the present, than had passed between the opening of the Music Hall and the great catastrophe which at one moment threatened to include the Hall in its track. And yet the two periods are almost precisely the same — twenty years. The record for either space shows that the Music Hall has been used for a multitude of purposes. Indeed it would be a shorter task to name the sorts of public gatherings that have not been held within its walls. Music in every form has been heard there, from the simplest song to the most advanced form of grand opera, even opera with scenic equipments. "Absolute music" has been offered in all its types, from solos on every conceivable instrument, to its highest development in symphony. All forms of choral music, from part-song to oratorio, have been sung on its stage.

Not alone has music charmed the ear. Orators, preachers and lecturers innumerable have there defended a cause, extolled a hero, expounded a theory or elucidated a point in science, all for the good of their fellow men. The Music Hall has been by turns an arena where strong men have competed, and a religious temple where various tenets have been preached. We have turned from the meeting of a representative body (part of the session of a State constitutional convention was held in the hall) and have come back when many cats have mewed there or a vociferous assemblage of dogs has had its day. Yet larger quadrupeds, horses in fact, have been shown in front of the stern brow of Beethoven, and pedestrians have there competed in matches against time, or to test their endurance. What, indeed, has there not been heard or seen in the Music Hall? Its walls have reëchoed to the steps of the greatest and the meanest. Men and women whom all the world has honored for their achievements in art, science or literature have there been seen and heard; dignitaries high in councils of State or whose hands have swayed the rod of empire, princes, the heirs to crowns, grave mandarins from far Cathay, the wise of the oldest nations on the earth—every sort and condition of man have there sat and listened to speech or song. The history of the Music Hall has been, in fact, the history of an inn whose roof has been ready to shelter every comer, whether he reach it on foot or horseback, or be brought there in chair or chariot.

But if one thinks of the Music Hall only as a hall for music, and recalls the feasts of melody that have been spread there in these two score years, what a noble army of artists is reviewed in his mind! It is indeed a glorious privilege for one to remember that he has heard there Sontag, Alboni, Patti, Nilsson, Parepa, Lucca, Tietjens, Badiali and Formes; Thalberg, Jaell, Von Bülow, Rubinstein and Paderewski; Ole Bull, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Wilhelmj and Sarasate—to name but a few of the more brilliant stars and not to speak of a host of singers and players whose light has been dimmer only by comparison. He will recall with a sigh how many there are whose earthly notes have been silenced forever, and it will not be without some sadness that he will call to mind the changes that have come over the spirit of the management of its business reflected in the aspect of the inside of the hall—the disappearance of the great organ (whose stay, by the way, was also a period of twenty years, if one remembers aright—1863 to 1883), the construction of a hideous sounding board, before which the finikin white-fur rug for the conductor looks like a white necktie on a dirty shirt-front, the appearance on the walls for about half their height of a depressing drab. He will lament that the works of art in the hall have not been more worthily treated—the bronze Beethoven, originally the property of the late Charles C. Perkins, who bequeathed it to the Handel and Haydn Society; the Beethoven bust and bracket, the gift of Charlotte Cushman; its four companions are set in becoming prominence at the rear of the upper balcony, with the Apollo Belvedere, the property of the city of Boston, we believe, in their midst; and the group of portraits of Beethoven's friends which the late Gardner Brewer brought from Vienna. He will hope that the cheeriness of the hall in its old estate will be restored, and perhaps will allow himself to believe that bad business speculations with the symphony orchestra abroad will not be always at the cost of the home public. One more glance backward, and he will remember with gratitude that the idea of building the hall was urged to fulfilment, though not primarily inspired, by the visit of the queen of song, Jenny Lind.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 19, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was one work new to Boston on the programme of the fourth Symphony concert —a "Humoresque" by E. Humperdink. But if there was anything humorous about it, this must have been a kind of lucus a non lucendo illustration, to be found in the grotesqueness of expecting anything amusing to be derived from such a conventional and commonplace treatment of so trivial and meaningless a subject. There was here and there a pretty little suggestion of something like one of the countless "Patrol" marches, and that was all. The audience received it properly with the best and most chilling local indifferentism, which was certainly "one on" the programme-maker if he had expected the selection to elicit any signs of amusement. The evening began with Saint-Saëns' second symphony, which had never been heard before in these concerts, and was received with unqualified expressions of content. The standard form is almost always conserved, and the deviations from it are agreeable and commendable, as when the scherzo ends, after the introduction of its second part, with a sharp, bright chord like an exclamation point, and makes no return to the first part, or when the work begins promptly with a short allegro instead of the usual brief largo or andante. The slow movement is a gentle and beautiful romance, which lingers long in the ear and the sympathy, and the last is a bold and brilliant prestissimo which occasionally suggests a tarantella in its beat, although there is small reminder of the true Neapolitan flavor. There is neither audacity nor eccentricity in the work, and the composer has not availed himself in scoring of all the liberty which the full modern orchestra permits. Another symphony—Beethoven's second—was at the end of the programme, and was read in a becomingly conservative spirit. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, and chose Ernst's violin concerto in one movement, in F-sharp minor, opus 23. This composition, which might almost be called a fantasia upon an interesting and well-proportioned theme, suits well with the taste and style of Mr. Adamowski, whose chief elements are a soft, smooth cantabile and a bright, elegant ornamentation, but who does not excel in forcefulness or depth. He was in a good mood and played—albeit with too many great divergencies from exact intonation—excellently.

Tonight's concert will have no novelty, but it will bring forward Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who will play his own first pianoforte concerto. The rest of the programme is well known —Brahms' third symphony, the dances of the [illegible] wisps and sylphs from Berlioz's [illegible] and Liszt's turgid

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 1-16

Do they like Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Do they! They idolize it. Read what the "eminent critic" says: "I have been Tschaikowsky-ized ever since last Thursday night. Arthur Nikisch was to blame, for he gave the Russian master's E minor symphony at Brooklyn and the "Romeo and Juliet" here. Then Mr. Bachur, of Novello, Ewer & Co., sent me his firm's new edition of twenty-four song of Peter Illitsch and my madness was complete. I have literally submerged my Hoboken personality in the lava flood of passion which belches from the overture fantasy. What a man, what power, what sympathies, what a sostenuto imagination! How it strikes fire from the first firm chord! My head blazes after the "Juliet" theme, and I could love, love madly, the stars. Imperial passion, purple passion, flames about me and the violins mount in burning octaves. It is love made audible. When I get over it all I will fall back on Czerny Culmbacher and wax fat and apathetic. But how one lives in a few minutes of of such music! Little wonder Nikisch's face glows. It is as if a light were shining back of porcelain."

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

1-16

e.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, takes place at Infantry Hall this evening. Since its last visit the orchestra has appeared in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The orchestra this evening will be accompanied by Miss Priscilla White, a young soprano, whose delightful singing made a decided impression at the recent Worcester festival. Alwin Schroeder will also be heard in solos for the violincello. The program will be as follows: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; aria, "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet." Graun; suite, "Peer Gynt." Grieg; soli for violincello, (a), Andante, Molique; (b), Cappriccio, Klengel, Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; Symphony in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

gallery.' He ended with a neat quotation from one of the operas with which his name will always be associated."

When it became positively known that Mr. Grossmith was going on tour, many of the leading London papers — and not a few of those supposed to be in the "know" — commented, in no measured terms, on the folly of giving up a certainty for the uncertainty of trying to amuse provincial audiences with an "Entertainment Show" which might be said to be dead and buried, one gentleman going so far as to assure him that he would find it very different work to playing leading parts in one of the principal London theatres, and ventured a prophecy that "Grossmith," before he had done three months of his tour, would be back in London asking Mr. D'Oyley Carte for a re-engagement. The only offer he received since then was from Mr. George Edwards, lessee and manager of the Prince of Wales Theatre, to give a recital nightly at a salary of £100 a week,— an offer Mr. Grossmith was compelled to refuse.

Although every one wished him success, yet few had the courage to predict a success. Happily, the prophets were disappointed; and Mr. Grossmith's career since that time has been one of uninterrupted prosperity.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL—FORTY YEARS OLD.

A music-loving correspondent reminds the readers of the Transcript of the fact that the Boston Music Hall has just completed the fortieth year of its existence. It is an illustration of how rapidly and with how little heed from us Time flies along—and all the more rapidly as the hair blanches and the crows leave the imprint of their tell-tale feet on aging temples—so that there seems to be a much shorter interval between the date of the Summer-street fire and the present, than had passed between the opening of the Music Hall and the great catastrophe which at one moment threatened to include the Hall in its track. And yet the two periods are almost precisely the same — twenty years. The record for either space shows that the Music Hall has been used for a multitude of purposes. Indeed it would be a shorter task to name the sorts of public gatherings that have not been held within its walls. Music in every form has been heard there, from the simplest song to the most advanced form of grand opera, even opera with scenic equipments. "Absolute music" has been offered in all its types, from solos on every conceivable instrument, to its highest development in symphony. All forms of choral music, from part-song to oratorio, have been sung on its stage.

Not alone has music charmed the ear. Orators, preachers and lecturers innumerable have there defended a cause, extolled a hero, expounded a theory or elucidated a point in science, all for the good of their fellow men. The Music Hall has been by turns an arena where strong men have competed, and a religious temple where various tenets have been preached. We have turned from the meeting of a representative body (part of the session of a State constitutional convention was held in the hall) and have come back when many cats have mewed there or a vociferous assemblage of dogs has had its day. Yet larger quadrupeds, horses in fact, have been shown in front of the stern brow of Beethoven, and pedestrians have there competed in matches against time, or to test their endurance. What, indeed, has there not been heard or seen in the Music Hall? Its walls have reëchoed to the steps of the greatest and the meanest. Men and women whom all the world has honored for their achievements in art, science or literature have there been seen and heard; dignitaries high in councils of State or whose hands have swayed the rod of empire, princes, the heirs to crowns, grave mandarins from far Cathay, the wise of the oldest nations on the earth—every sort and condition of man have there sat and listened to speech or song. The history of the Music Hall has been, in fact, the history of an inn whose roof has been ready to shelter every comer, whether he reach it on foot or horseback, or be brought there in chair or chariot.

But if one thinks of the Music Hall only as a hall for music, and recalls the feasts of melody that have been spread there in these two score years, what a noble army of artists is reviewed in his mind! It is indeed a glorious privilege for one to remember that he has heard there Sontag, Alboni, Patti, Nilsson, Parepa, Lucca, Tietjens, Badiali and Formes; Thalberg, Jaell, Von Bülow, Rubinstein and Paderewski; Ole Bull, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Wilhelmj and Sarasate—to name but a few of the more brilliant stars and not to speak of a host of singers and players whose light has been dimmer only by comparison. He will recall with a sigh how many there are whose earthly notes have been silenced forever, and it will not be without some sadness that he will call to mind the changes that have come over the spirit of the management of its business reflected in the aspect of the inside of the hall—the disappearance of the great organ (whose stay, by the way, was also a period of twenty years, if one remembers aright—1863 to 1883), the construction of a hideous sounding board, before which the finikin white-fur rug for the conductor looks like a white necktie on a dirty shirt-front, the appearance on the walls for about half their height of a depressing drab. He will lament that the works of art in the hall have not been more worthily treated—the bronze Beethoven, originally the property of the late Charles C. Perkins, who bequeathed it to the Handel and Haydn Society; the Beethoven bust and bracket, the gift of Charlotte Cushman; its four companions are set in becoming prominence at the rear of the upper balcony, with the Apollo Belvedere, the property of the city of Boston, we believe, in their midst; and the group of portraits of Beethoven's friends which the late Gardner Brewer brought from Vienna. He will hope that the cheeriness of the hall in its old estate will be restored, and perhaps will allow himself to believe that bad business speculations with the symphony orchestra abroad will not be always at the cost of the home public. One more glance backward, and he will remember with gratitude that the idea of building the hall was urged to fulfilment, though not primarily inspired, by the visit of the queen of song, Jenny Lind.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 19, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was one work new to Boston on the programme of the fourth Symphony concert —a "Humoresque" by E. Humperdink. But if there was anything humorous about it, this must have been a kind of lucus a non lucendo illustration, to be found in the grotesqueness of expecting anything amusing to be derived from such a conventional and commonplace treatment of so trivial and meaningless a subject. There was here and there a pretty little suggestion of something like one of the countless "Patrol" marches, and that was all. The audience received it properly with the best and most chilling local indifferentism, which was certainly "one on" the programme-maker if he had expected the selection to elicit any signs of amusement. The evening began with Saint-Saëns' second symphony, which had never been heard before in these concerts, and was received with unqualified expressions of content. The standard form is almost always conserved, and the deviations from it are agreeable and commendable, as when the scherzo ends, after the introduction of its second part, with a sharp, bright chord like an exclamation point, and makes no return to the first part, or when the work begins promptly with a short allegro instead of the usual brief largo or andante. The slow movement is a gentle and beautiful romance, which lingers long in the ear and the sympathy, and the last is a bold and brilliant prestissimo which occasionally suggests a tarantella in its beat, although there is small reminder of the true Neapolitan flavor. There is neither audacity nor eccentricity in the work, and the composer has not availed himself in scoring of all the liberty which the full modern orchestra permits. Another symphony—Beethoven's second—was at the end of the programme, and was read in a becomingly conservative spirit. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, and chose Ernst's violin concerto in one movement, in F-sharp minor, opus 23. This composition, which might almost be called a fantasia upon an interesting and well-proportioned theme, suits well with the taste and style of Mr. Adamowski, whose chief elements are a soft, smooth cantabile and a bright, elegant ornamentation, but who does not excel in forcefulness or depth. He was in a good mood and played—albeit with too many great divergencies from exact intonation—excellently.

Tonight's concert will have no novelty, but it will bring forward Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who will play his own first pianoforte concerto. The rest of the programme is well known —Brahms' third symphony, the dances of the will-o'-the-wisps and sylphs from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and Liszt's turgid [illegible]

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date..... 11/16

Do they like Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Do they! They idolize it. Read what the "eminent critic" says: "I have been Tschaikowsky-ized ever since last Thursday night. Arthur Nikisch was to blame, for he gave the Russian master's E minor symphony at Brooklyn and the "Romeo and Juliet" here. Then Mr. Bachur, of Novello, Ewer & Co., sent me his firm's new edition of twenty-four song of Peter Illitsch and my madness was complete. I have literally submerged my Hoboken personality in the lava flood of passion which belches from the overture fantasy. What a man, what power, what sympathies, what a sostenuto imagination! How it strikes fire from the first firm chord! My head blazes after the "Juliet" theme, and I could love, love madly, the stars. Imperial passion, purple passion, flames about me and the violins mount in burning octaves. It is love made audible. When I get over it all I will fall back on Czerny Culmbacher and wax fat and apathetic. But how one lives in a few minutes of of such music! Little wonder Nikisch's face glows. It is as if a light were shining back of porcelain."

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

1-16

e.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, takes place at Infantry Hall this evening. Since its last visit the orchestra has appeared in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The orchestra this evening will be accompanied by Miss Priscilla White, a young soprano, whose delightful singing made a decided impression at the recent Worcester festival. Alwin Schroeder will also be heard in solos for the violincello. The program will be as follows: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; aria, "Lo, the Heaven Descended Prophet," Graun; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; soli for violincello, (a), Andante, Molique; (b), Cappriccio, Klengel, Ophelia's aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; Symphony in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

[45]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, November 22, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 12, was:

Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Opus 55. Ernst: Concerto for violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23. Humperdink: Humoresque for orchestra. Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 36. Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Mr. Adamowski gave a most careful and effective reading of the Ernst concerto, mastering its difficulties with skill. The Saint-Saëns symphony was quite a novelty, and enjoyable, although the gem of the evening was the Beethoven symphony, which was played with great spirit.

Last evening's programme was:

Soloist—Mr. E. A. MacDowell. Symphony No. 3, in F major, Brahms. Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in A minor, MacDowell. a. Menuet des Follets; b. Danse des Sylphes from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Liszt.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 20, 1892.

Echoes from the Symphony Concert.

The programme provided by Director Nikisch for yesterday's symphony concert was one of the most delightful of the season. It was admirably arranged and although no novelty was offered the selections given were most welcome and received rapt attention from the audience throughout a programme of uncommon length.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist, and the enthusiastic plaudits which greeted his appearance was pleasing evidence of the high regard which Bostonians very justly have for the talented composer and brilliant pianist.

He played his new concerto, No. 1, A minor, op. 15, in a superb manner. It is a charming composition full of melodious and original ideas. Full opportunities are given the solo instrument, and the orchestration shows the hand of a master.

Mr. McDowell has never been heard to better advantage, and he displayed the beauties of his composition with magnificent effect. After the performance he was recalled four times amid tremendous enthusiasm.

Braham's symphony No. 3, in F major, was finely interpreted by Mr. Nikisch. It was a rare treat for the admirers of Braham, who are evidently very numerous among symphony patrons, and who have often expressed the wish that Mr. Nikisch would give this composer much greater prominence on the season's programme.

Two movements from Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust," "Menuet des Feu-follets" and "Valse de Sylphes." Both were given with splendid effect. The interpretation of the latter was particularly graceful and dainty. Liszt's familiar but always welcome symphonic poem, "Tasso," concluded the concert, and was given, probably, as brilliant a performance as it has ever received in Boston.

Following is the announcement for the next concert: Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major. Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

——That the first of the Adamowski concerts at Chickering Hall Tuesday afternoon at 3 called out an audience very fine in quality which completely filled the hall, goes without saying, and the famous quartet never played better. Mrs. S. B. Field was the admirable accompanist in the vocal part of the programme. Among the subscribers for the series, most of whom were present, are Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Joseph Burnett and Miss Eleanor Burnett, Miss Fairchild, Miss Florence Lyman, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. Josiah Bradlee, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mrs. Francis Bacon, Miss Sampson, Miss Nichols, Miss Thomas, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. Robert F. Herrick and her sister, Miss Cora [illegible], Mrs. C. L. Shattuck and Mr. and Mrs. [illegible].

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Symphony No. 3, in F, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in A-minor, E. A. MacDowell; "Menuet des Feu-follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; and Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist. The novelty of the programme was his Concerto, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard before at these concerts. The other selections have been long familiar here, and are becoming somewhat tiresome by over repetition. Thus far, this season's programmes have not been especially attractive. It is true that they have presented new works by Humperdink and Scharwenka; but they did not prove to be of an order that imparted to the programmes quite that quality of freshness that is most to be desired. In short, the programmes aforesaid are falling into a dull, humdrum of repetition that is rapidly imparting to these concerts much of the distinguishing characteristic of that soporific realm known as boredom. It was Mr. Samuel Slick of facetious memory, who, if our own memory does not play us false, observed that there were some things, as well as others. It is a wise and an incontrovertible aphorism, and it is soothing and comforting to those who, oppressed and depressed by some things, can console themselves with the fact that there really are others. The concerts just now are running in the deep rut ploughed by some things. In other words, they are repeating too much of these same, some things. Under the circumstances, it may not be untimely to suggest a practical illustration of the truth of Mr. Slick's veracious saying. Of course, it is well enough to make the concerts educational, if it be deemed wise to do so; but at present the education is too much in one direction, and while we may be thoroughly, even superfluously educated in certain works of certain composers until we know them backward as well as forward, yet there are other works by other composers that are not wholly unworthy a hearing. The pedagogue who should confine his teaching of arithmetic to the calm and stately multiplication table, admirable in itself as a series of statements that carry their truth on their face, and indispensable as elementary knowledge, would cabin crib and confine his pupils within too narrow limits, and keep them in ignorance of other fully as important branches of the science. A little subtraction would be very useful in the programme, and if such blatant, vulgar pretentiousness as Liszt's "Tasso," or, in fact, Liszt's anything, were subtracted, the gain would be great. As far as addition is concerned, the less-familiar great works that are now neglected would supply that branch of the subject; and for division, if the programmes were more equally divided between the various musical nationalities, that branch of the study would be felicitously represented. Of the playing of the orchestra at this concert there is little but praise to be written. The Brahms symphony was read with exceeding effectiveness, though, perhaps, now and then with over-exaggerated emphasis. The Berlioz selections were given with rare beauty of finish and grace of sentiment. Mr. Mac Dowell's concerto is an admirable work, steadily brilliant, full of originality, and delightfully free from conventionality. The opening movement is fiery, and holds the attention from beginning to end. The themes are fresh and and effectively contrasted, and the whole movement is worked out in a masterly manner. The work is fairly divided between the solo instrument and the orchestra, and both are combined in a logical and well-balanced whole. The piano does not obtrude, and yet it fulfils the purpose of a concerto which is to provide opportunities for the player to manifest his skill. The orchestration throughout is rich, excellent in its variety and its play of fancy, and always discreet. The andante is charming in the warmth and poetic grace of its leading theme, and in the treatment throughout. The finale overflows with passion, and approaches its conclusion with a succession of well-conceived climaxes that become positively exciting as one overtops the other. The performance of the work by the composer was fine in its fluent technique, its frank honesty, its brilliancy and its genuine artistic sentiment generally. Both the work and the composer-player were an overwhelming success. The applause was the most enthusiastic of the season, thus far, and Mr. Mac Dowell was obliged to come forward three time to bow his acknowledgements. The programme for the next concert is: Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svensden, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

On Tuesday afternoon the Adamowski Quartet gave its first concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet in G, No. 13, Mozart; Quartet in D, op. 63, Gade, and the songs, "Phyllis," Dr. Arne; "Nymphs and Shepherds," Purcell; and "When Fairy-land was Young," and "O, Swallow, Swallow," A. Somervelle, which were sung by Miss Marguerite Hall. The lovely Mozart selection was played with excellent skill and an admirable sympathy with the grace, tenderness and underlying spirit of the work. The performers, however, were still better in their rendering of the clear, melodious and poetic Gade quartet. Save for an occasional undue obtrusiveness of the 'cello, and now and then a lapse from the pitch by the first violin the playing left scarcely anything to be wished for. Miss Hall's singing was in her best and warmest vein. Her rendering of Arne's charming "Phyllis" was especially graceful and intelligent, and the Purcell song was given with just the right swing, and with an artistic phrasing that was delightful in effect. The next concert will take place Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 20.

—— The last Symphony Concert drew a crowded and fashionable audience to Music Hall. Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, fresh and rosy after her summer in the mountains, was conspicuous in the right balcony, sitting between her husband and the fashionable pianist, Clayton Johns. Mrs. Gardner's seat was occupied by Miss Marie Grelaud, looking breezy, pretty, and animated. Mrs. Fiske Warren and Mrs. Arthur Foote still being unable to attend the concerts, Mrs. Inches and Mrs. Watson were easily the most attractive of the younger matrons present.

—— Mad. Nordica sailed for home yesterday. She will sing in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra and with the Handel and Haydn Society.

VOL. [illegible] NO. [illegible]

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER [illegible]

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

At the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, the soloist was Mr. E. A. MacDowell, and Conductor Arthur Nikisch again displayed his skill as a programme maker, as well as an interpreter of widely varying compositions.

The symphony was the third of the series by Johannes Brahms, a work which goes far to make amends for the shortcomings of the composer in the two preceding efforts in this class by this admired representative of the modern German school. The graceful melodious writing in the second and third movements was given an admirable interpretation by Mr. Nikisch, and the sharply contrasted and always brilliant ideas of the finale were splendidly shown in the reading given this movement. It was an always satisfying performance, and the symphony had a hearty appreciation by the audience.

Mr. MacDowell's performance of his first pianoforte concerto, a work which gained instant recognition as the effort of a born composer and skillful musician, when played at one of Mr. Lang's concerts four seasons ago, revealed all its beauties, and all who heard it were delighted by its well contrasted and ever melodious movements. The player's refinement of style, his delicate pearly touch and pure tone gave an indescribable charm to the andante, and the breadth of treatment given the final presto fairly demonstrated the wealth and ability as an executant possessed by this most satisfying artist. Recall after recall rewarded Mr. MacDowell, and he acknowledged the honors with his usual modesty.

Mr. Nikisch indulged his audience with some of the musical tit bits from Berlioz' "Faust," and fairly captivated his patrons by his faultless playing of the "Menuet des Feu-follets," and the "Valse des Sylphes."

A very brilliant performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" ended this most enjoyable concert.

The soloist next Saturday is Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, 'cello player, and the programme includes Dvorak's dramatic overture "Hussitska," Davidoff's concerto for violoncello, Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major.

[46]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, November 22, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert on Saturday evening, Nov. 12, was:

Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Opus 55. Ernst: Concerto for violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23. Humperdink: Humoresque for orchestra. Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 36. Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Mr. Adamowski gave a most careful and effective reading of the Ernst concerto, mastering its difficulties with skill. The Saint-Saëns symphony was quite a novelty, and enjoyable, although the gem of the evening was the Beethoven symphony, which was played with great spirit.

Last evening's programme was:

Soloist—Mr. E. A. MacDowell. Symphony No. 3, in F major, Brahms. Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in A minor, MacDowell. a. Menuet des Follets; b. Danse des Sylphes from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Liszt.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 20, 1892.

Echoes from the Symphony Concert.

The programme provided by Director Nikisch for yesterday's symphony concert was one of the most delightful of the season. It was admirably arranged and although no novelty was offered the selections given were most welcome and received rapt attention from the audience throughout a programme of uncommon length.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist, and the enthusiastic plaudits which greeted his appearance was pleasing evidence of the high regard which Bostonians very justly have for the talented composer and brilliant pianist.

He played his new concerto, No. 1, A minor, op. 15, in a superb manner. It is a charming composition full of melodious and original ideas. Full opportunities are given the solo instrument, and the orchestration shows the hand of a master.

Mr. McDowell has never been heard to better advantage, and he displayed the beauties of his composition with magnificent effect. After the performance he was recalled four times amid tremendous enthusiasm.

Braham's symphony No. 3, in F major, was finely interpreted by Mr. Nikisch. It was a rare treat for the admirers of Braham, who are evidently very numerous among symphony patrons, and who have often expressed the wish that Mr. Nikisch would give this composer much greater prominence on the season's programme.

Two movements from Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust," "Menuet des Feu-follets" and "Valse de Sylphes." Both were given with splendid effect. The interpretation of the latter was particularly graceful and dainty. Liszt's familiar but always welcome symphonic poem, "Tasso," concluded the concert, and was given, probably, as brilliant a performance as it has ever received in Boston.

Following is the announcement for the next concert: Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major. Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

——That the first of the Adamowski concerts at Chickering Hall Tuesday afternoon at 3 called out an audience very fine in quality which completely filled the hall, goes without saying, and the famous quartet never played better. Mrs. S. B. Field was the admirable accompanist in the vocal part of the programme. Among the subscribers for the series, most of whom were present, are Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Joseph Burnett and Miss Eleanor Burnett, Miss Fairchild, Miss Florence Lyman, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. Josiah Bradlee, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mrs. Francis Bacon, Miss Sampson, Miss Nichols, Miss Thomas, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. Robert F. Herrick and her sister, Miss Cora Taft, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck and Mr. and Mrs. Elliot W. Pratt.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Symphony No. 3, in F, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in A-minor, E. A. MacDowell; "Menuet des Feu-follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; and Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Lisst. Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist. The novelty of the programme was his Concerto, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard before at these concerts. The other selections have been long familiar here, and are becoming somewhat tiresome by over repetition. Thus far, this season's programmes have not been especially attractive. It is true that they have presented new works by Humperdink and Scharwenka; but they did not prove to be of an order that imparted to the programmes quite that quality of freshness that is most to be desired. In short, the programmes aforesaid are falling into a dull, humdrum of repetition that is rapidly imparting to these concerts much of the distinguishing characteristic of that soporific realm known as boredom. It was Mr. Samuel Slick of facetious memory, who, if our own memory does not play us false, observed that there were some things, as well as others. It is a wise and an incontrovertible aphorism, and it is soothing and comforting to those who, oppressed and depressed by some things, can console themselves with the fact that there really are others. The concerts just now are running in the deep rut ploughed by some things. In other words, they are repeating too much of these same, some things. Under the circumstances, it may not be untimely to suggest a practical illustration of the truth of Mr. Slick's veracious saying. Of course, it is well enough to make the concerts educational, if it be deemed wise to do so; but at present the education is too much in one direction, and while we may be thoroughly, even superfluously educated in certain works of certain composers until we know them backward as well as forward, yet there are other works by other composers that are not wholly unworthy a hearing. The pedagogue who should confine his teaching of arithmetic to the calm and stately multiplication table, admirable in itself as a series of statements that carry their truth on their face, and indispensable as elementary knowledge, would cabin crib and confine his pupils within too narrow limits, and keep them in ignorance of other fully as important branches of the science. A little subtraction would be very useful in the programme, and if such blatant, vulgar pretentiousness as Liszt's "Tasso," or, in fact, Liszt's anything, were subtracted, the gain would be great. As far as addition is concerned, the less-familiar great works that are now neglected would supply that branch of the subject; and for division, if the programmes were more equally divided between the various musical nationalities, that branch of the study would be felicitously represented. Of e playing of the orchestra at this concert ther is little but praise to be written. The Brahms sy hony was read with exceeding effectiveness, though, rhaps, now and then with over-exaggerated emphas s. The Berlios selections were given with rare beauty of finish and grace of sentiment. Mr. Mac Dowell's concerto is an admirable work, steadily brilliant, full of originality, and delightfully free from conventionality. The opening movement is fiery, and holds the attention from beginning to end. The themes are fresh and and effectively contrasted, and the whole movement is worked out in a masterly manner. The work is fairly divided between the solo instrument and the orchestra, and both are combined in a logical and well-balanced whole. The piano does not obtrude, and yet it fulfils the purpose of a concerto which is to provide opportunities for the player to manifest his skill. The orchestration throughout is rich, excellent in its variety and its play of fancy, and always discreet. The andante is charmin the warmth and poetic grace of its leading theme, and in the treatment throughout. The finale overflows with passion, and approaches its conclusion with a succession of well-conceived climaxes that become positively exciting as one overtops the other. The performance of the work by the composer was fine in its fluent technique, its frank honesty, its brilliancy and its genuine artistic sentiment generally. Both the work and the composer-player were an overwhelming success. The applause was the most enthusiastic of the season, thus far, and Mr. Mac Dowell was obliged to come forward three time to bow his acknowledgements. The programme for the next concert is: Dramatic Overture, "Hussitska," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra. Svenaden, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

On Tuesday afternoon the Adamowski Quartet gave its first concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet in G, No. 12, Mozart; Quartet in D, op. 63, Gade, and the songs, "Phyllis," Dr. Arne; "Nymphs and Shepherds," Purcell; and "When Fairy-land was Young,' and "O, Swallow, Swallow," A. Somervelle, which were sung by Miss Marguerite Hall. The lovely Mozart selection was played with excellent skill and an admirable sympathy with the grace, tenderness and underlying spirit of the work. The performers, however, were still better in their rendering of the clear, melodious and poetic Gade quartet. Save for an occasional undue obtrusiveness of the 'cello, and now and then a lapse from the pitch by the first violin the playing left scarcely anything to be wished for. Miss Hall's singing was in her best and warmest vein. Her rendering of Arne's charming "Phyllis" was especially graceful and intelligent, and the Purcell song was given with just the right swing, and with an artistic phrasing that was delightful in effect. The next concert will take place Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 20.

—— The last Symphony Concert drew a crowded and fashionable audience to Music Hall. Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, fresh and rosy after her summer in the mountains, was conspicuous in the right balcony, sitting between her husband and the fashionable pianist, Clayton Johns. Mrs. Gardner's seat was occupied by Miss Marie Grelaud, looking breezy, pretty, and animated. Mrs. Fiske Warren and Mrs. Arthur Foote still being unable to attend the concerts, Mrs. Inches and Mrs. Watson were easily the most attractive of the younger matrons present.

—— Mad. Nordica sailed for home yesterday. She will sing in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra and with the Handel and Haydn Society.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 143.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1892.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

At the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, the soloist was Mr. E. A. MacDowell, and Conductor Arthur Nikisch again displayed his skill as a programme maker, as well as an interpreter of widely varying compositions.

The symphony was the third of the series by Johannes Brahms, a work which goes far to make amends for the shortcomings of the composer in the two preceding efforts in this class by this admired representative of the modern German school. The graceful melodious writing in the second and third movements was given an admirable interpretation by Mr. Nikisch, and the sharply contrasted and always brilliant ideas of the finale were splendidly shown in the reading given this movement. It was an always satisfying performance, and the symphony had a hearty appreciation by the audience.

Mr. MacDowell's performance of his first pianoforte concerto, a work which gained instant recognition as the effort of a born composer and skillful musician, when played at one of Mr. Lang's concerts four seasons ago, revealed all its beauties, and all who heard it were delighted by its well contrasted and ever melodious movements. The player's refinement of style, his delicate pearly touch and pure tone gave an indescribable charm to the andante, and the breadth of treatment given the final presto fairly demonstrated the wealth and ability as an executant possessed by this most satisfying artist. Recall after recall rewarded Mr. MacDowell, and he acknowledged the honors with his usual modesty.

Mr. Nikisch indulged his audience with some of the musical tit bits from Berlioz' "Faust," and fairly captivated his patrons by his faultless playing of the "Menuet des Feu-follets," and the "Valse des Sylphes."

A very brilliant performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" ended this most enjoyable concert.

The soloist next Saturday is Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, 'cello player, and the programme includes Dvorak's dramatic overture "Hussitska," Davidoff's concerto for violoncello, Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major.

[46]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The compliment may be taken for what it is worth that the fifth Boston Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening had a programme of as nicely adjusted, balanced and enjoyable parts as it would seem possible to select from the work of Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt.

For any true music lover it was a privilege to be there even to enjoy an orchestral performance so high in standard, so marvellously artistic in its every detail, that it has not been equalled here even to the Boston symphony orchestra. A renewed experience with the symphony No. 3 in F Major by Johannes Brahms does not enhance the more or less favorable impression which a previous hearing of the work created here. Whatever question may arise as to the purely emotional enjoyment to be derived from the music, this is purely a question of taste; but it is a matter for congratulation that the work of at least one of the prominent composers of the present generation is void of all the impure practices which so often beset modern composers who attempt to produce a work in the highest instrumental form while dragging melody down to the veritable cesspool of their abnormal and eccentric ideas and inflated notions. True, the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat hazy and overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any genial relation to each other; but in this connection we have used the word appear, hoping that that a more familiar acquaintance with the music will remove the impression. The symphony as a whole displays wonderful spirit and intellectuality, yet does not justify the attempts that have been made to place Brahms' art in juxtaposition with the last rays of the Beethoven spirituality. The first movement is not only rich in thematic matter, but wholly interesting, its heroic first theme being followed by a charmingly idylic second subject. The hymn-like andante with the scholarly variations in attendance upon it, is especially delightful, in its second subject given out by bassoons, and clarinets and supplemented by an episode for strings, and repeated by wood wind.

The concerto by MacDowell with all its symphonic proportion and originality of contour will easily take rank with some of the most brilliant and effective of piano concertos by contemporaneous composers, and is undeniably indicative of its composer's possession of genius. The pianoforte part while it is in the full free and safe custody of the technician's own art, affording him every opportunity of presenting his chosen instrument as a veritable orchestra in miniature, is so exquisitely developed in its relation to the main body of the orchestra that the two elements often combine in a perfect display of artistic feeling. The whole first movement is extremely lavish in passages of piquant beauty. There can be no mistaking the concerto as a genuine and scholarly creation replete with the very best quality of instrumental coloring and just such episodes, side-thoughts and poetic conceptions as are characteristic of a truly classical work. Refinement, purity and dignity in musical art have, indeed, a prominent example in E. A. MacDowell, and there is within him, too, the rich inner soul-life of the true tone-poet.

Seldom has a modern concerto made so favorable an impression here. Its themes are fine and poetical in character on the one hand and entrancingly rhythmical oc the other. The logical clearness of their development in a homogenous whole is no less admirable than the varied sentiment that pervades the work—now lyric, calm and full of peace, now all on fire, now with heartfelt tenderness, while interwoven with as captivating fioriturі as can be found in any modern concerto. The andante has a prolific and at the same time sympathetic, thoughtful, and tranquil theme to which the variations closely adhere yet with an abundance of ingenuity and refinement of design that are exceedingly eare. A wide variety of light and shade, an enwarmed conception that rigidly subordinated itself to the technical requirements of the work and a masterly intelligence that held both technique and feeling under perfect control, contributed as a whole a performance so artistically impressive that it would be naught but sapiency to state wherein it could have been surpassed. His ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising of technical passages was no less creditable than was the swinging swaying bouyancy of his remarkable technique.

The concert closed with the Liszt symphonic poem "Tass," which produced no more favorable impression of the why and wherefore of its creation than it has done before. It is turgid and abnormal music against which the strongest objections that can be urged are that it contains little more than a very unwholesome compound of thematic fragments bearing no very logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the hearer soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier and more normal atmosphere which Franz Liszt's ever noisy music is so incapable of affording.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet made its first appearance this season in Chickering Hall Tuesday afternoon and with a programme that could but have proven highly acceptable to musical conservators. The performers were Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. A. Moldaner, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Joseph Adamowski. Miss Marguerite Hall also appeared with a choice variety of songs, the entire repertoire reading as follows: Mozart, quartet in G major, op. 12; Purcell, "Nymphs and Shepherds; Somerville, "When Fairy Land was Young," "O Swallow, Swallow"; Gade, quartet in D major. The concert had not a dull moment for such as were refined and cultivated listeners, or who, without being musical, might have entertained an adequate respect for a creation so imperishable as Mozart's quartet in E flat major or for the charming quartet by Gade, with all its inherent grace, melodiousness and ingenious architecture. The reverence and refined feeling with which each member of the quartet entered into the spirit of the Mozart selection resulted in a thoroughly loyal and artistic performance. Yet even more praiseworthy was the interpretation of Gade's ever welcome quartet in D major, opus 63. Here the musical mood of the four players was all that could have been wished and the excellence of their performanee was fully on a level with some of the very worthiest ensemble playing that has been heard here. In Miss Hall's singing there is more temperament than formerly. She has quite outgrown her early sentimentality and substituted instead a well-tempered warmth of feeling that is ever delightful.

C. L. C.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Boston may yet become as fond of Brahms as of Browning, judging by the enthusiasm which the performance of that master's third symphony created at the concert of Saturday. Hans Richter once called this symphony the "Heroic," and it certainly presents as much of combat as the Beethoven symphony which carries that name, and, as in that work, the combative, aggressive principle is represented by a short and very simple figure which appears in season and out of season, dominating and ruling everything. It is far more difficult to bring this character home to a general public, than to make them appreciate the pastoral beauties of a tuneful work like the second symphony by the same composer, and the triumph of the work therefore was all the more remarkable. But, as in Beethoven's third symphony the last two movements do not seem essentially heroic, so in this one finds the "Sturm und Drang" only in the first and last movements, while the other two give a well contrasted element of romance. The first movement was taken with enormous power, and one could heartily agree with this reading, but the tenderness of the second theme, in A flat, was lacking in some degree, and the work lost some of its contrast thereby. Brahms, as well as Beethoven, understood the truth of the poet's adage.

"Wo Starkes sich mit Mildem paaret
Da giebt es einen guten Klang."

The development of this movement may compare with anything of its kind. Just before his death, Dr. Hiller, most conservative of composers, said to the writer: "We have only one man who can write a true symphonic development at present—Brahms!" and when one hears the vague struggles of the other symphonists to squeeze thematic treatment out of their melodies, one can agree with the above dictum so far as to acknowledge the composer the symphonic giant of this generation.

In the first movement the brasses overblew occasionally, but the antiphonal effects between the wind instruments and the deeper strings in the slow movement were finely rendered. The simply scored and almost Mendelssohnian allegretto was a most effective contrast to the strife and fury of the finale. Yet this finale ends with a coda that is half tranquility and half exhaustion, a most unexpected conclusion that rather unfits the symphony to close a programme, and makes it appropriate as an opening number, as it was used on this occasion.

MacDowell's piano concerto in A minor came next, with the composer himself as soloist. To make a success in such juxtaposition, and to have the orchestration of a native work sound effective even when sandwiched between Brahms and Berlioz, was a triumph indeed. The first movement was fiery in the extreme and so difficult that once or twice the composer found difficulty in controlling the Frankenstein he had evoked. The treatment here, as in fact throughout the work, was essentially modern, and the piano frequently added fioritura to the themes appearing on the strings. There was a shade of reminiscence of the composer's teacher in the movement but it was Raff set on fire, and shining in a new and lurid light. In the second movement (Andante tranquillo) the piano daintily embellished a theme on the cello, there was most effective horn passages, some splendid pizzicati on the contrabasses (both of these last touches reminded a trifle of Weber and the effects in his "Freischuetz" overture) and the themes as well as their scoring and treatment were masterly. A series of responses between kettledrum and piano, the latter giving a brilliant preluding of the dimensions of a cadenza, led into the chief theme of the finale, a wild, whirling-dervish sort of a subject. A little of Raff peeped out here in a tonic-dominant figure (two notes only) which was exactly like a passage in the "Im Walde" symphony, but was too transient to constitute more than a suspicion of imitation. The movement was a fine climax to a brilliant work. Mr. MacDowell has more to say in his works than any of our younger American composers, and if he does not fall into the native error of writing too much, may yet be the head of the American school. No less a composer than Massenet spoke enthusiastically of his abilities in 1889. The work and the pianist aroused the audience to a whole succession of recalls.

Berlioz was represented on the programme by two light selections, the elfin music from "The Damnation of Faust." The minuet of the will o' the wisps was rather heavily played, and had not the ethereal lightness of its subject, but the coda with the Mephistophelian theme was brilliant and had perfect ensemble. The waltz of the sylphs was charmingly played, and the muted violins gave the theme with utmost sweetness; nor must Mr. Schuecker's harp playing be passed over without praise.

Liszt's "Tasso" is characteristic enough, even if it does not reach high water mark. It is pleasant to chronicle that the passion was not torn to tatters, and the apotheosis was grand without being overswollen. The bass clarinet, the trumpets and the strings did exceptionally good work in this number. The oboe was also prominent in brilliant work. But, excellent as was the performance, Liszt does not wear well; he always seems a Wagner of lesser potency, with attenuated ideas and intensified vehemence. The very Rheingold figure is to be found in "Tasso," but not with the wonderful harmony with which Wagner made two chords, say as much as an entire theme. The concert, as will be seen from the list (Brahms, MacDowell, Berlioz and Liszt) was entirely a modern one, and it was one in which our orchestra could not fail to shine.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1892.

The Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte No. 1.....MacDowell
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust".....Berlioz
I. Menuet des Feu-follets.
II. Valse des Sylphes.
"Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo".....Liszt

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

The first pianoforte concerto of Mr. MacDowell was played as an arrangement for two pianofortes in concerts given respectively by Mr. Gerrish and Mr. Whelpley during the season of '85-'86. Its first performance with orchestra in this country was at a concerto concert given by Mr. Lang, April 3, 1888, when Mr. Whelpley was the pianist. It has been played in European and American cities (1888-1891) by Teresa Carreno. Its first performance in public by the composer was the performance of last week.

Mr. MacDowell has shown in this concerto greater fidelity to the traditions, or the fetich, or the sane rules of form than in the greater number of his later compositions. This fidelity has not choked spontaneity, nor has it stiffened expression of thought. The themes are melodious and characteristic; nor are they merely agreeable echoes of the tunes of honored composers who guided his steps, or who, years ago, joined the quire invisible. Technical knowledge does not intrude itself; it is ever present, however, ever mindful of the good of the hearer, who does not wish to inquire too thoroughly into the causes of his enjoyment. The most genuine musical stuff is in the first movement; at the same time it would be vain to deny the beauty of the song of the andante, which is full of sentiment that is never sentimental, and romance that is always within the control of the dreamer. Nor is the last movement merely the dashing "Yours truly" with a flourish that is so often the conclusion of the whole matter. The interest is maintained without an anticipation of a climax, and even at the very close there is a suspicion of reserve strength. In this composition the orchestra and the pianoforte are not at war with one another; they unite in a harmonious whole that is alive and glowing with color. Mr. MacDowell is a pianist, and he knows how to write for his special instrument; he also knows the resources and limitations of orchestra instruments; above all, he knows the value of discretion in instrumentation. To speak quietly and in detail of the performance of Mr. MacDowell, the pianist, might be to play the part of churlish Shimei. Perhaps the most characteristic feature of his playing is extreme sensitiveness. In a small hall, where the musical fluid travels quickly, this sensitiveness tells promptly and with effect. In Music Hall it is a more difficult task for the performer to establish intimate relations with the hearer; and a certain exaggeration, which is foreign to the nature of Mr. MacDowell, brings out the contrasts of a work in bolder relief. It is enough to say that Saturday evening Mr. MacDowell gave a refined reading of an eminently poetic work. And not without good reason was he applauded enthusiastically and thrice recalled.

The other numbers are familiar to our concert goers, and need no words of comment. The concert might well have stopped with the delightful dream-fancy of Berlioz. The "Tasso," with its bombastic platitudes spun out to a dreary length, left a bitter taste behind. It is not necessary to dismiss an audience with a roar and a crash, a jingling and a bray. The orchestra played, in the main, exceedingly well. There were ragged passages in the second movement of the symphony, and an occasional lack of precision in the concerto, but the first movement and the last of the symphony were given with infinite spirit and with genuine appreciation, and in the fantastical pranks of Berlioz, as well as in the circus pomp of Liszt, the orchestra was admirable.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1892.

A varied programme was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and, while nearly all the numbers were familiar to the patrons of these entertainments, the selections are always well received. The programme consisted of Brahm's symphony in F, which was rendered effectively, with Mr. Nikisch's peculiar though pleasing reading. Then followed numbers from Berlioz's "Faust," which were evidently enjoyed by the audience, and, indeed, were finished and artistic in their rendering. The closing number was Liszt's familiar "Tasso." The feature of the entertainment was the pianoforte playing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell. He played a concerto of his own, which he gave in a most brilliant style, with taking originality of theme and an artistic working out of musical ideas. All the movements were most enthusiastically received. The programme for next Saturday evening will be dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svensden, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

Date..... 11-21

Boston Symphony Concert.

Fresh from their recent unprecedented successes, both artistically and financially in New York and other cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last evening in the second concert of the series. Taken as a whole it cannot be said that the program was as happily chosen as that of the first concert, although it contained much that was both interesting and delightful. The most noticeable feature of the orchestra, and that which is its chiefest merit, is the absolute responsiveness to the wishes and intentions of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch imbues the orchestra with his own individuality so that the effect of its work is as one grand instrument in the hands of this great leader. The opening number of the program was the Overture to "Keonig Manfred," by Karl Reinecke, a composition which is not wanting either in melody or harmony. The introduction is charming in its seriousness and rather at variance with the customary overture-form, but the allegro is rapidly developed on the traditional lines. It was rendered last evening with that delicacy and precision for which these players are noted. The aria "Lo, the heaven-descended prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's oratorio "Der Tod Jesu," was delightfully rendered by Miss Priscilla White, who possesses a pure soprano voice, light, musical and of good range; its flexibility was apparent in the cadenza passages. Miss White was seemingly somewhat nervous, which was noticeable in the lack of breath control. In the dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas, she appeared to better advantage, her thrills and runs being, with few exceptions, clean and true. In the orchestral accompaniments to these numbers the full orchestra was employed only in the first aria, and it is pleasant to note that Mr. Nikisch kept the tone subdued throughout, which cannot always be said of him.

The Grieg Suite from "Paer Gynt" was apparently the most enjoyed by the large audience present. It is not unfamiliar to the concert goers here, and is a work full of beauty, dainty and charming in the opening movement, solemn and impressive in the second, a funeral march for string orchestra, and in the final movement, which Mr. Nikisch was obliged to repeat, wild and weird in effect.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, was heard in an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel. His rendering of these numbers, although finished and artistic in style, as his playing always is, yet was as a whole rather disappointing, being at times faulty and lacking in rich tonal quality.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3, in A minor, was beautifully rendered. Different from most works of this kind it was written to be played without pause between the movements, thus giving the effect of a continuous whole. The first theme is a melody of a rather sombre and melancholy cast. A tender and plaintive subsidiary theme follows leading back to the andante of the introduction. The quality of the flutes, horns and bassoons heard in the passage connecting this serious movement with the scherzo was magnificent. It is needless to analyze the work, theme by theme; it is, as a whole, the expression of the romantic and poetic phases of Scotch life and was a fitting close to a very enjoyable concert. The next symphony will be given Wednesday, Dec. 14.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date..... 11-18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth concert of the current series Saturday afternoon and Saturday night. This is the program: Brahms's third symphony; MacDowell's first pianoforte concerto, with the composer for solo player; "Minuet of the Fire Flies" and "Dance of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust;" Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." MacDowell is the present instructor in piano of two of our Auburn pianists. Miss Merrill of Auburn has studied piano under MacDowell for two years past.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 145.

TUESDAY, NOV. 22, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet gave their third concert last night in Chickering Hall, assisted by Pianist William H. Sherwood. Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann were the composers.

Sherwood's touch was never more vital and never more sure than in the Schumann quintet. They all played together, and with high artistic finish.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1892.

The third of the series of concerts of Mr. Kneisel and his quartet was rendered to a delighted and charmed audience at Chickering Hall last evening. Mr. Kneisel had the valuable assistance of Mr. William H. Sherwood, who was given a most flattering reception. The programme in detail was: Quartet in E flat, Mozart, four movements—allegro-andante-allegretto and allegro vivace, exquisitely rendered; quartet in F minor, Beethoven, five movements—allegro con brio, allegretto ma non troppo, allegro assai vivace ma scrioso, larghetto espressiov and allegretto agitato, masterly given with brilliant first violin parts, giving Mr. Kneisel ample scope for his wonderful talent; piano quintet in E flat major, Schumann, four movements—allegro brilliante, in modo d'una marcia, scherzo, allegro ma non troppo, powerfully rendered. Mr. Sherwood and the quartet as one in performing this [47]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 20, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

The compliment may be taken for what it is worth that the fifth Boston Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening had a programme of as nicely adjusted, balanced and enjoyable parts as it would seem possible to select from the work of Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt.

For any true music lover it was a privilege to be there even to enjoy an orchestral performance so high in standard, so marvellously artistic in its every detail, that it has not been equalled here even to the Boston symphony orchestra. A renewed experience with the symphony No. 3 in F Major by Johannes Brahms does not enhance the more or less favorable impression which a previous hearing of the work created here. Whatever question may arise as to the purely emotional enjoyment to be derived from the music, this is purely a question of taste; but it is a matter for congratulation that the work of at least one of the prominent composers of the present generation is void of all the impure practices which so often beset modern composers who attempt to produce a work in the highest instrumental form while dragging melody down to the veritable cesspool of their abnormal and eccentric ideas and inflated notions. True, the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat hazy and overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any genial relation to each other; but in this connection we have used the word appear, hoping that that a more familiar acquaintance with the music will remove the impression. The symphony as a whole displays wonderful spirit and intellectuality, yet does not justify the attempts that have been made to place Brahms' art in juxtaposition with the last rays of the Beethoven spirituality. The first movement is not only rich in thematic matter, but wholly interesting, its heroic first theme being followed by a charmingly idylic second subject. The hymn-like andante with the scholarly variations in attendance upon it, is especially delightful, in its second subject given out by bassoons, and clarinets and supplemented by an episode for strings, and repeated by wood wind.

The concerto by MacDowell with all its symphonic proportion and originality of contour will easily take rank with some of the most brilliant and effective of piano concertos by contemporaneous composers, and is undeniably indicative of its composer's possession of genius. The pianoforte part while it is in the full free and safe custody of the technician's own art, affording him every opportunity of presenting his chosen instrument as a veritable orchestra in miniature, is so exquisitely developed in its relation to the main body of the orchestra that the two elements often combine in a perfect display of artistic feeling. The whole first movement is extremely lavish in passages of piquant beauty. There can be no mistaking the concerto as a genuine and scholarly creation replete with the very best quality of instrumental coloring and just such episodes, side-thoughts and poetic conceptions as are characteristic of a truly classical work. Refinement, purity and dignity in musical art have, indeed, a prominent example in E. A. MacDowell, and there is within him, too, the rich inner soul-life of the true tone-poet.

Seldom has a modern concerto made so favorable an impression here. Its themes are fine and poetical in character on the one hand and entrancingly rhythmical oc the other. The logical clearness of their development in a homogenous whole is no less admirable than the varied sentiment that pervades the work—now lyric, calm and full of peace, now all on fire, now with heartfelt tenderness, while interwoven with as captivating fioriturі as can be found in any modern concerto. The andante has a prolific and at the same time sympathetic, thoughtful, and tranquil theme to which the variations closely adhere yet with an abundance of ingenuity and refinement of design that are exceedingly eare. A wide variety of light and shade, an enwarmed conception that rigidly subordinated itself to the technical requirements of the work and a masterly intelligence that held both technique and feeling under perfect control, contributed as a whole a performance so artistically impressive that it would be naught but sapiency to state wherein it could have been surpassed. His ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising of technical passages was no less creditable than was the swinging swaying bouyancy of his remarkable technique.

The concert closed with the Liszt symphonic poem "Tass," which produced no more favorable impression of the why and wherefore of its creation than it has done before. It is turgid and abnormal music against which the strongest objections that can be urged are that it contains little more than a very unwholesome compound of thematic fragments bearing no very logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the hearer soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier and more normal atmosphere which Franz Liszt's ever noisy music is so incapable of affording.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet made its first appearance this season in Chickering Hall Tuesday afternoon and with a programme that could but have proven highly acceptable to musical conservators. The performers were Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. A. Moldaner, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Joseph Adamowski. Miss Marguerite Hall also appeared with a choice variety of songs, the entire repertoire reading as follows: Mozart, quartet in G major, op. 12; Purcell, "Nymphs and Shepherds; Somerville, "When Fairy Land was Young," "O Swallow, Swallow"; Gade, quartet in D major. The concert had not a dull moment for such as were refined and cultivated listeners, or who, without being musical, might have entertained an adequate respect for a creation so imperishable as Mozart's quartet in E flat major or for the charming quartet by Gade, with all its inherent grace, melodiousness and ingenious architecture. The reverence and refined feeling with which each member of the quartet entered into the spirit of the Mozart selection resulted in a thoroughly loyal and artistic performance. Yet even more praiseworthy was the interpretation of Gade's ever welcome quartet in D major, opus 63. Here the musical mood of the four players was all that could have been wished and the excellence of their performanee was fully on a level with some of the very worthiest ensemble playing that has been heard here. In Miss Hall's singing there is more temperament than formerly. She has quite outgrown her early sentimentality and substituted instead a well-tempered warmth of feeling that is ever delightful.

C. L. C.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

Boston may yet become as fond of Brahms as of Browning, judging by the enthusiasm which the performance of that master's third symphony created at the concert of Saturday. Hans Richter once called this symphony the "Heroic," and it certainly presents as much of combat as the Beethoven symphony which carries that name, and, as in that work, the combative, aggressive principle is represented by a short and very simple figure which appears in season and out of season, dominating and ruling everything. It is far more difficult to bring this character home to a general public, than to make them appreciate the pastoral beauties of a tuneful work like the second symphony by the same composer, and the triumph of the work therefore was all the more remarkable. But, as in Beethoven's third symphony the last two movements do not seem essentially heroic, so in this one finds the "Sturm und Drang" only in the first and last movements, while the other two give a well contrasted element of romance. The first movement was taken with enormous power, and one could heartily agree with this reading, but the tenderness of the second theme, in A flat, was lacking in some degree, and the work lost some of its contrast thereby. Brahms, as well as Beethoven, understood the truth of the poet's adage.

"Wo Starkes sich mit Mildem paaret
Da giebt es einen guten Klang."

The development of this movement may compare with anything of its kind. Just before his death, Dr. Hiller, most conservative of compo-ers, said to the writer: "We have only one man who can write a true symphonic development at present—Brahms!" and when one hears the vague struggles of the other symphonists to squeeze thematic treatment out of their melodies, one can agree with the above dictum so far as to acknowledge the composer the symphonic giant of this generation.

In the first movement the brasses overblew occasionally, but the antiphonal effects between the wind instruments and the deeper strings in the slow movement were finely rendered. The simply scored and almost Mendelssohnian allegretto was a most effective contrast to the strife and fury of the finale. Yet this finale ends with a coda that is half tranquility and half exhaustion, a most unexpected conclusion that rather unfits the symphony to close a programme, and makes it appropriate as an opening number, as it was used on this occasion.

MacDowell's piano concerto in A minor came next, with the composer himself as soloist. To make a success in such juxtaposition, and to have the orchestration of a native work sound effective even when sandwiched between Brahms and Berlioz, was a triumph indeed. The first movement was fiery in the extreme and so difficult that once or twice the composer found difficulty in controlling the Frankenstein he had evoked. The treatment here, as in fact throughout the work, was essentially modern, and the piano frequently added fioritura to the themes appearing on the strings. There was a shade of reminiscence of the composer's teacher in the movement but it was Raff set on fire, and shining in a new and lurid light. In the second movement (Andante tranquillo) the piano daintily embellished a theme on the cello, there was most effective horn passages, some splendid pizzicati on the contrabasses (both of these last touches reminded a trifle of Weber and the effects in his "Freischuetz" overture) and the themes as well as their scoring and treatment were masterly. A series of responses between kettledrum and piano, the latter giving a brilliant preluding of the dimensions of a cadenza, led into the chief theme of the finale, a wild, whirling-dervish sort of a subject. A little of Raff peeped out here in a tonic-dominant figure (two notes only) which was exactly like a passage in the "Im Walde" symphony, but was too transient to constitute more than a suspicion of imitation. The movement was a fine climax to a brilliant work. Mr. MacDowell has more to say in his works than any of our younger American composers, and if he does not fall into the native error of writing too much, may yet be the head of the American school. No less a composer than Massenet spoke enthusiastically of his abilities in 1889. The work and the pianist aroused the audience to a whole succession of recalls.

Berlioz was represented on the programme by two light selections, the elfin music from "The Damnation of Faust." The minuet of the will o' the wisps was rather heavily played, and had not the ethereal lightness of its subject, but the coda with the Mephistophelian theme was brilliant and had perfect ensemble. The waltz of the sylphs was charmingly played, and the muted violins gave the theme with utmost sweetness; nor must Mr. Schuecker's harp playing be passed over without praise.

Liszt's "Tasso" is characteristic enough, even if it does not reach high water mark. It is pleasant to chronicle that the passion was not torn to tatters, and the apotheosis was grand without being overswollen. The bass clarinet, the trumpets and the strings did exceptionally good work in this number. The oboe was also prominent in brilliant work. But, excellent as was the performance, Liszt does not wear well; he always seems a Wagner of lesser potency, with attenuated ideas and intensified vehemence. The very Rheingold figure is to be found in "Tasso," but not with the wonderful harmony with which Wagner made two chords, say as much as an entire theme. The concert, as will be seen from the list (Brahms, MacDowell, Berlioz and Liszt) was entirely a modern one, and it was one in which our orchestra could not fail to shine.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1892.

The Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte No. 1.....MacDowell
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust"..Berlioz
I. Menuet des Feu-follets.
II. Valse des Sylphes.
"Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo".....Liszt

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

The first pianoforte concerto of Mr. MacDowell was played as an arrangement for two pianofortes in concerts given respectively by Mr. Gerrish and Mr. Whelpley during the season of '85-'86. Its first performance with orchestra in this country was at a concerto concert given by Mr. Lang, April 3, 1888, when Mr. Whelpley was the pianist. It has been played in European and American cities (1888-1891) by Teresa Carreno. Its first performance in public by the composer was the performance of last week.

***

Mr. MacDowell has shown in this concerto greater fidelity to the traditions, or the fetich, or the sane rules of form than in the greater number of his later compositions. This fidelity has not choked spontaneity, nor has it stiffened expression of thought. The themes are melodious and characteristic; nor are they merely agreeable echoes of the tunes of honored composers who guided his steps, or who, years ago, joined the quire invisible. Technical knowledge does not intrude itself; it is ever present, however, ever mindful of the good of the hearer, who does not wish to inquire too thoroughly into the causes of his enjoyment. The most genuine musical stuff is in the first movement; at the same time it would be vain to deny the beauty of the song of the andante, which is full of sentiment that is never sentimental, and romance that is always within the control of the dreamer. Nor is the last movement merely the dashing "Yours truly" with a flourish that is so often the conclusion of the whole matter. The interest is maintained without an anticipation of a climax, and even at the very close there is a suspicion of reserve strength. In this composition the orchestra and the pianoforte are not at war with one another; they unite in a harmonious whole that is alive and glowing with color. Mr. MacDowell is a pianist, and he knows how to write for his special instrument; he also knows the resources and limitations of orchestra instruments; above all, he knows the value of discretion in instrumentation. To speak quietly and in detail of the performance of Mr. MacDowell, the pianist, might be to play the part of churlish Shimei. Perhaps the most characteristic feature of his playing is extreme sensitiveness. In a small hall, where the musical fluid travels quickly, this sensitiveness tells promptly and with effect. In Music Hall it is a more difficult task for the performer to establish intimate relations with the hearer; and a certain exaggeration, which is foreign to the nature of Mr. MacDowell, brings out the contrasts of a work in bolder relief. It is enough to say that Saturday evening Mr. MacDowell gave a refined reading of an eminently poetic work. And not without good reason was he applauded enthusiastically and thrice recalled.

***

The other numbers are familiar to our concert goers, and need no words of comment. The concert might well have stopped with the delightful dream-fancy of Berlioz. The "Tasso," with its bombastic platitudes spun out to a dreary length, left a bitter taste behind. It is not necessary to dismiss an audience with a roar and a crash, a jingling and a bray. The orchestra played, in the main, exceedingly well. There were ragged passages in the second movement of the symphony, and an occasional lack of precision in the concerto, but the first movement and the last of the symphony were given with infinite spirit and with genuine appreciation, and in the fantastical pranks of Berlioz, as well as in the circus pomp of Liszt, the orchestra was admirable.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1892.

A varied programme was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and, while nearly all the numbers were familiar to the patrons of these entertainments, the selections are always well received. The programme consisted of Brahm's symphony in F, which was rendered effectively, with Mr. Nikisch's peculiar though pleasing reading. Then followed numbers from Berlioz's "Faust," which were evidently enjoyed by the audience, and, indeed, were finished and artistic in their rendering. The closing number was Liszt's familiar "Tasso." The feature of the entertainment was the pianoforte playing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell. He played a concerto of his own, which he gave in a most brilliant style, with taking originality of theme and an artistic working out of musical ideas. All the movements were most enthusiastically received. The programme for next Saturday evening will be dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svensden, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

NEWS, Providence, R. I.

Date.....11-17.....

Boston Symphony Concert.

Fresh from their recent unprecedented successes, both artistically and financially in New York and other cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last evening in the second concert of the series. Taken as a whole it cannot be said that the program was as happily chosen as that of the first concert, although it contained much that was both interesting and delightful. The most noticeable feature of the orchestra, and that which is its chiefest merit, is the absolute responsiveness to the wishes and intentions of its conductor. Mr. Nikisch imbues the orchestra with his own individuality so that the effect of its work is as one grand instrument in the hands of this great leader. The opening number of the program was the Overture to "Keonig Manfred," by Karl Reinecke, a composition which is not wanting either in melody or harmony. The introduction is charming in its seriousness and rather at variance with the customary overture-form, but the allegro is rapidly developed on the traditional lines. It was rendered last evening with that delicacy and precision for which these players are noted. The aria "Lo, the heaven-descended prophet," from Karl Heinrich Graun's oratorio "Der Tod Jesu," was delightfully rendered by Miss Priscilla White, who possesses a pure soprano voice, light, musical and of good range; its flexibility was apparent in the cadenza passages. Miss White was seemingly somewhat nervous, which was noticeable in the lack of breath control. In the dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas, she appeared to better advantage, her thrills and runs being, with few exceptions, clean and true. In the orchestral accompaniments to these numbers the full orchestra was employed only in the first aria, and it is pleasant to note that Mr. Nikisch kept the tone subdued throughout, which cannot always be said of him.

The Grieg Suite from "Peer Gynt" was apparently the most enjoyed by the large audience present. It is not unfamiliar to the concert goers here, and is a work full of beauty, dainty and charming in the opening movement, solemn and impressive in the second, a funeral march for string orchestra, and in the final movement, which Mr. Nikisch was obliged to repeat, wild and weird in effect.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, was heard in an andante by Molique and a capriccioso by Klengel. His rendering of these numbers, although finished and artistic in style, as his playing always is, yet was as a whole rather disappointing, being at times faulty and lacking in rich tonal quality.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3, in A minor, was beautifully rendered. Different from most works of this kind it was written to be played without pause between the movements, thus giving the effect of a continuous whole. The first theme is a melody of a rather sombre and melancholy cast. A tender and plaintive subsidiary theme follows leading back to the andaute of the introduction. The quality of the flutes, horns and bassoons heard in the passage connecting this serious movement with the scherzo was magnificent. It is needless to analyze the work, theme by theme; it is, as a whole, the expression of the romantic and poetic phases of Scotch life and was a fitting close to a very enjoyable concert. The next symphony will be given Wednesday, Dec. 14.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth concert of the current series Saturday afternoon and Saturday night. This is the program: Brahms's third symphony; MacDowell's first pianoforte concerto, with the composer for solo player; "Minuet of the Fire Flies" and "Dance of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust;" Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." MacDowell is the present instructor in piano of two of our Auburn pianists. Miss Merrill of Auburn has studied piano under MacDowell for two years past.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 145.

TUESDAY, NOV. 22, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet gave their third concert la-t night in Chickering Hall, assisted by Pianist William H. Sherwood. Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann were the composers.

Sherwood's touch was never more vital and never more sure than in the Schumann quintet. They all played together, and with high artistic finish.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1892.

The third of the series of concerts of Mr. Kneisel and his quartet was rendered to a delighted and charmed audience at Chickering Hall last evening. Mr. Kneisel had the valuable assistance of Mr. William H. Sherwood, who was given a most flattering reception. The programme in detail was: Quartet in E flat, Mozart, four movements — allegro-andante-allegretto and allegro vivace, exquisitely rendered; quartet in F minor, Beethoven, five movements —allegro con brio, allegretto ma non troppo, allegro assai vivace ma serioso, larghetto espressiov and allegretto agitato, masterly given with brilliant first violin parts, giving Mr. Kneisel ample scope for his wonderful talent; piano quintet in E flat major, Schumann, four movements—allegro brilliante, in modo d'una macia, scherzo, allegro ma non troppo, powerfully rendered, Mr. Sherwood and the quartet as one in performing this beautiful quintet to perfection [illegible]

[47]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET in E flat.
Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—
Menuetto (allegretto).—Allegro vivace.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F minor. ("Quatuor Serioso") op. 95.
Allegro con brio.—Allegretto ma non troppo.—
Allegro assai vivace ma serioso.—
Larghetto espressivo; Allegretto agitato.

SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major, op. 44.
Allegro brilliante.—In modo d'una marcia.—
Scherzo.—Allegro ma non troppo.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

The date of the Fourth Concert is December 26.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The third concert in the Kneisel quartette's series took place last night at Chickering Hall, Mr. W. H. Sherwood assisting. In all three numbers were given, the Mozart quartette in E flat and the Schuman piano quintette in E flat major beginning and ending the programme, while the graver and heavier Beethoven quartette in F minor occupied the place of honor between.

The Mozart number was given in a delicate and dainty manner that suggested plainly a powdered dame of the last century seated at a spinet, playing a pastoral with pleasant variations. The element of grandeur, of fury, of intense passion is irreconcilable with this Wattan shepherdess phase of music that ran through the Mozart quartette. The allegro, the andante and the menuetto suggest alike patches and periwigs and the vanished graces of a buried past. As rendered by the quartette last night, the effect was refined and dainty, a trifle "thin" in a few passages, but on the whole ripplingly pleasant.

Even one who was unfamiliar with the mysteries of the dominant seventh and unaware of the heinousness of consecutive fifths could not fail to appreciate the decided transition from the prettiness of Mozart to the graver themes of the Beethoven "Quatuor Serioso." The transition was not entirely reconcilable, and seemed almost too great a leap. The opening allegro of the "Serioso" was taken with a fierce attack, and a general vigor and force pervaded the rendition of the entire number. The only noticeable fault was a lack of perfect "shading" just before the transition to the "allegro assai vivace."

The Schumann quintette, which closed the programme, brought in Mr. Sherwood, who is surely no stranger to Boston audiences and who won much praise during his visit of the last season. Mr. Sherwood was perhaps a trifle too vigorous and muscular in his work of last night, the piano sometimes obscuring the work of the violins. In the second movement he pursued the theme a trifle too rapidly, accelerating the strings beyond the proper tempo, although his rendition of the staccato "runs" was really admirable from the standpoint of technique. The conflict of time between the strings and the piano was perhaps due to the fact that the latter usually leads the average soloist to dependence upon rapidity for brilliancy, just as the same motive has resulted in a gradual raise of concert pitch since the widespread use of the pianoforte. However, the quintette did much better in the scherzo, although once again in the closing movement the time was a trifle too much accelerated. It can be fairly said, however, that the general rendition of the Schumann number was of a high and artistic type, and Mr. Sherwood's technique was, if not faultless, at least noticeably above the ordinary standard of concert piano-playing.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1892.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The third of the Kneisel Quartet concerts was given last evening in Chickering Hall. The pianist, Mr. William H. Sherwood, assisted. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E flat.....Mozart
Quartette, F minor, op. 95.....Beethoven
Pianoforte quintette, op. 44.....Schumann

Mr. Sherwood gave a brilliant performance of the pianoforte part of the quintette. It was one to be remembered for its crispness, clearness, rhythmic sense and fire. Once or twice there was a suspicion—faint, to be sure—of undue haste, but the suspicion was only for a moment.

Mr. Sherwood is a virtuoso in the true meaning of the word; virtuoso blood runs in his veins. That he should so chasten his spirit and curb desire to monopolize attention was not, however, unexpected, for he has given many proofs in days past of an artistic nature thoroughly schooled. At the same time, the exhibition of manly subordination at the proper time is not so common that when it is in evidence it should be slighted as almost foreign to the issue.

Neither is it necessary to praise in detail the playing of the members of the quartette. The characteristics of the different composers, as seen in the particular works, were admirably expressed—the serenity, the childlike innocence, the vague sadness of Mozart; the gloom, the struggle, the grotesque fancy of Beethoven; the romanticism of Schumann.

The selections themselves might well serve as pegs on which sermons concerning the changes in popular opinion could be hung. The Mozart quartettes that were dedicated to Haydn surprised, if they did not shock the amateurs and even many of the wise men of his day. When the Schuppanzigh quartette played the last quartettes of Beethoven, the name of doubting Thomas was legion. Lenz calls the one in F minor, "the marvelous bridge thrown from the second style of Beethoven to the third;" but to many of our own time this bridge was burned promptly by the composer, who stood safely on the ground of his later, mystical works. Perhaps Ignaz Schuppanzigh, "Mylord Falstaff," only increased the doubts of the hearers by his own performance, for we are told that his hand was so big and fat that he often played false, and he had the habit of dividing the phrase, as well as the tricks of distorting the rhythm and accenting unimportant notes. Furthermore, Camille Saint-Saens has shown us in the very case of the Schumann quintette how a man shifts his opinions, perhaps with his skin, in every seven years, perhaps from year to year. "The first time," he says, "I heard this celebrated quintette I was so unappreciative of its worth that I am now astonished. Later I enjoyed it, and for several years my enthusiasm knew no bounds. Now my noble rage is comparatively calm. While I recognize it as an extraordinary work, epoch-making in the history of chamber-music, I find serious faults, which almost pain me when I listen. I knew these faults long ago, but I did not wish to see them. You fall in love with works of art, and as long as you love them there are no faults; if there are faults, they are virtues. Love passes away; the faults remain. There are works which one loves until death comes. Others triumph over the changes in taste. These rare compositions are the true masterpieces; and the greatest composers do not make them every day in the week." Such a masterpiece is the Mozart quartette played last evening, and written over a century ago.

PHILIP HALE.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The progamme of the fifth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Opus 90.
MacDowell: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in A minor, Opus 15.
Berlioz: Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust":
Menuet des Feu-follets—Valse des Sylphes.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

A good deal that is not exactly flattering has been said from time to time about Boston audiences; but we believe it has not yet been hinted that a Boston audience will applaud enthusiastically anything that it has not really liked and enjoyed. The thing called "fashion" may prompt people to do this or do that; but it seldom, if ever, invites his devotees to an ebullient outward show of enthusiasm. So, when we find a splendid performance of a great work call forth loud and persistent hand-clapping, we may safely conclude that the audience really enjoyed that work. Few things that have been played here since the Symphony Orchestra was first founded have been more rapturously applauded than Brahms's F major symphony was last Saturday evening. Is Brahms at last becoming popular, then? It looks somewhat like it!

Never before has this third symphony of Brahms's seemed so entirely fine and great a work. It has stood the test of study, it has seemed finer and stronger with every successive performance; now it seems great all through. Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra gave it splendidly; with contagious fire and vigor, with clear coherency, with a true sense of its strength and beauty. There was but one blot on the playing—at several points the wooden wind was well out of tune. If this failing in our orchestra cannot be cured in any other way, one would fain fall back upon the old-fashioned way of having the men tune on the stage; this is, to be sure, rather frowned upon nowadays, but it is in any case better than playing out of tune. But, with this exception, the symphony was given magnificently.

The two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" went less to our liking. We have often before heard them go more effectively. The Minuet seemed to drag a little, and to lack decision of accent; the queer little coda, taken from Méphistophélès's serenade, went too slow—not much too slow, to be sure, but a little difference in a quick tempo like that makes all the difference in the world. The Sylphs' Waltz was decidedly too slow, and in two mechanical a rhythm; it gave no impression of the dainty atomies waltzing off through the air, but suggested rather the automatic rythmic cadence of the little mechanical figures that jerk round and round in the show-windows of old-fashioned hand-organs. Both tempo and accent, as Mr. Nikisch took the movement, savored a good deal of the old Ländler; but we are much mistaken if, when Berlioz marked the piece Allegro, mouvement de valse, he had not in mind something more nearly approaching the modern waltz. In so far as exquisite delicacy is concerned, the performance left nothing to be desired—the flutes, clarinets and harp were perfect, but somehow it did not sound right.

In Liszt's "Tasso," on the other hand, Mr. Nikisch covered himself with glory. The "Tasso" is not a composition for which one feels any overwhelming respect; still it is better to have as much made of it as possible in performance, and Mr. Nikisch makes a great deal of it. Especially fine was his reading of the Finale. This turbulent movement, from the point marked "Quasi Presto," where the trumpets begin their crackling triplets, and later on, after the "Allegro maestoso," just before the marks "molto animato" and "stretto," has always sounded to us more like the gibbering and chattering of a maniac than like a song of triumph. Mr. Nikisch plays these ticklish passages with a decision of accent, a well-balanced phrasing, and above all with a wise moderation in tempo, that allow the strange and often far-fetched harmonic progressions to impress themselves distinctly upon the ear; as he plays it, the music may sound turgid and harmonically outrageous, if you will, but it at least sounds as if Liszt were really saying something, and saying it articulately and forcibly. It was a grand performance.

Mr. MacDowell's A minor concerto has not been given here before to a large audience. It was played some years ago (whether by the composer or by Mr. Whelpley, we now forget) at one of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts in Chickering Hall; but it was too long ago for us to retain any distinct impression of the work. Last Saturday evening a feeling that has more than once troubled us before grew to the force of a conviction. This is that Mr. MacDowell is at once the most interesting and (as far as we personally are concerned) the most puzzling of contemporary American composers. The man evidently walks with a very sure gait in what he writes; his compositions have anything but a tentative air; you recognize them at once as distinctly professional work. Moreover, he invariably gives the impression of having something to say. And yet, except in one little fugitive piece for pianoforte, we have never been able to make out exactly what he is driving at; it is like listening to an impassioned poem superbly read in Russian; we feel that, as Mary Anderson once said, it is "somenow splendid," but we don't know what it all means. Energy and seriousness of purpose, warmth of feeling, a wondrous glow of color, are all apparent; only we cannot make out for what purpose, nor what feeling. The fault is undoubtedly in us, as we are beginning to perceive; no man—that is, no sincere man—can speak with that air of decision, and say nothing; and Mr. MacDowell's artistic sincerity is above all doubt. We are already beginning to look upon his compositions in a new light; time was when we could not even find them inviting to study and investigation; now we do find them so—we have progressed so far at least. In the concerto he played last Saturday evening, there were moments of such exalted beauty that no one could fail to be impressed by them; but, as to the coherence and true musical meaning of the work, we are still in the dark. Of course no critic is going to take the trouble to write himself down an—idiot in face of a man or a work, unless he feels pretty sure that there is something of real, even exceptional, value in that man or work. And we should not take the trouble to say all we have about Mr. MacDowell were we not convinced that there is something in him that we do not understand, and which is well worth understanding. We mean to study him more, and as hard as we can. As for his playing of the concerto, that was superb! The enthusiasm of the audience was at white heat, and he was recalled at the close oftener than we can remember.

The next programme is: Dvorák, dramatic overture to "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for 'cello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, symphony

---

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. William H. Sherwood, gave the third concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Mozart: Quartet for strings, No. 3, in E-flat major.
Beethoven: Quartet for strings, No. 11, in F minor, Opus 95.
Schumann: Quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E-flat major, Opus 44.

The Mozart quartet was beautifully played. As a composition it is one of those things that are ever welcome; pure in form, full of the finest inspiration, characteristic of the great composer in his best moods. The Andante con moto (second movement) is in especial a gem of the first water.

Beethoven's F minor quartet, opus 95, is not one of the most familiar ones here. It belongs to the period of the seventh and eighth symphonies and the great B-flat trio, and was dedicated to the court secretary, Baron Zmeskall von Domanovetz, one of Beethoven's noble Viennese friends who formed an admiring circle around him, and were not to be frightened nor offended by the great man's not always conciliating temper. Of the great works that were written about the same time as this quartet, the eighth symphony, in F major, seems to have most in common with it, in so far as musical style is concerned, although the two compositions show the composer in quite different moods; but, with the eighth symphony, this quartet belongs distinctly to Beethoven's third manner. It should be ranked with the "later quartets." In mood and spiritual quality, however, it has not a little in common with a much earlier work, the sonata appassionata, opus 57; which, by the way, is also in F minor. One finds in this quartet not a little of the fitful spirit, of those paroxysms of passion, that pervade the first movement of the "appassionata;" much in it gives the same impression of stretching the laws of musical form to the uttermost, but without ever breaking them in spirit. But with all this there is a certain "modernness" in style, a subtlety in harmony—a finesse, in fine—that stamps the work as belonging to Beethoven's last manner. Like several other compositions in this third manner of Beethoven's, it contains not a little that we can now recognize as "prophetic;" it shows us, among other things, where a good deal in Brahms came from—not to mention two such dissimilar people as Schumann and Berlioz. There is a fugued passage in the Allegretto ma non troppo (second movement) which—allowing for all sorts of differences in technique, contrapuntal treatment, etc.—reminds one forcibly of certain fugato passages in Berlioz's "Faust." There is the same chromatic wail (very different from Wagner's, by the by), the same spleen and sickness of life, the same frankness in expressing utter misery of soul—with the difference however, that Berlioz takes this desperate mood quite seriously, as really tragic and incurable, whereas we find in Beethoven a touch of not-to-be-silenced humor, that shows that, however wretched the present moment may be, he knows in his heart of heart that the cause may be purely physical, after all, and that he may soon feel much better. Ransack the dictionary, and you will not find terms to give an idea of the greatness, beauty, vigor, passion, humor of the music in this F minor quartet; it is an unique work, one in which Beethoven, as has been said of Shakspeare, "says all that has been said before or after him—only better!" The great work was absolutely superbly played—one knows not which member of the quartet to praise most highly. To hear such music so played is one of the high privileges that some of us in this good city of ours are beginning to appreciate at its full value.

The Schumann quintet seemed to us, somehow, to hang fire all through. Whether the fault was in its coming right after the Beethoven quartet, or in the playing, or in ourself, we do not know; but, in spite of many admirable points made by Mr. Sherwood and the members of the Quartet, it all sounded a little slow and lacking in vivacity. Notwithstanding this impression, however, it was impossible not to recognize a great deal that was signally good in the performance. Mr. Sherwood was firm as a rock in the pianoforte part; lacking perhaps something of the Schumann depth and expansiveness of expression, but admirably strong and well balanced. He was especially fine in the glowing coda to the last movement. But, upon the whole, we have heard this quintet—which some one has called "the father of all the chamber-music that has come after it"—go with more vim and entrain. Mr. Sherwood was very warmly received by the audience, which was, by the way, steadily enthusiastic throughout the concert.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 22, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Third of the Series Enjoyed a Brilliant Assemblage.

The third in the course of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. An unusually large audience, consisting of most of the leading musical people of the city, was in attendance.

The programme consisted of three numbers, Mozart's quartet in E flat, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, and Schumann's piano quintet in E flat major. Mr. William H. Sherwood played the piano part in the last number.

The programme made a pleasing climax with the acme at the Schumann quintet, which was played with great breadth and power by the performers.

Mr. Sherwood was warmly received and was at his best. He showed his usual brilliancy of execution, and did his best work in the forte passages where his power was great and his tempo extremely well marked.

The members of the quartet were almost perfect in the numbers which they had to themselves; the minuetto movement in the Mozart quartet and the opening movement in the Beethoven quartet were most warmly received.

The next concert will be given on the evening of Dec. 26.

[48]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET in E flat.
Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—
Menuetto (allegretto).—Allegro vivace.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F minor. ("Quatuor Serioso") op. 95.
Allegro con brio.—Allegretto ma non troppo.—
Allegro assai vivace ma serioso.—
Larghetto espressivo; Allegretto agitato.

SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major, op. 44.
Allegro brilliante.—In modo d'una marcia.—
Scherzo.—Allegro ma non troppo.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

The date of the Fourth Concert is December 26.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1892,

The Kneisel Quartette.

The third concert in the Kneisel quartette's series took place last night at Chickering Hall, Mr. W. H. Sherwood assisting. In all three numbers were given, the Mozart quartette in E flat and the Schuman piano quintette in E flat major beginning and ending the programme, while the graver and heavier Beethoven quartette in F minor occupied the place of honor between.

The Mozart number was given in a delicate and dainty manner that suggested plainly a powdered dame of the last century seated at a spinet, playing a pastoral with pleasant variations. The element of grandeur, of fury, of intense passion is irreconcilable with this Wattan shepherdess phase of music that ran through the Mozart quartette. The allegro, the andante and the menuetto suggest alike patches and periwigs and the vanished graces of a buried past. As rendered by the quartette last night, the effect was refined and dainty, a trifle "thin" in a few passages, but on the whole ripplingly pleasant.

Even one who was unfamiliar with the mysteries of the dominant seventh and unaware of the heinousness of consecutive fifths could not fail to appreciate the decided transition from the prettiness of Mozart to the graver themes of the Beethoven "Quatuor Serioso." The transition was not entirely reconcilable, and seemed almost too great a leap. The opening allegro of the "Serioso" was taken with a fierce attack, and a general vigor and force pervaded the rendition of the entire number. The only noticeable fault was a lack of perfect "shading" just before the transition to the "allegro assai vivace."

The Schumann quintette, which closed the programme, brought in Mr. Sherwood, who is surely no stranger to Boston audiences and who won much praise during his visit of the last season. Mr. Sherwood was perhaps a trifle too vigorous and muscular in his work of last night, the piano sometimes obscuring the work of the violins. In the second movement he pursued the theme a trifle too rapidly, accelerating the strings beyond the proper tempo, although his rendition of the staccato "runs" was really admirable from the standpoint of technique. The conflict of time between the strings and the piano was perhaps due to the fact that the latter usually leads the average soloist to dependence upon rapidity for brilliancy, just as the same motive has resulted in a gradual raise of concert pitch since the widespread use of the pianoforte. However, the quintette did much better in the scherzo, although once again in the closing movement the time was a trifle too much accelerated. It can be fairly said, however, that the general rendition of the Schumann number was of a high and artistic type, and Mr. Sherwood's technique was, if not faultless, at least noticeably above the ordinary standard of concert piano-playing.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1892.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The third of the Kneisel Quartet concerts was given last evening in Chickering Hall. The pianist, Mr. William H. Sherwood, assisted. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E flat.....Mozart
Quartette, F minor, op. 95.....Beethoven
Pianoforte quintette, op. 44.....Schumann

Mr. Sherwood gave a brilliant performance of the pianoforte part of the quintette. It was one to be remembered for its crispness, clearness, rhythmic sense and fire. Once or twice there was a suspicion—faint, to be sure—of undue haste, but the suspicion was only for a moment.

Mr. Sherwood is a virtuoso in the true meaning of the word; virtuoso blood runs in his veins. That he should so chasten his spirit and curb desire to monopolize attention was not, however, unexpected, for he has given many proofs in days past of an artistic nature thoroughly schooled. At the same time, the exhibition of manly subordination at the proper time is not so common that when it is in evidence it should be slighted as almost foreign to the issue.

Neither is it necessary to praise in detail the playing of the members of the quartette. The characteristics of the different composers, as seen in the particular works, were admirably expressed—the serenity, the childlike innocence, the vague sadness of Mozart; the gloom, the struggle, the grotesque fancy of Beethoven; the romanticism of Schumann.

The selections themselves might well serve as pegs on which sermons concerning the changes in popular opinion could be hung. The Mozart quartettes that were dedicated to Haydn surprised, if they did not shock the amateurs and even many of the wise men of his day. When the Schuppanzigh quartette played the last quartettes of Beethoven, the name of doubting Thomas was legion. Lenz calls the one in F minor, "the marvelous bridge thrown from the second style of Beethoven to the third;" but to many of our own time this bridge was burned promptly by the composer, who stood safely on the ground of his later, mystical works. Perhaps Ignaz Schuppanzigh, "Mylord Falstaff," only increased the doubts of the hearers by his own performance, for we are told that his hand was so big and fat that he often played false, and he had the habit of dividing the phrase, as well as the tricks of distorting the rhythm and accenting unimportant notes. Furthermore, Camille Saint-Saens has shown us in the very case of the Shumann quintette how a man shifts his opinions, perhaps with his skin, in every seven years, perhaps from year to year. "The first time," he says, "I heard this celebrated quintette I was so unappreciative of its worth that I am now astonished. Later I enjoyed it, and for several years my enthusiasm knew no bounds. Now my noble rage is comparatively calm. While I recognize it as an extraordinary work, epoch-making in the history of chamber-music, I find serious faults, which almost pain me when I listen. I knew these faults long ago, but I did not wish to see them. You fall in love with works of art, and as long as you love them there are no faults; if there are faults, they are virtues. Love passes away; the faults remain. There are works which one loves until death comes. Others triumph over the changes in taste. These rare compositions are the true masterpieces; and the greatest composers do not make them every day in the week." Such a masterpiece is the Mozart quartette played last evening, and written over a century ago.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The progamme of the fifth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Opus 90.
MacDowell: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in A minor, Opus 15.
Berlioz: Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust":
Menuet des Feu-follets—Valse des Sylphes.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

A good deal that is not exactly flattering has been said from time to time about Boston audiences; but we believe it has not yet been hinted that a Boston audience will applaud enthusiastically anything that it has not really liked and enjoyed. The thing called "fashion" may prompt people to do this or do that; but it seldom, if ever, invites his devotees to an ebullient outward show of enthusiasm. So, when we find a splendid performance of a great work call forth loud and persistent hand-clapping, we may safely conclude that the audience really enjoyed that work. Few things that have been played here since the Symphony Orchestra was first founded have been more rapturously applauded than Brahms's F major symphony was last Saturday evening. Is Brahms at last becoming popular, then? It looks somewhat like it!

Never before has this third symphony of Brahms's seemed so entirely fine and great a work. It has stood the test of study, it has seemed finer and stronger with every successive performance; now it seems great all through. Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra gave it splendidly; with contagious fire and vigor, with clear coherency, with a true sense of its strength and beauty. There was but one blot on the playing—at several points the wooden wind was well out of tune. If this failing in our orchestra cannot be cured in any other way, one would fain fall back upon the old-fashioned way of having the men tune on the stage; this is, to be sure, rather frowned upon nowadays, but it is in any case better than playing out of tune. But, with this exception, the symphony was given magnificently.

The two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" went less to our liking. We have often before heard them go more effectively. The Minuet seemed to drag a little, and to lack decision of accent; the queer little coda, taken from Méphistophélès's serenade, went too slow—not much too slow, to be sure, but a little difference in a quick tempo like that makes all the difference in the world. The Sylphs' Waltz was decidedly too slow, and in two mechanical a rhythm; it gave no impression of the dainty atomies waltzing off through the air, but suggested rather the automatic rythmic cadence of the little mechanical figures that jerk round and round in the show-windows of old-fashioned hand-organs. Both tempo and accent, as Mr. Nikisch took the movement, savored a good deal of the old Ländler; but we are much mistaken if, when Berlioz marked the piece Allegro, mouvement de valse, he had not in mind something more nearly approaching the modern waltz. In so far as exquisite delicacy is concerned, the performance left nothing to be desired—the flutes, clarinets and harp were perfect, but somehow it did not sound right.

In Liszt's "Tasse," on the other hand, Mr. Nikisch covered himself with glory. The "Tasso" is not a composition for which one feels any overwhelming respect; still it is better to have as much made of it as possible in performance, and Mr. Nikisch makes a great deal of it. Especially fine was his reading of the Finale. This turbulent movement, from the point marked "Quasi Presto," where the trumpets begin their crackling triplets, and later on, after the "Allegro maestoso," just before the marks "molto animato" and "stretto," has always sounded to us more like the gibbering and chattering of a maniac than like a song of triumph. Mr. Nikisch plays these ticklish passages with a decision of accent, a well-balanced phrasing, and above all with a wise moderation in tempo, that allow the strange and often far-fetched harmonic progressions to impress themselves distinctly upon the ear; as he plays it, the music may sound turgid and harmonically outrageous, if you will, but it at least sounds as if Liszt were really saying something, and saying it articulately and forcibly. It was a grand performance.

Mr. MacDowell's A minor concerto has not been given here before to a large audience. It was played some years ago (whether by the composer or by Mr. Whelpley, we now forget) at one of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts in Chickering Hall; but it was too long ago for us to retain any distinct impression of the work. Last Saturday evening a feeling that has more than once troubled us before grew to the force of a conviction. This is that Mr. MacDowell is at once the most interesting and (as far as we personally are concerned) the most puzzling of contemporary American composers. The man evidently walks with a very sure gait in what he writes; his compositions have anything but a tentative air; you recognize them at once as distinctly professional work. Moreover, he invariably gives the impression of having something to say. And yet, except in one little fugitive piece for pianoforte, we have never been able to make out exactly what he is driving at; it is like listening to an impassioned poem superbly read in Russian; we feel that, as Mary Anderson once said, it is "somenow splendid," but we don't know what it all means. Energy and seriousness of purpose, warmth of feeling, a wondrous glow of color, are all apparent; only we cannot make out for what purpose, nor what feeling. The fault is undoubtedly in us, as we are beginning to perceive; no man—that is, no sincere man—can speak with that air of decision, and say nothing; and Mr. MacDowell's artistic sincerity is above all doubt. We are already beginning to look upon his compositions in a new light; time was when we could not even find them inviting to study and investigation; now we do find them so—we have progressed so far at least. In the concerto he played last Saturday evening, there were moments of such exalted beauty that no one could fail to be impressed by them; but, as to the coherence and true musical meaning of the work, we are still in the dark. Of course no critic is going to take the trouble to write himself down an—idiot in face of a man or a work, unless he feels pretty sure that there is something of real, even exceptional, value in that man or work. And we should not take the trouble to say all we have about Mr. MacDowell were we not convinced that there is something in him that we do not understand, and which is well worth understanding. We mean to study him more, and as hard as we can. As for his playing of the concerto, that was superb! The enthusiasm of the audience was at white heat, and he was recalled at the close oftener than we can remember.

The next programme is: Dvorák, dramatic overture to "Hussitska:" Davidoff, concerto for 'cello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1892.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. William H. Sherwood, gave the third concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Mozart: Quartet for strings, No. 3, in E-flat major.
Beethoven: Quartet for strings, No. 11, in F minor, opus 95.
Schumann: Quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E-flat major, Opus 44.

The Mozart quartet was beautifully played. As a composition it is one of those things that are ever welcome; pure in form, full of the finest inspiration, characteristic of the great composer in his best moods. The Andante con moto (second movement) is in especial a gem of the first water.

Beethoven's F minor quartet, opus 95, is not one of the most familiar ones here. It belongs to the period of the seventh and eighth symphonies and the great B-flat trio, and was dedicated to the court secretary, Baron Zmeskall von Domanovetz, one of Beethoven's noble Viennese friends who formed an admiring circle around him, and were not to be frightened nor offended by the great man's not always conciliating temper. Of the great works that were written about the same time as this quartet, the eighth symphony, in F major, seems to have most in common with it, in so far as musical style is concerned, although the two compositions show the composer in quite different moods; but, with the eighth symphony, this quartet belongs distinctly to Beethoven's third manner. It should be ranked with the "later quartets." In mood and spiritual quality, however, it has not a little in common with a much earlier work, the sonata appassionata, opus 57; which, by the way, is also in F minor. One finds in this quartet not a little of the fitful spirit, of those paroxysms of passion, that pervade the first movement of the "appassionata;" much in it gives the same impression of stretching the laws of musical form to the uttermost, but without ever breaking them in spirit. But with all this there is a certain "modernness" in style, a subtlety in harmony—a finesse, in fine—that stamps the work as belonging to Beethoven's last manner. Like several other compositions in this third manner of Beethoven's, it contains not a little that we can now recognize as "prophetic;" it shows us, among other things, where a good deal in Brahms came from—not to mention two such dissimilar people as Schumann and Berlioz. There is a fugued passage in the Allegretto ma non troppo (second movement) which—allowing for all sorts of differences in technique, contrapuntal treatment, etc.—reminds one forcibly of certain fugato passages in Berlioz's "Faust." There is the same chromatic wail (very different from Wagner's, by the by), the same spleen and sickness of life, the same frankness in expressing utter misery of soul—with the difference however, that Berlioz takes this desperate mood quite seriously, as really tragic and mourable, whereas we find in Beethoven a touch of not-to-be-silenced humor, that shows that, however wretched the present moment may be, he knows in his heart of heart that the cause may be purely physical, after all, and that he may soon feel much better. Ransack the dictionary, and you will not find terms to give an idea of the greatness, beauty, vigor, passion, humor of the music in this F minor quartet; it is an unique work, one in which Beethoven, as has been said of Shakspeare, "says all that has been said before or after him—only better!" The great work was absolutely superbly played—one knows not which member of the quartet to praise most highly. To hear such music so played is one of the high privileges that some of us in this good city of ours are beginning to appreciate at its full value.

The Schumann quintet seemed to us, somehow, to hang fire all through. Whether the fault was in its coming right after the Beethoven quartet, or in the playing, or in ourself, we do not know; but, in spite of many admirable points made by Mr. Sherwood and the members of the Quartet, it all sounded a little slow and lacking in vivacity. Notwithstanding this impression, however, it was impossible not to recognize a great deal that was signally good in the performance. Mr. Sherwood was firm as a rock in the pianoforte part; lacking perhaps something of the Schumann depth and expansiveness of expression, but admirably strong and well balanced. He was especially fine in the glowing coda to the last movement. But, upon the whole, we have heard this quintet—which some one has called "the father of all the chamber-music that has come after it"—go with more vim and entrain. Mr. Sherwood was very warmly received by the audience, which was, by the way, steadily enthusiastic throughout the concert.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 22, 1892.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Third of the Series Enjoyed a Brilliant Assemblage.

The third in the course of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. An unusually large audience, consisting of most of the leading musical people of the city, was in attendance.

The programme consisted of three numbers, Mozart's quartet in E flat, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, and Schumann's piano quintet in E flat major. Mr. William H. Sherwood played the piano part in the last number.

The programme made a pleasing climax with the acme at the Schumann quintet, which was played with great breadth and power by the performers.

Mr. Sherwood was warmly received and was at his best. He showed his usual brilliancy of execution, and did his best work in the forte passages where his power was great and his tempo extremely well marked.

The members of the quartet were almost perfect in the numbers which they had to themselves; the minuetto movement in the Mozart quartet and the opening movement in the Beethoven quartet were most warmly received.

The next concert will be given on the evening of Dec. 26.

[48]

Clipping from Tribune
Amesbury Mass
Date 11 19

Symphony Concert.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, November 10, with the following programme: Reinecke, overture to "King Manfred." Mozart, Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro." Volkmann, serenade for strings. Songs with piano. Chaminade, Chanson Slave. Brahms, Sonntag. Guiraud, Bercouse. Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3 in A minor. "Scotch." Miss Alice Wentworth was the soloist. Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture was heard for the first time in Boston, at the second concert of the current season when the interest that it excited was due to the fact that it was a novelty, rather than to any striking originality in the composition It gains however on a second hearing, the principal theme being abundant in melody, and surrounded by all the intricacies which the wealth of modern instrumentation knows so well how to adopt. The element of sensationalism is not wanting, the introduction of trombone and drum, producing quite a theatrical effect. One does not long to make the acquaintance of the five act opera which follows, but the overture is certainly worthy of a place on a concert programme. It was played with wonderful spirit and brilliancy. Miss Wentworth's singing of the Mozart Aria, won for her the enthusiastic encomiums of the audience. She has a high soprano voice, lovely in quality, which she uses with skill and ease, and with more experience in singing before audiences she will develop into a delightful artist. Later in the evening she was heard again in a group of songs, with piano accompaniments beautifully played by Mr. Nikisch. Of these, "Sonntag" by Brahms, was decidedly the gem, but they were all so much alike in sentiment, that at last the effect became monotonous, and one naturally craved a little more variety of contrast and coloring. The refined and delicate style of the young artist was heard to great advantage, and she was twice recalled with great enthusiasm. The serenade for string orchestra is one of the most charming and spontaneous of Volkmann's compositions. Each of the four movements has a distinct individuality of its own, the entrancing waltz which constitutes the third, finding especial favor with the audience. It was all played to absolute perfection, and will long haunt the memories of those who heard it. Mendelssohn's beautiful "Scotch" symphony, now familiar as "household words," brought the concert to a close, and Mr. Nikisch showed most conclusively his absolute command over the orchestra, which now responds to him, as if he were playing upon a solo instrument. The personality of the orchestra is in especial demand throughout this symphony and the graduations of light and shade were never more apparent. The pianissimo of the drum was a marvel to listen to, while the notes of the flute and obeo were of crystalline clearness and brilliancy. Mr. Schroder's cello delighted his listeners in the beautiful solo of the first movement, all the strings working wonders in the way of virtuosity. The clarinet is especially favored in this symphony with a peculiarly dainty effect in the scherzo which was exquisitely played. This movement is the only one which really suggests Scotch music, and Schumann wrote that the Italian pictures of the A minor symphony are so beautiful as to make up to one who has not visited Italy, for never having seen that blessed land. The Allegro was beautifully sung, and the Finale, "Allegro Vivacissimo" was worked up with splendid élan. The next concert will be given on Thursday evening, December 1.

C. R.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.
Date 11-21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The analytical programmes are out for the symphony concert to-morrow night, and certainly never has a more brilliant concert been rendered in this city. The "Sakuntala" Overture is a musical expression of Kalidasa's Sanskrit poem portraying love, despair, revenge, with the most gorgeous richness of coloring. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be heard for the first time in two solo numbers. The concert will be called promptly at 7:45 P. M., as the orchestra returns to Boston this same evening. It is said that the ladies will appear without hats.

[49]

Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS DISHONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

WORCESTER.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 23, 1892.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A LARGE AUDIENCE LISTENS TO INSPIRING MUSIC.

AN INTENSELY MODERN PROGRAM, BRILLIANT WITH LAVISH ORCHESTRAL COLORING—MRS. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of a series of four concerts in this city last evening before an audience that filled nearly everything save the galleries in Mechanics Hall. Some of the best known players were absent. The program was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala."

Saint-Saens, concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor, op. 44.

Wagner, Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."

Solos for piano: Rameau, Gavotte with variations; Schubert-Tausig, march Militaire.

Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The large audiences assured for this series make reasonable the expectation that the course will be repeated next year, and in fact be made a permanent institution. As the Boston managers themselves say, they never let go if once they get a foothold in a town.

The orchestra has sometimes played Goldmark's famous overture with finer finish and more perfect unity, but seldom with more sensuous effect than it played it last night. Since the overture has become a concert favorite in America there has appeared a disposition among critics to decry the work, but, though one may not care to have it for breakfast, dinner and supper and between meals, the work wears well, and new beauties are certain to be discovered at each successive hearing.

Saint-Saens' C minor concerto ranks next to the more common No. 2, in G minor. Like most of his concertos, it departs from the established form, the first allegro being dwarfed to a mere prelude of the andante or second movement. The third movement is made up of a sort of scherzo, an episodic andante and a vigorous final allegro. It is an interesting and virile work. Mrs. Zeisler gave a charming reading of the piano score, for the most part, especially of the slow movements and the more emotional passages. The performance of the orchestra, though the concerto had been played in Boston only a few weeks ago, was decidedly ragged, at times, and was not up to the standard. Some readers may be gratified to learn, by the way, that the composer's name is pronounced approximately like "Sent-Sance," with the broad sound of the a.

Wagner's orchestral music seldom fails to please, and it was to be expected that the orchestra's very romantic delivery of the dramatic "Tristan" prelude and "Love's Death" should be received with demonstrations of delight by the audience.

Mrs. Zeisler's solos were attractive, chiefly as they furnished opportunity for the display of clever virtuosity. In the Rameau gavotte she was especially successful in the clearness, delicacy and accuracy of her execution. In the more strenuous measures of the Schubert-Tausig military march she was less satisfying, after the high hopes she had raised in the less pompous and more musical introduction. Considered as a whole her performance last evening shows that she has developed her art in various ways since her last appearance in this city, where she is a deserving favorite.

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony has been a puzzle if not a stumbling block to the musical doctrinaires. Except that the first section of the first allegro is not repeated; that a waltz displaces the scherzo, and that an andante of the "God Save the Queen" variety, largely in unisons, is dropped bodily into a blizzard-like Muscovite finale, the form of the symphony follows the classic model, and these innovations were not original with this composer. On the other hand, its spirit is no more that of the symphony than is that of a Liszt symphonic poem or Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch." Writers have agreed to disagree about it, but a majority praise it with certain cautious reservations. Its chief beauties are obvious enough at the first hearing, and it wears better than perhaps might be expected, for the themes are tuneful, if not always dignified, and the instrumentation is gorgeous.

Those who have heard much modern Russian music say that some composers have written eccentric Slavic rhythms, coarse Tartar melodies and ferocious Cossack harmonies to which the originality of Tschaikowsky is but as skimmed milk to Kirschwasser or Vodka. Such composers are said to spell their names Dargomijsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky, etc., and license nobody west of the Vistula to pronounce them. Really, there seems little to complain of in the Tschaikowsky symphony, save in the excessive working out section in the first movement, and that should not be displeasing to the doctrinaires, though it may be tiresome to others. The audience applauded the last three movements heartily.

The next concert will be given Dec. 29, and Nordica will be the soloist.

After the concert, which was an admirable beginning for the series, Mrs. Zeisler was very handsomely entertained by the Misses Burnside of Chestnut street. Present, also, were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ward Greene, Miss Durand of Rochester, N. Y.; Walter S. Kennedy, Charles A. Williams, Dr. W. R. Gilman and Dr. Leonard Wheeler. Next October Mrs. Zeisler intends to go to Vienna for further study.

EVENING GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 23, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large and Appreciative Audience.

The first of a series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch, took place last evening in Mechanics Hall. Special efforts at procuring subscriptions had been begun as early as last spring by public-spirited ladies interested in music, so that the success of the course was guaranteed before it opened. There were not many persons in the galleries last evening, although they contain some of the most desirable seats in the house, but the floor was substantially filled, and the audience applauded with great regularity.

The programme was made up from Goldmark, Saint-Saens, Wagner, and Tschaikowsky, with two solos for the piano-forte, Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler being the pianist. Not to criticise very seriously, the grouping of the selections, the listener must have been struck, particularly in the first hour, with a certain repetition of his musical impressions. Not that Saint Saens resembles the German composers, but the wailing and the pleading of the violins in "Sakuntala" seemed to find and echo in the French concerto and even in the sad selections from "Tristan and Isolde." With the military march, so admirably played by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, there came an entire contrast of theme and tempo, which was refreshing. The somewhat new fashion of putting the symphony last on the programme is also open to debate, although we admit the character of the Russian music, which was tolerably easy to comprehend without fatigue, made its place at the end of the evening not particularly out of place. It may here be noted that this symphony (No. 5, in E Minor) was greatly cut to save time, in the waltz movement and the Finale.

The concert was of course enjoyable, as the music of the best composers so intelligently performed must always be to the cultivated musical ear, and it is to be hoped that the Symphony Orchestra, having got a foothold here, will keep it in future years.

The sensible essays of the official programme, although explanatory rather than critical, save the newspapers some perfunctoy work at least, and there is nothing new to be said of Mr. Nikisch, or his band. The playing of Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler merits very high praise. Her power and precision are remarkable, and on occasion, her touch can be made sensitive and delicate. She will take the highest rank among artists and has improved since her last appearance here.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.
Published Daily and Sunday.
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1892.

FIRST OF THE SERIES.

Nikisch and Bloomfield-Zeisler at Mechanics Hall.

The scene at Mechanics hall, last night, reminded one of the days of the festival. All musical Worcester was there and it was to their credit and their good taste that the cold, biting night did not prevent them hearing one of the finest instrumental concerts that has ever been given in Worcester.

The occasion was the first of a series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra. Very little needs to be said of that splendid body of instruments except that it is, perhaps, without a superior in the country. Every man in the orchestra is an artist.

Incidentally, last night, there was a good deal of interest in the appearance of Arthur Nikisch, as conductor. He disappointed a number of people in the hall inasmuch as he did not throw himself all over the stage or enter into any gymnastic capers, even when he was conducting the selections from the most gymnastic of all composers—Wagner. But while Nikisch was calm and stately and dignified, he showed, from first to last, an admirable command of his forces.

The orchestra presented Goldmark's overture "Sakuntata," Wagner's vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Triston and Isolde," in addition to the famous symphony No. 5 in E minor of Tschaikowsky, with its four movements, and in them all it gave evidence of the refinement, delicacy, strength and sweetness which have helped to make the Boston symphony orchestra what it is today.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist of the evening, and on her Steinway she easily shared the honors with Nikisch and his instruments. The lady, girlish in form and feature, has been heard in Worcester before, so that it was no stranger who was so cordially welcomed last night when she sat down to play Saint-Saens' concerto, No. 4, in C minor. Her execution was, as usual, finished to a degree, and she was so vociferously encored that she had to play again. The same story may be told of her soli, Rameau's gavot, which was brilliantly played, and Schubert-Tausig's march Militaire.

But, indeed, the whole concert was a thorough artistic success, and provoked during the evening as much applause as a Worcester fashionable audience is capable of.

The next concert in the series will be given on Thursday night, the 29th of December, when Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the vocalist.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 26, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the audience at the fifth Symphony unquestionably attached to Mr. E. A. MacDowell and his pianoforte, in spite of the herculean efforts of Mr. Apthorp in the programme-book to excite enthusiasm for that object of his admiration—one might almost say adoration—Brahms, whose third symphony began the evening. It does no good, in praising this able, but laborious and often abstruse composer, to say that other musicians before him were not liked and appreciated in their times, and that therefore people ought to be advised and to proceed at once to the enshrining of Brahms in their hearts in the same niche with Beethoven. We are all getting to understand his ways a little better than at first, to bear with his ponderousness, his over-elaboration and his complicated textures, and to like what is clear, sweet, simple, strong or eloquent in him. But it is too soon to insist upon his general and entire acceptance. We are living now, not in some future period, when the musical shall (perhaps) have been drawn quite to his ways of thought and expression. Let not the reader imagine, however, that we are hastening to exalt Mr. MacDowell's star above that of Brahms or to proclaim his to be the superior genius. But his ideas are fresh, his intuitions definite, his writing able and often either impressive or captivating, and his personality and performance attractive and commanding. He inclines too much toward the eccentrically-fanciful in his light and humorous moments and his vocal writing is apt to be intricate and almost unsingable. But he has power and independence, he understands his art and its instruments and he does justice alike to the orchestral and solo parts. His concerto is well put together and holds attention from the first bar, the first and last movements being the most characteristic of his peculiar talent in their fiery speed and their urgent spirit. His performance of the piano part was striking in its brilliancy, its defiance of all difficulties and its constant strength, and it showed delicacy when required. There is a pleasant calm in the andante, and this movement was read with gravity and reserve. The remainder of the programme calls for no comment, consisting as it did of the long familiar dances from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and the noisy, splurgy, melodramatic "Tasso" of Liszt, all exceedingly well played.

The programme for tonight is of better selection and arrangement. It stands thus: Dvoràk's dramatic overture, "Hassitska," for the first time in Boston, a violoncello concerto of Davidoff, for Mr. Schroeder; Svensen's orchestral legend, "Zoharayda," for the first time, and Schumann's second symphony.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Quartettes by Mozart and by Beethoven, followed by Schumann's piano quintette in E major, composed the programme for the third concert in this series. The arrangement was only just less than perfection, for some allowance had to be made for a few inequalities in the last work. The Mozart was played with a fanciful delicacy and a fine light touch, while the Beethoven had breadth, depth, fulness and that equal balancing of parts which has sometimes been forgotten in a too great subordination of the other players to their eminent leaders. Mr. Sherwood was the pianist and he evidently took up his task with earnestness and enthusiasm. He apparently underrated the sonority of the instrument he used and occasionally quite overpowered his coadjutors, also accelerating the pace upon them now and then. His brilliant, decisive and forceful manner is well-known in Boston and he displayed it splendidly, but not to the point of making the listener forget that he lacks tenderness and mellowness of passion.

Clipping from Tribune
Dunbridge Mass
Date 11/19

Symphony Concert.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, November 10, with the following programme: Reinecke, overture to "King Manfred." Mozart, Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro." Volkmann, serenade for strings. Songs with piano. Chaminade, Chanson Slave. Brahms, Sonntag. Guiraud, Berceuse. Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3 in A minor. "Scotch." Miss Alice Wentworth was the soloist. Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture was heard for the first time in Boston, at the second concert of the current season when the interest that it excited was due to the fact that it was a novelty, rather than to any striking originality in the composition It gains however on a second hearing, the principal theme being abundant in melody, and surrounded by all the intricacies which the wealth of modern instrumentation knows so well how to adopt. The element of sensationalism is not wanting, the introduction of trombone and drum, producing quite a theatrical effect. One does not long to make the acquaintance of the five act opera which follows, but the overture is certainly worthy of a place on a concert programme. It was played with wonderful spirit and brilliancy. Miss Wentworth's singing of the Mozart Aria, won for her the enthusiastic encomiums of the audience. She has a high soprano voice, lovely in quality, which she uses with skill and ease, and with more experience in singing before audiences she will develop into a delightful artist. Later in the evening she was heard again in a group of songs, with piano accompaniments beautifully played by Mr. Nikisch. Of these, "Sonntag" by Brahms, was decidedly the gem, but they were all so much alike in sentiment, that at last the effect became monotonous, and one naturally craved a little more variety of contrast and coloring. The refined and delicate style of the young artist was heard to great advantage, and she was twice recalled with great enthusiasm. The serenade for string orchestra is one of the most charming and spontaneous of Volkmann's compositions. Each of the four movements has a distinct individuality of its own, the entrancing waltz which constitutes the third, finding especial favor with the audience. It was all played to absolute perfection, and will long haunt the memories of those who heard it. Mendelssohn's beautiful "Scotch" symphony, now familiar as "household words," brought the concert to a close, and Mr. Nikisch showed most conclusively his absolute command over the orchestra, which now responds to him, as if he were playing upon a solo instrument. The personality of the orchestra is in especial demand throughout this symphony and the graduations of light and shade were never more apparent. The pianissimo of the drum was a marvel to listen to, while the notes of the flute and obeo were of crystalline clearness and brilliancy. Mr. Schroder's cello delighted his listeners in the beautiful solo of the first movement, all the strings working wonders in the way of virtuosity. The clarinet is especially favored in this symphony with a peculiarly dainty effect in the scherzo which was exquisitely played. This movement is the only one which really suggests Scotch music, and Schumann wrote that the Italian pictures of the A minor symphony are so beautiful as to make up to one who has not visited Italy, for never having seen that blessed land. The Allegro was beautifully sung, and the Finale, "Allegro Vivacissimo" was worked up with splendid élan. The next concert will be given on Thursday evening, December 1.

C. R.

GAZETTE, Worcester, Mass.
Date 11-21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The analytical programmes are out for the symphony concert to-morrow night, and certainly never has a more brilliant concert been rendered in this city. The "Sakuntala" Overture is a musical expression of Kalidasa's Sanskrit poem portraying love, despair, revenge, with the most gorgeous richness of coloring. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be heard for the first time in two solo numbers. The concert will begin promptly at 7:45 P. M., as the orchestra returns to Boston this same evening. It is hoped that the ladies will appear without bonnets.

Morning Worcester Spy
THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS DISHONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH
WORCESTER.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 23, 1892.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A LARGE AUDIENCE LISTENS TO INSPIRING MUSIC.

AN INTENSELY MODERN PROGRAM, BRILLIANT WITH LAVISH ORCHESTRAL COLORING—MRS. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of a series of four concerts in this city last evening before an audience that filled nearly everything save the galleries in Mechanics Hall. Some of the best known players were absent. The program was as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "Sakuntala."

Saint-Saens, concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor, op. 44.

Wagner, Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."

Solos for piano: Rameau, Gavotte with variations; Schubert-Tausig, march Militaire.

Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The large audiences assured for this series make reasonable the expectation that the course will be repeated next year, and in fact be made a permanent institution. As the Boston managers themselves say, they never let go if once they get a foothold in a town.

The orchestra has sometimes played Goldmark's famous overture with finer finish and more perfect unity, but seldom with more sensuous effect than it played it last night. Since the overture has become a concert favorite in America there has appeared a disposition among critics to decry the work, but, though one may not care to have it for breakfast, dinner and supper and between meals, the work wears well, and new beauties are certain to be discovered at each successive hearing.

Saint-Saens' C minor concerto ranks next to the more common No. 2, in G minor. Like most of his concertos, it departs from the established form, the first allegro being dwarfed to a mere prelude of the andante or second movement. The third movement is made up of a sort of scherzo, an episodic andante and a vigorous final allegro. It is an interesting and virile work. Mrs. Zeisler gave a charming reading of the piano score, for the most part, especially of the slow movements and the more emotional passages. The performance of the orchestra, though the concerto had been played in Boston only a few weeks ago, was decidedly ragged, at times, and was not up to the standard. Some readers may be gratified to learn, by the way, that the composer's name is pronounced approximately like "Sent-Sance," with the broad sound of the a.

Wagner's orchestral music seldom fails to please, and it was to be expected that the orchestra's very romantic delivery of the dramatic "Tristan" prelude and "Love's Death" should be received with demonstrations of delight by the audience.

Mrs. Zeisler's solos were attractive, chiefly as they furnished opportunity for the display of clever virtuosity. In the Rameau gavotte she was especially successful in the clearness, delicacy and accuracy of her execution. In the more strenuous measures of the Schubert-Tausig military march she was less satisfying, after the high hopes she had raised in the less pompous and more musical introduction. Considered as a whole her performance last evening shows that she has developed her art in various ways since her last appearance in this city, where she is a deserving favorite.

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony has been a puzzle if not a stumbling block to the musical doctrinaires. Except that the first section of the first allegro is not repeated; that a waltz displaces the scherzo, and that an andante of the "God Save the Queen" variety, largely in unisons, is dropped bodily into a blizzard-like Muscovite finale, the form of the symphony follows the classic model, and these innovations were not original with this composer. On the other hand, its spirit is no more that of the symphony than is that of a Liszt symphonic poem or Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch." Writers have agreed to disagree about it, but a majority praise it with certain cautious reservations. Its chief beauties are obvious enough at the first hearing, and it wears better than perhaps might be expected, for the themes are tuneful, if not always dignified, and the instrumentation is gorgeous.

Those who have heard much modern Russian music say that some composers have written eccentric Slavic rhythms, coarse Tartar melodies and ferocious Cossack harmonies to which the originality of Tschaikowsky is but as skimmed milk to Kirschwasser or Vodka. Such composers are said to spell their names Dargomijsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky, etc., and license nobody west of the Vistula to pronounce them. Really, there seems little to complain of in the Tschaikowsky symphony, save in the excessive working out section in the first movement, and that should not be displeasing to the doctrinaires, though it may be tiresome to others. The audience applauded the last three movements heartily.

The next concert will be given Dec. 29, and Nordica will be the soloist.

After the concert, which was an admirable beginning for the series, Mrs. Zeisler was very handsomely entertained by the Misses Burnside of Chestnut street. Present, also, were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ward Greene, Miss Durand of Rochester, N. Y.; Walter S. Kennedy, Charles A. Williams, Dr. W. R. Gilman and Dr. Leonard Wheeler. Next October Mrs. Zeisler intends to go to Vienna for further study.

EVENING GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 23, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large and Appreciative Audience.

The first of a series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch, took place last evening in Mechanics Hall. Special efforts at procuring subscriptions had been begun as early as last spring by public-spirited ladies interested in music, so that the success of the course was guaranteed before it opened. There were not many persons in the galleries last evening, although they contain some of the most desirable seats in the house, but the floor was substantially filled, and the audience applauded with great regularity.

The programme was made up from Goldmark, Saint-Saens, Wagner, and Tschaikowsky, with two solos for the piano-forte, Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler being the pianist. Not to criticise very seriously, the grouping of the selections, the listener must have been struck, particularly in the first hour, with a certain repetition of his musical impressions. Not that Saint Saens resembles the German composers, but the wailing and the pleading of the violins in "Sakuntala" seemed to find and echo in the French concerto and even in the sad selections from "Tristan and Isolde." With the military march, so admirably played by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, there came an entire contrast of theme and tempo, which was refreshing. The somewhat new fashion of putting the symphony last on the programme is also open to debate, although we admit the character of the Russian music, which was tolerably easy to comprehend without fatigue, made its place at the end of the evening not particularly out of place. It may here be noted that this symphony (No. 5, in E Minor) was greatly cut to save time, in the waltz movement and the Finale.

The concert was of course enjoyable, as the music of the best composers so intelligently performed must always be to the cultivated musical ear, and it is to be hoped that the Symphony Orchestra, having got a foothold here, will keep it in future years.

The sensible essays of the official programme, although explanatory rather than critical, save the newspapers some perfunctoy work at least, and there is nothing new to be said of Mr. Nikisch, or his band. The playing of Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler merits very high praise. Her power and precision are remarkable, and on occasion, her touch can be made sensitive and delicate. She will take the highest rank among artists and has improved since her last appearance here.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.
Published Daily and Sunday.
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1892.

FIRST OF THE SERIES.

Nikisch and Bloomfield-Zeisler at Mechanics Hall.

The scene at Mechanics hall, last night, reminded one of the days of the festival. All musical Worcester was there and it was to their credit and their good taste that the cold, biting night did not prevent them hearing one of the finest instrumental concerts that has ever been given in Worcester.

The occasion was the first of a series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra. Very little needs to be said of that splendid body of instruments except that it is, perhaps, without a superior in the country. Every man in the orchestra is an artist.

Incidentally, last night, there was a good deal of interest in the appearance of Arthur Nikisch, as conductor. He disappointed a number of people in the hall inasmuch as he did not throw himself all over the stage or enter into any gymnastic capers, even when he was conducting the selections from the most gymnastic of all composers—Wagner. But while Nikisch was calm and stately and dignified, he showed, from first to last, an admirable command of his forces.

The orchestra presented Goldmark's overture "Sakuntata," Wagner's vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Triston and Isolde," in addition to the famous symphony No. 5 in E minor of Tschaikowsky, with its four movements, and in them all it gave evidence of the refinement, delicacy, strength and sweetness which have helped to make the Boston symphony orchestra what it is today.

Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist of the evening, and on her Steinway she easily shared the honors with Nikisch and his instruments. The lady, girlish in form and feature, has been heard in Worcester before, so that it was no stranger who was so cordially welcomed last night when she sat down to play Saint-Saens' concerto, No. 4, in C minor. Her execution was, as usual, finished to a degree, and she was so vociferously encored that she had to play again. The same story may be told of her soul, Rameau's gavot, which was brilliantly played, and Schubert-Tausig's march Militaire.

But, indeed, the whole concert was a thorough artistic success, and provoked during the evening as much applause as a Worcester fashionable audience is capable of.

The next concert in the series will be given on Thursday night, the 29th of December, when Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the vocalis..

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 26, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the audience at the fifth Symphony unquestionably attached to Mr. E. A. MacDowell and his pianoforte, in spite of the herculean efforts of Mr. Apthorp in the programme-book to excite enthusiasm for that object of his admiration—one might almost say adoration—Brahms, whose third symphony began the evening. It does no good, in praising this able, but laborious and often abstruse composer, to say that other musicians before him were not liked and appreciated in their times, and that therefore people ought to be advised and to proceed at once to the enshrining of Brahms in their hearts in the same niche with Beethoven. We are all getting to understand his ways a little better than at first, to bear with his ponderousness, his over-elaboration and his complicated textures, and to like what is clear, sweet, simple, strong or eloquent in him. But it is too soon to insist upon his general and entire acceptance. We are living now, not in some future period, when the musical shall (perhaps) have been drawn quite to his ways of thought and expression. Let not the reader imagine, however, that we are hastening to exalt Mr. MacDowell's star above that of Brahms or to proclaim his to be the superior genius. But his ideas are fresh, his intuitions definite, his writing able and often either impressive or captivating, and his personality and performance attractive and commanding. He inclines too much toward the eccentrically-fanciful in his light and humorous moments and his vocal writing is apt to be intricate and almost unsingable. But he has power and independence, he understands his art and its instruments and he does justice alike to the orchestral and solo parts. His concerto is well put together and holds attention from the first bar, the first and last movements being the most characteristic of his peculiar talent in their fiery speed and their urgent spirit. His performance of the piano part was striking in its brilliancy, its defiance of all difficulties and its constant strength, and it showed delicacy when required. There is a pleasant calm in the andante, and this movement was read with gravity and reserve. The remainder of the programme calls for no comment, consisting as it did of the long familiar dances from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and the noisy, splurgy, melodramatic "Tasso" of Liszt, all exceedingly well played.

The programme for tonight is of better selection and arrangement. It stands thus: Dvoràk's dramatic overture, "Hassitska," for the first time in Boston, a violoncello concerto of Davidoff, for Mr. Schroeder; Svensen's orchestral legend, "Zoharayda," for the first time, and Schumann's second symphony.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Quartettes by Mozart and by Beethoven, followed by Schumann's piano quintette in E major, composed the programme for the third concert in this series. The arrangement was only just less than perfection, for some allowance had to be made for a few inequalities in the last work. The Mozart was played with a fanciful delicacy and a fine light touch, while the Beethoven had breadth, depth, fulness and that equal balancing of parts which has sometimes been forgotten in a too great subordination of the other players to their eminent leaders. Mr. Sherwood was the pianist and he evidently took up his task with earnestness and enthusiasm. He apparently underrated the sonority of the instrument he used and occasionally quite overpowered his coadjutors, also accelerating the pace upon them now and then. His brilliant, decisive and forceful manner is well-known in Boston and he displayed it splendidly, but not to the point of making the listener forget that he lacks tenderness and mellowness of passion.

[49]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1892.

The musical feature of the week was the performance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's first concerto for piano, A minor, at the Symphony concert last evening. It was played by the composer, who was applauded enthusiastically and thrice recalled. The concerto was played in this country in 1888 and 1889 and in European cities in 1890 and 1891 by Teresa Carreño and others, but I am told Mr. MacDowell played it last week for the first time.

Traditional form is perhaps more respected in this concerto than in the later works of the talented composer; but this respect is not merely the creature of conventionality, for Mr. MacDowell shows his respect in many original ways. First of all the music is eminently euphonious; it is singularly free from slavish following of esteemed composers who worked out their thoughts before Mr. MacDowell was big enough to sit at his desk. It is melodious and the themes are delightfully treated. They do not reappear like sulky children whipped by the schoolmaster, but with smiling faces, or even roguishly they come before the audience, for they know full well that they are welcome visitors. The instrumentation is masterly throughout, especially in the discretion, the self restraint shown by the composer.

The other numbers of this fifth Symphony concert were Brahms' third symphony, the menuet and the "Waltz of Sylphs" from "The Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's "Tasso." The playing of the orchestra was in the main excellent. There were ragged passages in the second movement of the symphony, but the first and last movements, as well as the other numbers of the program, were played exceedingly well.

* * *

BOSTON, November 20, 1892.

THE first of three subscription concerts was given by the Adamowski Quartet in Chickering Hall the afternoon of Tuesday, the 15th. The instrumental numbers were Mozart's G major quartet, No. 12, and Gade's D major quartet, op. 63. Miss Marguerite Hall sang songs by Arne, Purcell and Arthur Somervell. The quartet is now made up of the Adamowski brothers, Timothy and Joseph, A. Moldauer and M. Zach. They are all members of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is a pleasure to record a marked improvement in the performance of the players. The virtuoso blood of Mr. T. Adamowski has in the past been injurious to the proper balance of the quartet and to the spirit of the earlier composers. Unrest, unnecessary shifting of rhythm, an absence of reserve power and suggested strength, these were too often the characteristics of the performance of last year. Even now the ensemble is by no means perfect. The intonation of the brothers is not always above suspicion, and at times the brothers are too much in evidence. But where there is general improvement, both in conception and the carrying out, one can afford to be silent concerning little matters of detail, such as the proper execution of certain ornaments and questions of individual taste.

The quartet was more successful in the Gade composition. The serenity and the restrained passion of Mozart are still a severe tax to the players. Miss Hall sang the English songs with taste. The numbers by Arthur Somervell, a pupil of Kiel and an Englishman of rare fancy, were a refreshing novelty.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelties chosen by Mr. Arthur Nikisch for the programme of the sixth Boston Symphony Orchestra proved to be more numerous than interesting. Of the four numbers given three were new to Boston, although two at least of these have been heard in New York without making any marked sensation. All were kindly received on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Antonin Dvorak. Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67.
Karl Davidoff. Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, one movement.
Johan Severin Svendsen. "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra. op. 11.
Robert Alexander Schumann. Symphony No. 2 in C major. op. 61.

The Husitska overture seemed like the perfunctory work of a poet laureate. It was composed for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre in Prague. The programme gives the German spelling Pray, which would not probably delight the composer's heart if his dislikes in other things of the nationality run as far as spelling. The phrase taken from Hussiteau hymn, which forms the theme of the first movement, is ingeniously, but somewhat uninterestingly worked. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and did all with the Davidoff concerto that could have been wished, and his playing won a double recall. The Legend of the Alhambra was the subject of the Svendsen composition, and it is a bit doubtful if it was quite Irving's idea, but it proved to be tuneful in parts, if somewhat light. The Schumann Symphony was not only the feature by contrast, but was played with perhaps more spirit than the other numbers, and if the tempi were not as of old they were of as Mr. Nikisch of the new. The next programme has the Grieg suite for string orchestra. The Flying Dutchman overture and, for the first time in America, Eugen D'Albert's Symphony in F major.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging from any such standpoint as would not entorce an individual preference regarding certain music about which even doctors differ the programme for last evening's symphony concert was wisely chosen. The "Husitzka" overture with which the concert opened had its first performance in this city, it was composed by Herr Dvorak for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre at Prague, and he resolved instead of writing the ordinary piece d'occasion, to commerate in the tone-language a great epoch in the history of his country. So with this end in view he chose the Hussites' wars as his subject. Students of musical history are well aware of the significance which attaches to the Hussitean hymns and will learn with interest that Dvorak has used a phrase from one of these hymns as the second theme of the introductory adagio of his overture. The theme is characteristic and undergoes numerous metamorphoses. With grotesque effect it is boldly thrown out by the cornets and then dies away to a sigh, but finally calls up in the imagination a vigorous picture of battle. The chief themes of the work are developed with uncommon variety of treatment, and the whole is a richly orchestrated, sonorous composition in regular form; but it is, nevertheless, intensely personal as regards the composer, whom it reveals in perfection not only as regards the scope, depth and height of his genius, but in his mood and habit of thought. Regarding the soloist for the concert, Mr. Alwin Shroder is especially entitled to a thankful recognition for introducing the 'cello concerto Davidhoff, for despite any unfavorable judgment which the work may receive as the result of a single hearing, Mr. Schroeder at least should be the best judge of its technical merits. He must have thought it a masterly work ror the cello or he would not have selected it for an important performance. The concerto as a whole was destined to achieve some success at the hands of so finished an artist as Mr. Schroeder, and it was certainly not his fault if no musician will care to hear the work a second time. for the performance was in every way masterly. The poetic justice of the interpretation, the charming delicacy, culture and refinement of his tone shaking, as well as the absolute fidelity of his intonation, were invariably not only in the beautiful cantalile passages, but in the virtuosic roulades and arpeggio, the performance was of entrancing and flawless interest and was so acknowledged by the audience.

Following the concerto the "Zorahazda" legend for Orchestra by Svendsen, was given for the first time in Boston. The most obvious fault of the work as a whole is with its monotonous color and character. It is also kapellmeistermusik pure and simple or as the English writers would quite as aptly call it "organist's music." The attempt at fidelity to Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra" is strained and with all its yearning it never succeeds in shaking off its sluggishness. The concert ended with Schumann's symphony in C major, a work which somewhat unworthily follows the immortal symphony in B flat major as it is neither based on lowest deeps nor does it tower to transcendent heights. It was performed with all the justice which that perfect balance of parts for which the orchestra is noted and all the refined tonal quality that could be brought in play. Such was the general character of the playing throughout the concert, which however, wos perhaps the least interesting of the series t u far.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

It would seem enough to acknowledge for the Kneisel Quartet concert, Monday evening, that it began well, went on well and ended well, just as the Kneisel Quartet concerts invariably do, with music old and new, but always chaste in quality. True, no composer of the present generation was represented on the programme for Mo day evening but the Beethoven Quartet op. 95 in F minor sounded new and was doubtless unfamiliar to all present. The Mozart Quartet in E flat offered a capital illustration of many from his pen that. thanks to Mr. Kneisel and his associates. are oftener heard here now than formerly. Each movement was religiously well performed and with that high order of musical intelligence and sympathetic feeling pervading the performance that were superbly true to the reputation of the Kneisel Quartet. It was listened to with such obvious pleasure that all doubts must have vanished as to whether an audience familiar with the imposing and kaleidoscopic ensemble of modern music would turn the cold shoulder to Mozart or ever cease to reverence him. The effect of such music is always healthy, always elevating. As is even more true of the Haydn quartets it is like going to the original source of a stream which tributary brooklets have in vain attempted to pollute. The interest was well sustained throughout the opening movement, and the fine performance of the finale continued the impression that every musician present, whether amateur or professional, must have felt for the genius that gave it birth, a genius who has never been so universally recognized in the musical world as today. Surely the reaction which has so decisively taken place in favor of the old and too long neglected masters, means and methods must be somewhat discouraging to the higher development illusions of modern fanatics. The Beethoven quartet was chiefly interesting as a novelty and would seem scarcely to demand frequent hearings, for in very few qualities, if any, does it equal Beethoven at his worthiest. Schumann's quintet in E flat was the royal number of the programme. Scholarship and inspiration have combined in this quintet in creating the clearest, if not the most effective model ever cut by Robert Schumann, and the performance by Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who has seldom been more heartily welcomed here, and the Kneisel Quartet was excellent. The heart was unanimous and an admirable interpretation was gained by it. C. L. C.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1892.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, contained many novel features. Of the four numbers presented only one had ever before been given in Boston, and the others were therefore particularly attractive. Mr. Nikisch has been very liberal the present season with compositions of Dvorak, and the programme was opened with his dramatic overture "Hersitska." It is a thoroughly enjoyable work, replete with unique ideas, melodious themes and graceful movements, and, under the skilful reading of Mr. Nikisch, made a most pleasing acquisition to the orchestra's repertory.

The "legend" for the orchestra, "Zorahayda," Svendsen, was beautifully rendered and afforded a striking example of this author's peculiar ideas. The closing number was Schumann's symphony in C major, which was given in the usual masterly manner.

The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, and the number played was Dandoff's concerto No. 3. This was new to Boston and met with appreciation, but was marred in some instances by false intonations. Mr. Schroeder's execution is artistic, and the difficult numbers were well rendered. The seventh concert will be given next Saturday evening at which the following programme will be given: Edvard Grieg. suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time;" Eugen D'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4 (first time in America); Richard Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

For the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, the following programme was performed: Dramatic Overture, "Husaitska," Dvorak (first time); Concerto for violincello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," Legend for orchestra, Svenaden (first time), and Symphony No. 2, in C Schumann. The soloist was Mr. Alwyn Schroeder. The selections were of no great interest, except the symphony by Robert Alexander Schumann. It was comforting to have the composer's middle name on the programme; for it did away with all possible misconceptions that might have arisen regarding which Schumann it was who really wrote the symphony. The Dvorak overture is a bit of pretentious dulness, now and then absolutely vulgar, and suggesting occasionally the manner in which the dear, conventional, industrious old Küffner ground out overtures some fifty years ago. The Svenaden legend is a bit of pretty weakness, richly harmonized and scored, but meaning nothing in particular. The concerto is dull and over long drawn out for what it has to say. It has some graceful and some brilliant moments in it, but it is of slight musical value. It was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, who was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The Symphony stood out finely from the midst of this otherwise stupid programme, despite the fact that the work was, on the whole, somewhat roughly and noisily played, and now and then taken at a pace better calculated to display the virtuosity of the orchestra than to pay conscientious observance to the indications of Robert Alexander Schumann. The programme for the next concert is the following curious medley: Suite for string orchestra, from "Holberg's Time," Grieg; Symphony No. 1, Op. 4, Eugen d' Albert (first time); and overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner. There will be no soloist. Verily programme making is not among the finer gifts of the programme-maker.

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. W. H. Sherwood gave its third concert of the season, in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet No. 3, E-flat, Mozart; Quartet No. 11, F-minor, Beethoven; Quintet for piano and strings, E flat, Op. 44, Schumann. The Mozart Quartet, a perfect work, always fascinating in the hearing, and one that cannot be heard too often at a time when the purely beautiful in musical art finds no exponent among living composers, was exquisitely read and played. The high finish that characterizes the performances of this fine organization bears with especial felicity on the music of Mozart, and it may be added that the interpretation was wholly free from the sugary sentimentality that is so often foisted on the composer by those who read him as if he were without virility. The Beethoven work, is not among the strongest and the most interesting of the composer's works in this class, though it shows him in his fullest and highest development. It has many moments of sturdy impressiveness, but also many in which eccentricity obtrudes itself at the expense of clearness. Its vigor, however, is immense, often exciting, and there are few Beethoven quartets in which the master has shown greater skill in extracting from the instruments so wonderful a variety of contrasts in effects. It was played faultlessly throughout; in fact, its performance was as fine an example of quartet playing as we can hope to hear. The noble Schumann Quintet was, perhaps, the least satisfying interpretation of the concert. It may be that the ear was tired after listening to two quartets, and was unequal to the appreciation of another long work, but it seemed to drag. Mr. Sherwood's playing of the piano part was brilliant and masterly, leaving but little to be desired except something more, now and then, of dynamic temperance. Taken altogether, however, he gave a fine exemplification of masterly virtuosity swayed by artistic discretion, and fairly earned the hearty approval that was accorded him. The next concert will be given Monday evening, Dec. 26.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1892.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwin Schroeder.

At the sixth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, leading 'cello player of the band, was the soloist, his appearance being made in Karl Davidoff's concerto No. 3, one movement, and the success he made fully realized all the pleasant anticipations of those who were familiar with his triumphs in former performances here. He unites in his work breadth of style, fine technical attainments, rare purity of tone, and a delicacy and refinement in his playing, upon occasion, which combine to give him a well deserved prominence among the best 'cello soloists of the day. The single movement of the concerto gave the player ample opportunity to display his skill, and the hearty and enthusiastic fashion in which his masterly interpretation of its many beauties was recognized proved the audience to be keenly alive to the player's artistic merits.

The Dvorak tendencies of the day were recognized by Director Nikisch, in the placing upon the progr mme of this composer's "Dramatic Overture," written in 1883 for the opening of a theatre in Prag. It is a notable illustration of the musical fertility of Dvorak, who is seldom guilty of writing without a purpose, or without valuable results. Its leading idea finds expression in a grand hymn-like theme of a solemn character, first introduced by the wood wind section in full harmony. This is shown in strong contrast with a brilliant them later on, and a fine dramatic climax is worked out with rare skill, the overture concluding with a return to the first theme, which makes a most effective coda.

Another novelty of the evening consisted of Johan Severin Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, op. 11, a composition full of the odd characteristics of its writer's style, a strikingly beautiful movement, being that for solo violin with pizzicato accompaniment, in which Mr. Kneisel gave his best efforts. It was most admirably played throughout, and afforded much pleasure.

The C major symphony of Schumann ended the concert, and its grand performance was thoroughly appreciated.

Next Saturday's programme consists of Grieg's suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time"; Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, Op. 4, for the first time in America, and Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 27, 1892.

Programme of Novelties by the Symphony Orchestra.

Novelties predominated on the programme provided by Director Nikisch for the sixth of this season's symphony concerts. A dramatic overture by Antonin Dvorak, a concerto for violoncello by Karl Davidoff, and a legend for orchestra by Johan Severin Svendsen were all played for the first time in Boston, and with the exception of the latter, all proved most acceptable to the audience.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and the appearance of this very popular member of Mr. Nikisch's band was heartily welcomed. His solo playing at the symphony concerts a year ago proved him entitled to rank among the first of 'celloists in America, and established him firmly in the favor of Bostonians.

His playing yesterday more than fulfilled expectations. His style seemed broader and more finished than heretofore, his tone sweeter and purer, his technique freer, and, if possible, more exact.

Davidoff's concerto, No. 3, in one movement, afforded him ample opportunity for a display of his virtuosity. It is a showy composition, fairly bristling with difficult and brilliant passages for the solo instrument, and having a rich and substantial orchestration. After its performance Mr. Schroeder was three times enthusiastically recalled.

The Dvorak dramatic overture, "Husitska," is a distinctly descriptive piece, and is written in the broad and impressive manner for which the works of this composer are noted. Its subject is the Hussite wars, and the music is most suggestive of fierce and savage warfare. The solemn grandeur of the opening harmony was superbly interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, especially commendable being the work of the wooden wind instruments, and scarcely less effective was the playing of the fiery, martial passages which add so much to the brilliancy of the second movement.

Johan Severin Svendsen's legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," did not make a particularly favorable impression. The composer has taken for his subject Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." So far as suggestiveness in the music is concerned, he might as well have chosen any other subject.

The first of the three movements is the most interesting. In this there are some novel orchestral effects and some brilliant harmonies.

The other two movements, although treated in a scholarly manner, are devoid of originality, and are for the most part colorless and conventional to a degree. An admirable performance was given the composition.

Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major was the concluding offering at yesterday's concerto. Mr. Nikisch is particularly happy in his reading of Schumann's writings, and it is not remembered that a more satisfactory performance of this fine symphony was ever given in Boston than was the performance last evening.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Suite for string orchestra, from Holberg's Time.....Grieg
Symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4.....Eugen d'Albert
(First time in America.)
Overture, Flying Dutchman.....Wagner

[50]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1892.

The musical feature of the week was the performance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's first concerto for piano, A minor, at the Symphony concert last evening. It was played by the composer, who was applauded enthusiastically and thrice recalled. The concerto was played in this country in 1888 and 1889 and in European cities in 1890 and 1891 by Teresa Carreño and others, but I am told Mr. MacDowell played it last week for the first time.

Traditional form is perhaps more respected in this concerto than in the later works of the talented composer; but this respect is not merely the creature of conventionality, for Mr. MacDowell shows his respect in many original ways. First of all the music is eminently euphonious; it is singularly free from slavish following of esteemed composers who worked out their thoughts before Mr. MacDowell was big enough to sit at his desk. It is melodious and the themes are delightfully treated. They do not reappear like sulky children whipped by the schoolmaster, but with smiling faces, or even roguishly they come before the audience, for they know full well that they are welcome visitors. The instrumentation is masterly throughout, especially in the discretion, the self restraint shown by the composer.

The other numbers of this fifth Symphony concert were Brahms' third symphony, the menuet and the "Waltz of Sylphs" from "The Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's "Tasso." The playing of the orchestra was in the main excellent. There were ragged passages in the second movement of the symphony, but the first and last movements, as well as the other numbers of the program, were played exceedingly well.

* * *

BOSTON, November 20, 1892.

THE first of three subscription concerts was given by the Adamowski Quartet in Chickering Hall the afternoon of Tuesday, the 15th. The instrumental numbers were Mozart's G major quartet, No. 12, and Gade's D major quartet, op. 63. Miss Marguerite Hall sang songs by Arne, Purcell and Arthur Somervell. The quartet is now made up of the Adamowski brothers, Timothy and Joseph, A. Moldauer and M. Zach. They are all members of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is a pleasure to record a marked improvement in the performance of the players. The virtuoso blood of Mr. T. Adamowski has in the past been injurious to the proper balance of the quartet and to the spirit of the earlier composers. Unrest, unnecessary shifting of rhythm, an absence of reserve power and suggested strength, these were too often the characteristics of the performance of last year. Even now the ensemble is by no means perfect. The intonation of the brothers is not always above suspicion, and at times the brothers are too much in evidence. But where there is general improvement, both in conception and the carrying out, one can afford to be silent concerning little matters of detail, such as the proper execution of certain ornaments and questions of individual taste.

The quartet was more successful in the Gade composition. The serenity and the restrained passion of Mozart are still a severe tax to the players. Miss Hall sang the English songs with taste. The numbers by Arthur Somervell, a pupil of Kiel and an Englishman of rare fancy, were a refreshing novelty.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelties chosen by Mr. Arthur Nikisch for the programme of the sixth Boston Symphony Orchestra proved to be more numerous than interesting. Of the four numbers given three were new to Boston, although two at least of these have been heard in New York without making any marked sensation. All were kindly received on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Antonin Dvorak. Dramatic overture. "Husitska." op. 67.
Karl Davidoff. Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, one movement.
Johan Severin Svendsen. "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra. op. 11.
Robert Alexander Schumann. Symphony No. 2 in C major. op. 61.

The Husitska overture seemed like the perfunctory work of a poet laureate. It was composed for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre in Prague. The programme gives the German spelling Pray, which would not probably delight the composer's heart if his dislikes in other things of the nationality run as far as spelling. The phrase taken from Hussiteau hymn, which forms the theme of the first movement, is ingeniously, but somewhat uninterestingly worked. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and did all with the Davidoff concerto that could have been wished, and his playing won a double recall. The Legend of the Alhambra was the subject of the Svendsen composition, and it is a bit doubtful if it was quite Irving's idea, but it proved to be tuneful in parts, if somewhat light. The Schumann Symphony was not only the feature by contrast, but was played with perhaps more spirit than the other numbers, and if the tempi were not as of old they were of as Mr. Nikisch of the new. The next programme has the Grieg suite for string orchestra. The Flying Dutchman overture and, for the first time in America, Eugen D'Albert's Symphony in F major.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 27, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging from any such standpoint as would not entorce an individual preference regarding certain music about which even doctors differ the programme for last evening's symphony concert was wisely chosen. The "Husitzka" overture with which the concert opened had its first performance in this city, it was composed by Herr Dvorak for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre at Prague, and he resolved instead of writing the ordinary piece d'occasion, to commerate in the tone-language a great epoch in the history of his country. So with this end in view he chose the Hussites' wars as his subject. Students of musical history are well aware of the significance which attaches to the Hussitean hymns and will learn with interest that Dvorak has used a phrase from one of these hymns as the second theme of the introductory adagio of his overture. The theme is characteristic and undergoes numerous metamorphoses. With grotesque effect it is boldly thrown out by the coronets and then dies away to a sigh, but finally calls up in the imagination a vigorous picture of battle. The chief themes of the work are developed with uncommon variety of treatment, and the whole is a richly orchestrated, sonorous composition in regular form; but it is, nevertheless, intensely personal as regards the composer, whom it reveals in perfection not only as regards the scope, depth and height of his genius, but in his mood and habit of thought. Regarding the soloist for the concert, Mr. Alwin Shroder is especially entitled to a thankful recognition for introducing the 'cello concerto Davidhoff, for despite any unfavorable judgment which the work may receive as the result of a single hearing, Mr. Schroeder at least should be the best judge of its technical merits. He must have thought it a masterly work ror the cello or he would not have selected it for an important performance. The concerto as a whole was destined to achieve some success at the hands of so finished an artist as Mr. Schroeder, and it was certainly not his fault if no musician will care to hear the work a second time, for the performance was in every way masterly. The poetic justice of the interpretation, the charming delicacy, culture and refinement of his tone shaking, as well as the absolute fidelity of his intonation, were invariably not only in the beautiful cantalile passages, but in the virtuosic roulades and arpeggio, the performance was of entrancing and flawless interest and was so acknowledged by the audience.

Following the concerto the "Zorahazda" legend for Orchestra by Svendsen, was given for the first time in Boston. The most obvious fault of the work as a whole is with its monotonous color and character. It is also kapellmeistermusik pure and simple or as the English writers would quite as aptly call it "organist's music." The attempt at fidelity to Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra" is strained and with all its yearning it never succeeds in shaking off its sluggishness. The concert ended with Schumann's symphony in C major, a work which somewhat unworthily follows the immortal symphony in B flat major as it is neither based on lowest deeps nor does it tower to transcendent heights. It was performed with all the justice which that perfect balance of parts for which the orchestra is noted and all the refined tonal quality that could be brought in play. Such was the general character of the playing throughout the concert, which however, was perhaps the least interesting of the series thus far.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

It would seem enough to acknowledge for the Kneisel Quartet concert, Monday evening, that it began well, went on well and ended well, just as the Kneisel Quartet concerts invariably do, with music old and new, but always chaste in quality. True, no composer of the present generation was represented on the programme for Monday evening but the Beethoven Quartet op. 95 in F minor sounded new and was doubtless unfamiliar to all present. The Mozart Quartet in E flat offered a capital illustration of many from his pen that, thanks to Mr. Kneisel and his associates, are oftener heard here now than formerly. Each movement was religiously well performed and with that high order of musical intelligence and sympathetic feeling pervading the performance that were superbly true to the reputation of the Kneisel Quartet. It was listened to with such obvious pleasure that all doubts must have vanished as to whether an audience familiar with the imposing and kaleidoscopic ensemble of modern music would turn the cold shoulder to Mozart or ever cease to reverence him. The effect of such music is always healthy, always elevating. As is even more true of the Haydn quartets it is like going to the original source of a stream which tributary brooklets have in vain attempted to pollute. The interest was well sustained throughout the opening movement, and the fine performance of the finale continued the impression that every musician present, whether amateur or professional, must have felt for the genius that gave it birth, a genius who has never been so universally recognized in the musical world as today. Surely the reaction which has so decisively taken place in favor of the old and too long neglected masters, means and methods must be somewhat discouraging to the higher development illusions of modern fanatics. The Beethoven quartet was chiefly interesting as a novelty and would seem scarcely to demand frequent hearings, for in very few qualities, if any, does it equal Beethoven at his worthiest. Schumann's quintet in E flat was the royal number of the programme. Scholarship and inspiration have combined in this quintet in creating the clearest, if not the most effective model ever cut by Robert Schumann, and the performance by Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who has seldom been more heartily welcomed here, and the Kneisel Quartet was excellent. The heart was unanimous and an admirable interpretation was gained by it. C. L. C.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1892.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, contained many novel features. Of the four numbers presented only one had ever before been given in Boston, and the others were therefore particularly attractive. Mr. Nikisch has been very liberal the present season with compositions of Dvorak, and the programme was opened with his dramatic overture "Hersitska." It is a thoroughly enjoyable work, replete with unique ideas, melodious themes and graceful movements, and, under the skilful reading of Mr. Nikisch, made a most pleasing acquisition to the orchestra's repertory.

The "legend" for the orchestra, "Zorahayda," Svendsen, was beautifully rendered and afforded a striking example of this author's peculiar ideas. The closing number was Schumann's symphony in C major, which was given in the usual masterly manner.

The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, and the number played was Dandoff's concerto No. 3. This was new to Boston and met with appreciation, but was marred in some instances by false intonations. Mr. Schroeder's execution is artistic, and the difficult numbers were well rendered. The seventh concert will be given next Saturday evening at which the following programme will be given: Edvard Grieg, suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time;" Eugen D'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4 (first time in America); Richard Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

For the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, the following programme was performed: Dramatic Overture, "Husaitska," Dvorak (first time); Concerto for violincello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," Legend for orchestra, Svenaden (first time), and Symphony No. 2, in C, Schumann. The soloist was Mr. Alwyn Schroeder. The selections were of no great interest, except the symphony by Robert Alexander Schumann. It was comforting to have the composer's middle name on the programme; for it did away with all possible misconceptions that might have arisen regarding which Schumann it was who really wrote the symphony. The Dvorak overture is a bit of pretentious dulness, now and then absolutely vulgar, and suggesting occasionally the manner in which the dear, conventional, industrious old Küffner ground out overtures some fifty years ago. The Svenaden legend is a bit of pretty weakness, richly harmonized and scored, but meaning nothing in particular. The concerto is dull and over long drawn out for what it has to say. It has some graceful and some brilliant moments in it, but it is of slight musical value. It was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, who was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The Symphony stood out finely from the midst of this otherwise stupid programme, despite the fact that the work was, on the whole, somewhat roughly and noisily played, and now and then taken at a pace better calculated to display the virtuosity of the orchestra than to pay conscientious observance to the indications of Robert Alexander Schumann. The programme for the next concert is the following curious medley: Suite for string orchestra, from "Holberg's Time," Grieg; Symphony No. 1, Op. 4, Eugen d' Albert (first time); and overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner. There will be no soloist. Verily programme making is not among the finer gifts of the programme-maker.

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. W. H. Sherwood gave its third concert of the season, in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet No. 3, E-flat, Mozart; Quartet No. 11, F-minor, Beethoven; Quintet for piano and strings, E flat, Op. 44, Schumann. The Mozart Quartet, a perfect work, always fascinating in the hearing, and one that cannot be heard too often at a time when the purely beautiful in musical art finds no exponent among living composers, was exquisitely read and played. The high finish that characterizes the performances of this fine organization bears with especial felicity on the music of Mozart, and it may be added that the interpretation was wholly free from the sugary sentimentality that is so often foisted on the composer by those who read him as if he were without virility. The Beethoven work, is not among the strongest and the most interesting of the composer's works in this class, though it shows him in his fullest and highest development. It has many moments of sturdy impressiveness, but also many in which eccentricity obtrudes itself at the expense of clearness. Its vigor, however, is immense, often exciting, and there are few Beethoven quartets in which the master has shown greater skill in extracting from the instruments so wonderful a variety of contrasts in effects. It was played faultlessly throughout; in fact, its performance was as fine an example of quartet playing as we can hope to hear. The noble Schumann Quintet was, perhaps, the least satisfying interpretation of the concert. It may be that the ear was tired after listening to two quartets, and was unequal to the appreciation of another long work, but it seemed to drag. Mr. Sherwood's playing of the piano part was brilliant and masterly, leaving but little to be desired except something more, now and then, of dynamic temperance. Taken altogether, however, he gave a fine exemplification of masterly virtuosity swayed by artistic discretion, and fairly earned the hearty approval that was accorded him. The next concert will be given Monday evening, Dec. 26.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1892.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwin Schroeder.

At the sixth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, leading 'cello player of the band, was the soloist, his appearance being made in Karl Davidoff's concerto No. 3, one movement, and the success he made fully realized all the pleasant anticipations of those who were familiar with his triumphs in former performances here. He unites in his work breadth of style, fine technical attainments, rare purity of tone, and a delicacy and refinement in his playing, upon occasion, which combine to give him a well deserved prominence among the best 'cello soloists of the day. The single movement of the concerto gave the player ample opportunity to display his skill, and the hearty and enthusiastic fashion in which his masterly interpretation of its many beauties was recognized proved the audience to be keenly alive to the player's artistic merits.

The Dvorak tendencies of the day were recognized by Director Nikisch, in the placing upon the programme of this composer's "Dramatic Overture," written in 1883 for the opening of a theatre in Prag. It is a notable illustration of the musical fertility of Dvorak, who is seldom guilty of writing without a purpose, or without valuable results. Its leading idea finds expression in a grand hymn-like theme of a solemn character, first introduced by the wood wind section in full harmony. This is shown in strong contrast with a brilliant them later on, and a fine dramatic climax is worked out with rare skill, the overture concluding with a return to the first theme, which makes a most effective coda.

Another novelty of the evening consisted of Johan Severin Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, op. 11, a composition full of the odd characteristics of its writer's style, a strikingly beautiful movement, being that for solo violin with pizzicato accompaniment, in which Mr. Kneisel gave his best efforts. It was most admirably played throughout, and afforded much pleasure.

The C major symphony of Schumann ended the concert, and its grand performance was thoroughly appreciated.

Next Saturday's programme consists of Grieg's suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time"; Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, Op. 4, for the first time in America, and Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 27, 1892.

Programme of Novelties by the Symphony Orchestra.

Novelties predominated on the programme provided by Director Nikisch for the sixth of this season's symphony concerts. A dramatic overture by Antonin Dvorak, a concerto for violoncello by Karl Davidoff, and a legend for orchestra by Johan Severin Svendsen were all played for the first time in Boston, and with the exception of the latter, all proved most acceptable to the audience.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and the appearance of this very popular member of Mr. Nikisch's band was heartily welcomed. His solo playing at the symphony concerts a year ago proved him entitled to rank among the first of 'celloists in America, and established him firmly in the favor of Bostonians.

His playing yesterday more than fulfilled expectations. His style seemed broader and more finished than heretofore, his tone sweeter and purer, his technique freer, and, if possible, more exact.

Davidoff's concerto, No. 3, in one movement, afforded him ample opportunity for a display of his virtuosity. It is a showy composition, fairly bristling with difficult and brilliant passages for the solo instrument, and having a rich and substantial orchestration. After its performance Mr. Schroeder was three times enthusiastically recalled.

The Dvorak dramatic overture, "Husitska," is a distinctly descriptive piece, and is written in the broad and impressive manner for which the works of this composer are noted. Its subject is the Hussite wars, and the music is most suggestive of fierce and savage warfare. The solemn grandeur of the opening harmony was superbly interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, especially commendable being the work of the wooden wind instruments, and scarcely less effective was the playing of the fiery, martial passages, which add so much to the brilliancy of the second movement.

Johan Severin Svendsen's legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," did not make a particularly favorable impression. The composer has taken for his subject, Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." So far as suggestiveness in his music is concerned, he might as well have chosen any other subject.

The first of the three movements is the most interesting. In this there are some novel orchestral effects and some brilliant harmonies.

The other two movements, although treated in a scholarly manner, are devoid of originality, and are for the most part colorless and conventional to a degree. An admirable performance was given the composition.

Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major was the concluding offering at yesterday's concerto. Mr. Nikisch is particularly happy in his reading of Schumann's writings, and it is not remembered that a more satisfactory performance of this noble symphony was ever given in Boston than was the performance last evening.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Suite for string orchestra, from Holberg's Time. (Grieg.
Symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4...Eugen d'Albert
(First time in America.)
Overture, Flying Dutchman.....Wagner

[50]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1892.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

While the quality of the music performed at the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, might not have attracted the musical hermit from his cell yet with a single exception the ordre du jour was capital.

Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska" is chiefly of historical interest, relating as it does to the wars of the Hussites, a religious sect that, theologically speaking, became extinct at the time of the reformation. The old Hussites were passionately fond of their hymn tunes; and these tunes have more or less permeated the Slavonic masterpieces of Dvorak and similar composers, albeit one can not speak so highly of their grandeur and solidity as of the contemporaneous chorals that the great German composers have so frequently adopted as the basis of their art work. Dvorak's overture opens with a lugubrious and somewhat morbid hymn-tune of Hussitean origin, which, however, is developed into something truly musical by what the composer has done for it. The orchestration is rich, piquant and striking, and the work as a whole is a fairly good specimen of Herr Dvorak's style, being somewhat tainted with mannerism it is true, but on the other hand architecturally beautiful and excellent. In brief it is a composition of dignity and vigor, that nowhere sinks to triviality, and nowhere rises to intensity.

The soloist for the concert was one of the orchestra's own members, namely, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It cannot be said that the violoncello is one of the most popular musical instruments of the day; yet Mr. Schroeder could but have won a few converts to it by the peculiar charm of his tone. His cantabile playing was exquisite, while aside from this, his roulades were evenly and beautifully executed. The bright and emphatic, as well as the tender and melodious phrases of the music were all given out with remarkable expression. The concerto might not be one which a 'cello virtuoso would select for the exhibition of pure and simple virtuosity as such; but, what is far better, it enabled Mr. Schroeder to show himself as a musician, artist and poetical interpreter, and the opportunity was improved in the performer's worthiest manner.

With the Legend for Orchestra by Svendsen came some of the most dreary and dismal programme music that has been heard in Boston for many a day, and wherein its wrenching groans, its shooting pains and melancholy moans were in any respect true to Washington Irving's "Legend of Alhambra" which has been taken by Svendsen as a subject, it would puzzle an Œdipus to determine. 'Tis not a healthful, manly work, but truly soars "sicklied o'er with but the pale cast of thought."

The interpretation of Schumann's second symphony was perfectly clear, unflagging and elegant from beginning to end. The work itself is not so markedly beyond praise as the imperishable symphony in B flat—Schumann's first and worthiest symphony—but it nevertheless unites in it so much of the Schumann individuality, so much poetic sentiment, and in the adagio such genuine unaffected pathos, and the texture of each movement is so subtle, yet artistic in form, that it easily holds high rank among the few great symphonies that have been written since Beethoven's time. The allegros especially are all strong, clear, glowing and full of fire. Throughout the concert the orchestra had matter challenging its best powers, and it seems superfluous to add that the challenge was responded to with a zeal and loyalty that it has not yet surpassed. At the seventh concert to be given next Saturday evening the repertoire will consist of a suite for string orchestra "Aus Holberg's Zeit" by Grieg; Symphony No. 1, in F major, op 4, Eugen D'Albert; and the "Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner. There will be no soloist.

C. L. CAPEN.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Montag, 28. Nov. 1892.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Montag Nachmittag, den 5. December, wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch die einzige Matinee in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music veranstalten. Ein reichhaltiges Programm ist für das Konzert aufgestellt worden. Madame Lilian Nordica und Herr Alwin Schroeder wirken in demselben mit. Tickets für dieses Konzert sind jetzt im No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

[51]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorák: Dramatic Overture, "Husitská," Opus 67.
Davidoff: Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, in one movement.
Svendsen: "Zorahayda," Legend for Orchestra, Opus 11.
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C Major, Opus 61.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Something in this programme suggested to us to look over the programmes of this season, so far, to see how many novelties they contained. The result of this investigation is as follows: In six concerts we have had nine old and more or less familiar works (not counting songs); four works that have been given here before, but which are by no means familiar to the public; eight absolutely new works. Adding together the last two categories, as we may fairly do—for works like Dvorák's suite in D, or Saint-Saën's symphony in A minor, which have been played here once or twice before at long intervals, are virtually novelties—we find that the six concerts have given us twelve novelties against nine old or familiar works! Now, is not this too much in all conscience? Is not this proportion of four novelties to three familiar works out of all proper balance? Ferdinand Hiller has said:

> Men (musicians excepted) prefer hearing what is familiar to what is new. The musician, to be sure, is "also a man, so to speak," and often likes to perform, or have performed, works of which he is fond, over and over again; but that which is new has a peculiar charm for him, inasmuch as it excites his curiosity and makes higher demands upon his apprehensive faculty. The public, on the contrary, prefers to enjoy at ease; and we can hardly turn to reproach an impulse so deeply rooted in human nature.

We have always maintained that the taste of the audience was not too much to be considered in making out symphony programmes; there are certain works which it is well to give now and then purely for their own sake, whether the average audience likes them or not. Still, the public's pleasure ought to be consulted to a certain extent, especially when this can be done without lessening the dignity of the concerts; and we mistake much if the glut of novelties we have recently had is not too much for the endurance even of musicians. Add to this the, to say the least, unfortunate character of some of the novelties we have had, and the argument against the plan adopted is only strengthened. A vast city like Paris, which has three independent organizations to give symphony concerts throughout the season, can well afford to found and support a "Société des Premières Auditions" (or whatever its official style may be); but a city like Boston, which looks to the symphony orchestra for the staple of its orchestral music, cannot afford to have this, its one orchestra, so nearly turned into a "Society for First Performances."

We even feel like quarrelling with the quality and character of some of the novelties given. Against giving things like the Tschaikowsky symphony, or Dvorák's overture "Husitska," we have nothing to urge; it is pretty tough work listening to them, to be sure, but we, as an audience, in a certain sense, owe them that work. Tschaikowsky stands at the head of the Russian school today, Dvorák is in the foremost rank of contemporary composers; both are men of mark, and it is interesting to hear what they have to say; moreover, they have, to a certain extent, earned the right to speak to us and command our attention. But, when it comes to things like Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," Humperdink's "Humoresque" or Svendsen's "Zorahayda," the game is not worth the candle; who are Scharwenka and Humperdink, that we should be asked to listen to poor stuff of theirs? They are writers of merely local interest, and their locality is not Boston. We owe them nothing. With Svendsen the case is somewhat different; he stands, with Grieg, at the head of the Scandinavian school today; he, too, is a man of mark. Let us then cheerfully listen to some of his important works; but let us not be asked to waste our time with such sheer musical twaddle as his "Zorahayda"! Time and nerves are too valuable to be given to such experiments as that!

To come to last Saturday evening's concert. Dvorák's "Husitska" overture does not seem one of his strong works; much in it is commonplace, much inordinately noisy, and the whole thing is terribly spun out. Svendsen's "Zorahayda" is out of place at a symphony concert; it is pleasant music enough, but it belongs properly to light, "popular" concerts.

Schumann's great C major symphony, on the other hand, is a work of the very first rank; here we have music, and great music, too. The performance was admirable; we can not remember ever hearing the working-out in the first movement so well cured of its generally thin and ragged effect. Schumann's instrumentation at the period when this symphony was written (and notably in this very work) often requires a deal of "management" to make it sound well and clear; and on this occasion it was managed with the greatest skill. The first violins did wonders in the Scherzo, and both strings and wind covered themselves with glory in the Adagio. But Mr. Nikisch's finest triumph was, perhaps, in the Finale; to hear this wonderful movement go with such fire and force, so entirely right, in a word, is a rare delight. It has been objected to this finale that it is deficient in "form;" that it, like some others of Schumann's symphonic movements, departs considerably and even fundamentally from accepted, traditional forms is indubitable; but it is in no wise formless for all that; it emphatically has a form of its own, and its development is finely coherent throughout. It sets out as a rondo, and sticks to this form so far as the return of the first theme; from this point on it is a piece of free thematic development, of the stoutest sort, bnt not according to symphonic traditions. In a certain sense, it is dramatic, the unravelling of an ideal plot, rather than a symphonic movement of the cyclical sort. Thirty-four pages (almost half its length) are taken up with the coda alone. But one fails to see how these irregularities, or unconventionalities, detract from its greatness; it is no piece of mere formless tone-painting, it is musically coherent and ever growing in strength; it is, in a sense, unique. To us it is the greatest of all Schumann's Finales; the most heroic and dramatic, and at the same time the most beautiful. The way in which it was played was a positive triumph.

Mr. Schroeder played the Davidoff concerto very beautifully indeed; his tone, intonation, phrasing and musical warmth can hardly be praised too highly. Unfortunately the work itself belongs unmistakably to the things that [illegible] their day. Nothing can be said against it save this; that it is dead past revival, it belongs to a bygone period, to an obsolete style. If anything could have given it new life Mr. Schroeder's playing could; but even his playing could not. The time is not far distant when the 'cello must logically follow the flute, oboe and other wind instruments in the orchestra, and stop playing concertos. The form itself is a weak one, it is yearly growing more and more apart from the musical feeling of the present day. For the pianoforte and violin, there are some few great works that can keep it alive; but for the 'cello this is not so. The literature of the instrument comprises almost nothing of real value in this form. And it is to be remembered that an instrument keeps its legitimate place before the world as a solo instrument, not through the ability of the artists that play it, but solely through the musical value of its literature—by what has been written for it. Mr. Schroeder was enthusiastically applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Grieg, suite for string orchestra, "Aus Holberg's Zeiten"; D'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4; Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67, Dvorak; concerto for violoncello, No. 3, one movement, Davidoff; legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," Svendsen; and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. If there is anything of value in the Dvorak overture it was not discovered through the rendering it experienced at the hands of the orchestra. It was played without expression and in a noisy and violent manner. It was war to the knife and knife to the hilt, the combatants getting right down to business at once and fighting to the end. The Svendsen legend proved to be a graceful composition delicately scored and delightfully played.

The programme said that it was played on this occasion for the first time in Boston,—that is a mistake, for it was played by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Carl Zerrahn's baton, April 4, 1883, at the Music Hall. The concerto of Davidoff is a work of little interest, of which fortunately Mr. Schroeder gave us one movement only. This with the long cadenza gave the player the opportunity to display his exceptional gifts so happily that he was twice recalled. The Schumann symphony in many respects was well performed, and could that horrible brass band that is attached to the orchestra been kept within the bounds of reasonable tone production, instead of trying to be heard on Biela's comet, the effect of the performance would have been a most agreeable one.

For the first time this season, the tympanist had his innings, even if he did have to wait until the last measures of the symphony to be heard from. He ought to feel as proud over his achievement as Governor Russell does over his election. The next concert takes place Saturday, Dec. 3, when the programme will embrace the overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; a suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time," Grieg; and Eugen D'Albert's Symphony No. 1, which is announced as "first time in America." This cannot be true, unless New York is not in the land of the free and the home of the brave, for Dr. Damrosch played it in Gotham about five years ago.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Clipping from Worcester Mass
Date 11-26

First Symphony Concert.

The first in the series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening before a large and fashionable audience.

As was to be expected the audience was fairly representative of the musical culture of Worcester, and the high order of excellence of the program met with merited recognition.

From Goldmark's popular overture, "Lokuntola," to the symphony in E minor by Tschaikowsky, the orchestral numbers were received with a pleasure that at times almost amounted to rapturous delight.

There were two Wagnerian selections upon the programme, both from "Tuston and Isolde." Both were admirably performed, and the musicians were rewarded with enthusiastic demonstrations of approval.

The soloist of the evening was Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who is well known to many of the music loving portion of the Worcester public by reason of her former appearances in connection with the annual musical festival. She demonstrated that she had made marked progress and development in her art, since she was last heard in this city.

Madame Zeisler was heard to the best advantage, perhaps, in the Romeou Davotte, with variations, which she executed with a clearness and delicacy, which was wholly admirable.

The second Symphony Concert will be given Thursday evening, December 29, when Madame Nordica will be the soloist.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestra played well, often beautifully and sometimes exquisitely, at the sixth Symphony concert; but the programme was not altogether worthy of such careful and elegant work. Of its four numbers three were new, and of one of them one must say that it must have obtained its place—like that triviality of Humperdink—just because it was a novelty. This was Svendsen's parallel to parts of that story of Zorahayda which Irving reports from among the legends of Spain. If the listener did not attempt to fit upon the music, paragraph by paragraph, the extract from the book, he might find in the successive phases of the music a sufficiently suggestive symbolism of still night, sheeny waters, tender melancholy and mild cheer, encouragement, calm and a gradual melting away of everything into the depths of air and water. But this is not material for a Symphony programme, although Svendsen is a man of the right importance to have a place there. The shimmering, cobwebby prettiness of the orchestral atmosphere was delicately done and the obbligati which portray the dialogue between Jacinta and Zorahayda were sweet and smooth. The overture was Dvorak's "Hussitska," which depicts strongly, shiningly and often truthfully the spirit, religious, fanatic, patriotic and fierce, of the Hussite wars. Solemn and severe is the mood of the beginning, which seems planted on a huge hymn; then come the heat and confusion of conflict, and at last rise once more the ecclesiastical strains, but jubilant and resplendent. Schumann in C major, the second, was the Symphony, which was largely and conservatively read and greatly enjoyed. The soloist was Mr. Schroeder, who enriched a short 'cello concerto by Davidoff with his ample and suave tone and beautified it with his fine, ornate and cultivated execution.

The concert of tonight will have no soloist. It will begin with that pleasant suite of Grieg, "From Holberg's Time," and end with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, there being placed between them the D'Albert symyhony which was expected last season. It will now be heard for the first time in this country.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1892.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

While the quality of the music performed at the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, might not have attracted the musical hermit from his cell yet with a single exception the ordre du soir was capital.

Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska" is chiefly of historical interest, relating as it does to the wars of the Hussites, a religious sect that, theologically speaking, became extinct at the time of the reformation. The old Hussites were passionately fond of their hymn tunes; and these tunes have more or less permeated the Slavonic masterpieces of Dvorak and similar composers, albeit one can not speak so highly of their grandeur and solidity as of the contemporaneous chorals that the great German composers have so frequently adopted as the basis of their art work. Dvorak's overture opens with a lugubrious and somewhat morbid hymn-tune of Hussitean origin, which, however, is developed into something truly musical by what the composer has done for it. The orchestration is rich, piquant and striking, and the work as a whole is a fairly good specimen of Herr Dvorak's style, being somewhat tainted with mannerism it is true, but on the other hand architecturally beautiful and excellent. In brief it is a composition of dignity and vigor, that nowhere sinks to triviality, and nowhere rises to intensity.

The soloist for the concert was one of the orchestra's own members, namely, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It cannot be said that the violoncello is one of the most popular musical instruments of the day; yet Mr. Schroeder could but have won a few converts to it by the peculiar charm of his tone. His cantabile playing was exquisite, while aside from this, his roulades were evenly and beautifully executed. The bright and emphatic, as well as the tender and melodious phrases of the music were all given out with remarkable expression. The concerto might not be one which a 'cello virtuoso would select for the exhibition of pure and simple virtuosity as such; but, what is far better, it enabled Mr. Schroeder to show himself as a musician, artist and poetical interpreter, and the opportunity was improved in the performer's worthiest manner.

With the Legend for Orchestra by Svendsen came some of the most dreary and dismal programme music that has been heard in Boston for many a day, and wherein its wrenching groans, its shooting pains and melancholy moans were in any respect true to Washington Irving's "Legend of Alhambra" which has been taken by Svendsen as a subject, it would puzzle an Œdipus to determine. 'Tis not a healthful, manly work, but truly soars "sicklied o'er with but the pale cast of thought."

The interpretation of Schumann's second symphony was perfectly clear, unflagging and elegant from beginning to end. The work itself is not so markedly beyond praise as the imperishable symphony in B flat—Schumann's first and worthiest symphony—but it nevertheless unites in it so much of the Schumann individuality, so much poetic sentiment, and in the adagio such genuine unaffected pathos, and the texture of each movement is so subtle, yet artistic in form, that it easily holds high rank among the few great symphonies that have been written since Beethoven's time. The allegros especially are all strong, clear, glowing and full of fire. Throughout the concert the orchestra had matter challenging its best powers, and it seems superfluous to add that the challenge was responded to with a zeal and loyalty that it has not yet surpassed. At the seventh concert to be given next Saturday evening the repertoire will consist of a suite for string orchestra "Aus Holberg's Zeit" by Grieg; Symphony No. 1, in F major, op 4, Eugen D'Albert; and the "Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner. There will be no soloist.

C. L. CAPEN.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Montag, 28. Nov. 1892.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Montag Nachmittag, den 5. Dezember, wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch die einzige Matinee in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music veranstalten. Ein reichhaltiges Programm ist für das Konzert aufgestellt worden. Madame Lilian Nordica und Herr Alwin Schroeder wirken in demselben mit. Tickets für dieses Konzert sind jetzt im No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorák: Dramatic Overture, "Husitská," Opus 67.
Davidoff: Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, in one movement.
Svendsen: "Zorahayda," Legend for Orchestra, Opus 11.
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C Major, Opus 61.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Something in this programme suggested to us to look over the programmes of this season, so far, to see how many novelties they contained. The result of this investigation is as follows: In six concerts we have had nine old and more or less familiar works (not counting songs); four works that have been given here before, but which are by no means familiar to the public; eight absolutely new works. Adding together the last two categories, as we may fairly do—for works like Dvorák's suite in D, or Saint-Saën's symphony in A minor, which have been played here once or twice before at long intervals, are virtually novelties—we find that the six concerts have given us twelve novelties against nine old or familiar works! Now, is not this too much in all conscience? Is not this proportion of four novelties to three familiar works out of all proper balance? Ferdinand Hiller has said:

Men (musicians excepted) prefer hearing what is familiar to what is new. The musician, to be sure, is "also a man, so to speak," and often likes to perform, or have performed, works of which he is fond, over and over again; but that which is new has a peculiar charm for him, inasmuch as it excites his curiosity and makes higher demands upon his apprehensive faculty. The public, on the contrary, prefers to enjoy at ease; and we can hardly turn to reproach an impulse so deeply rooted in human nature.

We have always maintained that the taste of the audience was not too much to be considered in making out symphony programmes; there are certain works which it is well to give now and then purely for their own sake, whether the average audience likes them or not. Still, the public's pleasure ought to be consulted to a certain extent, especially when this can be done without lessening the dignity of the concerts; and we mistake much if the glut of novelties we have recently had is not too much for the endurance even of musicians. Add to this the, to say the least, unfortunate character of some of the novelties we have had, and the argument against the plan adopted is only strengthened. A vast city like Paris, which has three independent organizations to give symphony concerts throughout the season, can well afford to found and support a "Société des Premières Auditions" (or whatever its official style may be); but a city like Boston, which looks to the symphony orchestra for the staple of its orchestral music, cannot afford to have this, its one orchestra, so nearly turned into a "Society for First Performances."

We even feel like quarrelling with the quality and character of some of the novelties given. Against giving things like the Tschaikowsky symphony, or Dvorák's overture "Husitska," we have nothing to urge; it is pretty tough work listening to them, to be sure, but we, as an audience, in a certain sense, owe them that work. Tschaikowsky stands at the head of the Russian school today, Dvorák is in the foremost rank of contemporary composers; both are men of mark, and it is interesting to hear what they have to say; moreover, they have, to a certain extent, earned the right to speak to us and command our attention. But, when it comes to things like Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," Humperdink's "Humoresque" or Svendsen's "Zorahayda," the game is not worth the candle; who are Scharwenka and Humperdink, that we should be asked to listen to poor stuff of theirs? They are writers of merely local interest, and their locality is not Boston. We owe them nothing. With Svendsen the case is somewhat different; he stands, with Grieg, at the head of the Scandinavian school today; he, too, is a man of mark. Let us then cheerfully listen to some of his important works; but let us not be asked to waste our time with such sheer musical twaddle as his "Zorahayda"! Time and nerves are too valuable to be given to such experiments as that!

To come to last Saturday evening's concert. Dvorák's "Husitska" overture does not seem one of his strong works; much in it is commonplace, much inordinately noisy, and the whole thing is terribly spun out. Svendsen's "Zorahayda" is out of place at a symphony concert; it is pleasant music enough, but it belongs properly to light, "popular" concerts.

Schumann's great C major symphony, on the other hand, is a work of the very first rank; here we have music, and great music, too. The performance was admirable; we can not remember ever hearing the working-out in the first movement so well cured of its generally thin and ragged effect. Schumann's instrumentation at the period when this symphony was written (and notably in this very work) often requires a deal of "management" to make it sound well and clear; and on this occasion it was managed with the greatest skill. The first violins did wonders in the Scherzo, and both strings and wind covered themselves with glory in the Adagio. But Mr. Nikisch's finest triumph was, perhaps, in the Finale; to hear this wonderful movement go with such fire and force, so entirely right, in a word, is a rare delight. It has been objected to this finale that it is deficient in "form;" that it, like some others of Schumann's symphonic movements, departs considerably and even fundamentally from accepted, traditional forms is indubitable; but it is in no wise formless for all that; it emphatically has a form of its own, and its development is finely coherent throughout. It sets out as a rondo, and sticks to this form so far as the return of the first theme; from this point on it is a piece of free thematic development, of the stoutest sort, but not according to symphonic traditions. In a certain sense, it is dramatic, the unravelling of an ideal plot, rather than a symphonic movement of the cyclical sort. Thirty-four pages (almost half its length) are taken up with the coda alone. But one fails to see how these irregularities, or unconventionalities, detract from its greatness; it is no piece of mere formless tone-painting, it is musically coherent and ever growing in strength; it is, in a sense, unique. To us it is the greatest of all Schumann's Finales; the most heroic and dramatic, and at the same time the most beautiful. The way in which it was played was a positive triumph.

Mr. Schroeder played the Davidoff concerto very beautifully indeed; his tone, intonation, phrasing and musical warmth can hardly be praised too highly. Unfortunately the work itself belongs unmistakably to the things that have had their day. Nothing need be said against it save this; that it is dead past revival, it belongs to a bygone period, to an obsolete style. If anything could have given it new life Mr. Schroeder's playing could; but even his playing could not. The time is not far distant when the 'cello must logically follow the flute, oboe and other wind instruments in the orchestra, and stop playing concertos. The form itself is a weak one, it is yearly growing more and more apart from the musical feeling of the present day. For the pianoforte and violin, there are some few great works that can keep it alive; but for the 'cello this is not so. The literature of the instrument comprises almost nothing of real value in this form. And it is to be remembered that an instrument keeps its legitimate place before the world as a solo instrument, not through the ability of the artists that play it, but solely through the musical value of its literature—by what has been written for it. Mr. Schroeder was enthusiastically applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Grieg, suite for string orchestra, "Aus Holberg's Zeiten"; D'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4; Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67, Dvorak; concerto for violoncello, No. 3, one movement, Davidoff; legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," Svendsen; and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. If there is anything of value in the Dvorak overture it was not discovered through the rendering it experienced at the hands of the orchestra. It was played without expression and in a noisy and violent manner. It was war to the knife and knife to the hilt, the combatants getting right down to business at once and fighting to the end. The Svendsen legend proved to be a graceful composition delicately scored and delightfully played.

The programme said that it was played on this occasion for the first time in Boston,—that is a mistake, for it was played by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Carl Zerrahn's baton, April 4, 1883, at the Music Hall. The concerto of Davidoff is a work of little interest, of which fortunately Mr. Schroeder gave us one movement only. This with the long cadenza gave the player the opportunity to display his exceptional gifts so happily that he was twice recalled. The Schumann symphony in many respects was well performed, and could that horrible brass band that is attached to the orchestra been kept within the bounds of reasonable tone production, instead of trying to be heard on Biela's comet, the effect of the performance would have been a most agreeable one.

For the first time this season, the tympanist had his innings, even if he did have to wait until the last measures of the symphony to be heard from. He ought to feel as proud over his achievment as Governor Russell does over his election. The next concert takes place Saturday, Dec. 3, when the programme will embrace the overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; a suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time," Grieg; and Eugen D'Albert's Symphony No. 1, which is announced as "first time in America." This cannot be true, unless New York is not in the land of the free and the home of the brave, for Dr. Damrosch played it in Gotham about five years ago.

WARRE, DAVENPORT.

Clipping from Dispatch Worcester Mass
Date 11-26

First Symphony Concert.

The first in the series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening before a large and fashionable audience.

As was to be expected the audience was fairly representative of the musical culture of Worcester, and the high order of excellence of the program met with merited recognition.

From Goldmark's popular overture, "Lokuntola," to the symphony in E minor by Tschaikowsky, the orchestral numbers were received with a pleasure that at times almost amounted to rapturous delight.

There were two Wagnerian selections upon the programme, both from "Tuston and Isolde." Both were admirably performed, and the musicians were rewarded with enthusiastic demonstrations of approval.

The soloist of the evening was Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who is well known to many of the music loving portion of the Worcester public by reason of her former appearances in connection with the annual musical festival. She demonstrated that she had made marked progress and development in her art, since she was last heard in this city.

Madame Zeisler was heard to the best advantage, perhaps, in the Romeou Davotte, with variations, which she executed with a clearness and delicacy, which was wholly admirable.

The second Symphony Concert will be given Thursday evening, December 29, when Madame Nordica will be the soloist.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 3, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestra played well, often beautifully and sometimes exquisitely, at the sixth Symphony concert; but the programme was not altogether worthy of such careful and elegant work. Of its four numbers three were new, and of one of them one must say that it must have obtained its place—like that triviality of Humperdink—just because it was a novelty. This was Svendsen's parallel to parts of that story of Zorahayda which Irving reports from among the legends of Spain. If the listener did not attempt to fit upon the music, paragraph by paragraph, the extract from the book, he might find in the successive phases of the music a sufficiently suggestive symbolism of still night, sheeny waters, tender melancholy and mild cheer, encouragement, calm and a gradual melting away of everything into the depths of air and water. But this is not material for a Symphony programme, although Svendsen is a man of the right importance to have a place there. The shimmering, cobwebby prettiness of the orchestral atmosphere was delicately done and the obbligati which portray the dialogue between Jacinta and Zorahayda were sweet and smooth. The overture was Dvorak's "Hussitska," which depicts strongly, shiningly and often truthfully the spirit, religious, fanatic, patriotic and fierce, of the Hussite wars. Solemn and severe is the mood of the beginning, which seems planted on a huge hymn; then come the heat and confusion of conflict, and at last rise once more the ecclesiastical strains, but jubilant and resplendent. Schumann in C major, the second, was the Symphony, which was largely and conservatively read and greatly enjoyed. The soloist was Mr. Schroeder, who enriched a short 'cello concerto by Davidoff with his ample and suave tone and beautified it with his fine, ornate and cultivated execution.

The concert of tonight will have no soloist. It will begin with that pleasant suite of Grieg, "From Holberg's Time," and end with the "Flying Dutchman" overture, there being placed between them the D'Albert symphony which was expected last season. It will now be heard for the first time in this country.

[51]

CHICKERING HALL, . .

Saturday, Dec. 10,
Saturday, Jan. 14,
Saturday, Feb. 11,
Saturday, Mar. 18,
} AFTERNOONS at 3.

Four Concerts by the

Kneisel Quartette

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

First Concert, Saturday Afternoon, Dec. 10.

The Kneisel Quartette
AND
Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN, ... Quartette in D major
Allegro — Cantabile e mesto — Menuetto (Allegro) — Finale (Presto).

BEETHOVEN, ... Quartette in F minor, Op. 95
Allegro con brio — Allegretto ma non troppo — Allegro assai vivace ma serioso — Larghetto espressivo; Allegretto agitato.

BRAHMS, ... Piano Quartette in A major, Op. 26
Allegro non troppo — Poco adagio — Scherzo (Poco allegro) — Finale (Allegro).

Mr. NIKISCH, Piano.

Subscription tickets for th series of four concerts, $5.00
Single tickets, = = 1.50

Now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at Chickering Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

December Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 4, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, December 5, at 7, A.M. Broad Street Station Penn. R. R.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 3 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, December 6, 11.30 A.M. 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 2.05 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, December 7.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, Dec. 8, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 9, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 10, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, December 10, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 11, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 3, 1892.

FARMINGTON CHRONICLE.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1892.

Nordica in Lewiston.

An excellent opportunity will soon be given our people to see and hear Farmington's world-renowned prima donna, Mme. Lillian Nordica—a very good likeness of whom is given in this picture. This charming lady is to appear in Lewiston, Thursday evening, Dec. 15th, at a grand operatic concert, and it has been arranged to run a special train from Farmington to Lewiston that evening, the fare for the round trip being only one dollar. The train will return to Farmington after the concert. Do not fail to read the announcement of the concert, in this week's paper, then write to A. W. Pottle, Farmington—or call at his store—for all necessary information regarding concert and railroad tickets. This is an event not likely to occur again in a long time.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY [illegible]
VOL. XCII. NO. 153.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3.

LILLIAN NORDICA ARRIVES.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 2, 1892. The Britannic arrived at this port today, having Mme. Lillian Norton, the distinguished prima donna, as one of the passengers. She was received by Manager C. A. Ellis of Boston, who is to direct her American concert tour during the coming season. She makes her first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening, and follows with an extended series of engagements, which already fill nearly all of the time allotted to her stay in America. She is to sing in Boston with the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Boston Symphony orchestra, and her engagements in other cities are of a similar character.

City Hall, Lewiston.

THURSDAY, DEC. 15th.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT
by Maine's Distinguished Prima Donna, MME.
LILLIAN

NORDICA!

the favorite singer of England and America, assisted by

MISS LENA LITTLE
the eminent Boston Contralto.

Sig. Guiseppe Del Puente
the Great Baritone.

Mr. LEVI SCHULZ
Cello Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and

MISS MAUD POWELL!
the leading LADY VIOLINIST of the world.

Tickets, - 75 Cents and $1.00.

On sale Dec. 8th. Orders for tickets (accompanied by cash or check) will now be received at A. W. Pottle's drug store. Good seats positively guaranteed, and no speculating allowed.

Half Fare, Or Round Trip, $1.00

On the Maine Central Railroad, and a SPECIAL TRAIN will run back to Farmington at the close of the Concert. 48-49

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Herausgegeben von der

Post Printing & Publishing Co.

Limited.

M. Friedländer.....Präsident

erscheint jeden Nachmittag außer Sonntags zum Preis von 10 Cents per Woche, zahlbar an die Träger oder $5.00 per Jahr.

406 Nord Vierte Straße.

Academy of Music.
Nikisch.—Nordica.
Montag Nachmittag, den 5. Dezember
Einzige populäre Matinee des

Boston Symphonie Orchesters.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor,
unterstützt von
Madame Lillian Nordica
und
Mr. Alwin Schröder.

Ein populäres Programm.

Der Verkauf der Sitze beginnt heute, Montag in 1221 Chestnut Str.
Nov9 C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Montag Nachmittag, den 5. Dezember, wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch die einzige Matinee in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music veranstalten. Ein reichhaltiges Programm ist für das Konzert aufgestellt worden. Madame Lilian Nordica und Herr Alwin Schroeder wirken in demselben mit. Tickets für dieses Konzert sind jetzt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

[52]

CHICKERING HALL, . .

Saturday, Dec. 10,
Saturday, Jan. 14,
Saturday, Feb. 11,
Saturday, Mar. 18,
} AFTERNOONS at 3.

Four Concerts by the

Kneisel Quartette

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

First Concert, Saturday Afternoon, Dec. 10.

The Kneisel Quartette
AND
Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN, ... Quartette in D major
Allegro — Cantabile e mesto —
Menuetto (Allegro) — Finale (Presto).

BEETHOVEN, ... Quartette in F minor, Op. 95
Allegro con brio — Allegretto ma non troppo — Allegro assai vivace ma serioso — Larghetto espressivo; Allegretto agitato.

BRAHMS, ... Piano Quartette in A major, Op. 26
Allegro non troppo — Poco adagio — Scherzo (Poco allegro) — Finale (Allegro).

Mr. NIKISCH, Piano.

Subscription tickets for th series of four concerts, $5.00
Single tickets, = = 1.50

Now on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at Chickering Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

December Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 4, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, December 5, at 7, A.M. Broad Street Station Penn. R. R.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 3 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, December 6, 11.30 A.M. 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 2.05 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, December 7.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, Dec. 8, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 9, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 10, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, December 10, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 11, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 3, 1892.

FARMINGTON CHRONICLE.
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1892.

Nordica in Lewiston.

An excellent opportunity will soon be given our people to see and hear Farmington's world-renowned prima donna, Mme. Lillian Nordica—a very good likeness of whom is given in this picture. This charming lady is to appear in Lewiston, Thursday evening, Dec 15th, at a grand operatic concert, and it has been arranged to run a special train from Farmington to Lewiston that evening, the fare for the round trip being only one dollar. The train will return to Farmington after the concert. Do not fail to read the announcement of the concert, in this week's paper, then write to A. W. Pottle, Farmington—or call at his store—for all necessary information regarding concert and railroad tickets. This is an event not likely to occur again in a long time.

City Hall, Lewiston.

THURSDAY, DEC. 15th.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

by Maine's Distinguished Prima Donna, MME. LILLIAN

NORDICA!

the favorite singer of England and America, assisted by

MISS LENA LITTLE
the eminent Boston Contralto.

Sig. Guiseppe Del Puente
the Great Baritone.

Mr. LEVI SCHULZ
Cello Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and

MISS MAUD POWELL!
the leading LADY VIOLINIST of the world.

Tickets, - 75 Cents and $1.00.

On sale Dec. 8th. Orders for tickets (accompanied by cash or check) will now be received at A. W. Pottle's drug store. Good seats positively guaranteed, and no speculating allowed.

Half Fare, Or Round Trip, $1.00

On the Maine Central Railroad, and a SPECIAL TRAIN will run back to Farmington at the close of the Concert. 48-49

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 156.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 189[illegible].

LILLIAN NORDICA ARRIVES.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 2, 1892. The Britannic arrived at this port today, having Mme. Lillian Norton, the distinguished prima donna, as one of the passengers. She was received by Manager C. A. Ellis of Boston, who is to direct her American concert tour during the coming season. She makes her first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening, and follows with an extended series of engagements, which already fill nearly all of the time allotted to her stay in America. She is to sing in Boston with the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Boston Symphony orchestra; and her engagements in other cities are of a similar character.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

herausgegeben von der

Post Printing & Publishing Co.

Limited.

R. Friedländer.....Präsident

erscheint jeden Nachmittag außer Sonntags zum Preis von 10 Cents per Woche, zahlbar an die Träger oder $5.00 per Jahr.

406 Nord Vierte Straße.

Academy of Music.
Nikisch.—Nordica.
Montag Nachmittag, den 5. Dezember
Einzige populäre Matinee des

Boston Symphonie Orchesters.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor,
unterstützt von
Madame Lillian Nordica
und
Mr. Alwin Schröder.

Ein populäres Programm.

Der Verkauf der Sitze beginnt heute, Montag in 1221 Chestnut Str.

28nov2 C. A. Ellis, Manager.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Montag Nachmittag, den 5. Dezember, wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch die einzige Matinee in dieser Saison in der Academy of Music veranstalten. Ein reichhaltiges Programm ist für das Konzert aufgestellt worden. Madame Lilian Nordica und Herr Alwin Schroeder wirken in demselben mit. Tickets für dieses Konzert sind jetzt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

[52]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of

C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall,

Boston, Mass.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8 P.M.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.
I. Praeludium (Pastorale) Allegro moderato. D major.
II. Polka Allegretto grazioso. D minor.
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro giusto. B-flat major.
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto. G major.
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto. D minor.

KARL HEINRICH GRAUN. ARIA. "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet," from "Der Tod Jesu."

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 2.
I. Adagio molto. D major.—Allegro con brio. D major.
II. Larghetto. A major.
III. Scherzo; Allegro. D major.
Trio; the same tempo. D major.
IV. Allegro molto. D major.

AMBROISE THOMAS. OPHELIA'S DYING SCENE. from "Hamlet."

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

SOLOIST:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·
Season of 1892-93

Under the management of
C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall,
Boston, Mass.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·
Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,
Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·
Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,
Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8 P.M.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.
I. Praeludium (Pastorale) Allegro moderato. D major.
II. Polka Allegretto grazioso. D minor.
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro giusto. B-flat major.
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto. G major.
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto. D minor.

KARL HEINRICH GRAUN. ARIA. "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet," from "Der Tod Jesu."

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 2.
I. Adagio molto. D major.—Allegro con brio. D major.
II. Larghetto. A major.
III. Scherzo; Allegro. D major.
Trio; the same tempo. D major.
IV. Allegro molto. D major.

AMBROISE THOMAS. OPHELIA'S DYING SCENE. from "Hamlet."

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

SOLOIST:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE.

BOSTON, November 1, 1892.

Mr. C. A. Ellis takes pleasure in announcing that he has completed arrangements with Madame Nordica for appearances in concert and oratorio in America from December 1, 1892, to March 15, 1893. At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last, Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, she will devote herself to concert engagements during the months above-named.

Madame No

Under the management of C.

OPERA HOUSE, BA

Tuesda

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,
THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna

Mme. Lillian Nordica

Assisted by the following Artists:

Miss LENA LITTLE,
The Eminent Boston Contralto.

Sig. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Famous Operatic Baritone.

Mr. LEO SCHULZ,
'Cello Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
And

Miss MAUD POWELL,
The leading Lady Violinist of the World.

TICKETS, 75 cts. and $1.00.

Sale opens Thursday, Dec. 8, at 9 A.M., at the City Hall. After the first day the sale will be at Douglass & Cook's Book Store, 188 Lisbon Street.

Out of town parties desiring seats can send order, accompanied by cash or check, to Mr. R. C. PENNELL, local agent, care Douglass & Cook's Store, and, if the order is sent in season, good seats guaranteed. No speculating allowed, and not over six seats sold to one person.

FARMINGTON parties can give their orders to Mr. A. W. Pottle, Druggist, and they will be promptly attended to.

In BRUNSWICK orders will be taken by Mr. Emery A. Crawford, at Riley's Music Store.

Orders taken in BATH by Mr. N. W. Ham.

Address any of the above-mentioned gentlemen for further information.

Excursion rates on all divisions of the Maine Central R.R. leading into Lewiston.

Special train for Farmington after the concert, and a round-trip fare of one dollar will be given. Special train also on the Grand Trunk, and round-trip rate given.

Passenger car added to the night freight for Waterville and way stations.

Madame Nordica.

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

Sanders Theatre

SEASON

BOSTON SYMPHO

MR. ARTHUR NIKI

III. CO

THURSDAY, DECEMB

PROGR

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SUIT
I. Praeludiu
II. Polka All
III. Menuett
IV. Romanze
V. Finale (F

KARL HEINRICH GRAUN. ARIA from

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYM
I. Adagio
II. Larghett
III. Scherzo;
Trio; the
IV. Allegro

AMBROISE THOMAS. OPH
"Ha

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OV

SO

MISS PRISC

BANGOR OPERA HOUSE,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13, at 8. . . .

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna Soprano

Mme. Lillian Nordica

Assisted by the following Artists:

Miss HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL,
The noted New York Contralto.

Sig. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Eminent Baritone.

Mr. ISADOR LUCKSTONE,
Solo Pianist and Accompanist,
and

Miss MAUD POWELL,
The leading Lady Violinist of the World.

TICKETS, 75 cts. and $1.00.

On sale Friday, Dec. 9, at 9 A.M. Out of town parties, by sending orders for tickets, accompanied by cash or check, to Mr. Owen at once, can be assured of their seats.

Excursion rates on the M. C. R.R. from all the adjacent towns.

Madame Nordica.

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8 P.M.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.
I. Praeludium (Pastorale) Allegro moderato. D major.
II. Polka Allegretto grazioso. D minor.
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro giusto. B-flat major.
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto. G major.
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto. D minor.

KARL HEINRICH GRAUN. ARIA. "Lo! the Heaven-descended Prophet," from "Der Tod Jesu."

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 2.
I. Adagio molto. D major.—Allegro con brio. D major.
II. Larghetto. A major.
III. Scherzo; Allegro. D major.
Trio; the same tempo. D major.
IV. Allegro molto. D major.

AMBROISE THOMAS. OPHELIA'S DYING SCENE. from "Hamlet."

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

SOLOIST:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 4, 1892.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

So far from anything of orchestral importance being lost by not performing the Grieg suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" at the Symphony concert last evening there was a welcome gain in the substitution of the great D major suite by Bach. The suite by Grieg which Mr. Nikisch had selected but had wisely concluded not to have performed is well known to pianoforte teachers as a very serviceable teaching piece; but is is pianoforte music pure and simple, and would not prove effective if given by string orchestra. The Bach suite in D was well known to our grandparents in the days of the well-remembered Harvard concerts. If our memory serves us correctly, Conductor Gericke had it performed here several times; but it was then interpreted in a far more Bachian spirit than characterized the performance last evening. One good healthy fortissimo from the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be agreeable for a change and just such a dynamic quality was invariably lacking whenever it was required of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Bach suite, which was smoothly and refinedly played, but nevertheless in a manner that was at once sterile and ineffective.

The novel feature of the concert was with Eugen D' Albert's symphony of 4. It is easy to err in judgment when attempting to speak ex cathedra after a single hearing of a work so elaborate, lengthy and pretentious as this new symphony, but a few impressions if not in character tainted with pinchbeckism may well be given. The chief fault of the symphony would appear to be with certain mannerisms; and there is an inexplicable mixture in it also of masterly passages, of the quasi-fugue style, of one excellent fugue also having two subjects on the one hand and on the other of puerile weaknesses, of bold phrase now and then followed by a certain lack of individual resources and warm imaginativeness. Portions of the second movement are involved in just such dryness as the amateur might naturally mistake for classicality, while it is not classicality, but more like pedantry. The form of it is very peculiar and even grotesque at times. As a whole, it appears not to be the work of an essentially personal, self-evolved composer.

D'Albert's originality as shown in this work appears to be the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of past methods yet it is all in all as remote from genius as oratorical fluency intermixed with scholasticism is from the divine gift of poesy

The concert ended with a surprisingly fine performance of the overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," by Wagner.

The next concert will not take place until Saturday evening, Dec. 17, Beethoven's birthday, when the eighth and ninth symphonies will be performed. The Boston Symphony chorus will make its debut, and the soloists for the symphony will be Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Mein.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC: 4, 1892.

D'Albert's First Symphony Finely Played.

The feature of the seventh of this season's symphony concerts was the performance for the first time in America of Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4. So great is the reputation of this composer as a pianist, and so cordial has been the favor accorded the few of his compositions heard here, that there was naturally a great deal of interest felt in the performance of his most pretentious composition. Consequently Music Hall was more than ordinarily crowded, both at the Friday rehearsal and at last evening's concert.

The symphony received splendid interpretation from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and it was evident that the beauties of the work were fully displayed. It is an exceedingly voluminous composition, and it is possible that its great length accounted in a measure for the lack of enthusiasm awakened by its performance. It is certainly an interesting work, and displays musical intelligence of a very high order.

It is not particularly notable for originality, neither is it strikingly beautiful in the variety or melodiousness of its themes. But it is treated in a thoroughly scholarly manner: the scoring is vigorous, rich and highly colored and very elaborate in ornamentation.

There are four movements, and they approach the old, true, symphonic form much more closely than do the average works of modern composers. The first movement presents three pleasing themes, which are worked out in regular form, and the movement is brought to a close by a short, but effective, coda. The second or slow, movement is, perhaps, the most interesting of the four. It is written mainly for the strings and the wood wind, and is most delightful in its melodic effects.

The scherzo is unconventional in treatment, and some very pleasing results are attained. The finale is brilliant and forceful, an uncommonly grand effect being gained by free use of the brasses.

Bach's suite in D major and "The Flying Dutchman" overture were the other offerings on the programme. The five short movements of the Bach suite were played with much expression and evidently gave a great deal of pleasure to the audience, even to those of its members who do not always find much delight in listening to the works of this old master.

The Wagner overture was played in the same effective style which has in the past characterized Mr. Nikisch's presentation of this beautiful series of tone pictures. The Symphony orchestra will be away on its travels this week, so that the next concert will be given on Dec. 17, when two of Beethoven's symphonies, the eighth and ninth, will be performed, with the assistance of Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists, and the Boston Symphony chorus.

THE LEADER.

DECEMBER, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its eighth season at Chickering Hall, Oct. 16. The programme was:—Quartet, D minor, Haydn; Fragment (one movement) in C minor, Schubert; Sextet for strings, A major, Dvörák, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schultz assisting in this work. The second concert was given Nov. 7, with the programme:—Quartet, E flat, Ed. Lalo; sonata for piano and violin, A minor, Schumann; quartet, D minor, Schubert. The works were given with an artistic finish, a delicacy and a completeness that distinguish the labors of this fine organization. The qualities that distinguish each of the composers were rendered with faithfulness and with a perfection that deserves nothing but praise. A large audience was present on each occasion and greeted with enthusiasm the artistic interpretations of this artistic quartet.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 157.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1892.

Notable Orchestra Concerts the Coming Week.

In making the programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's present home season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave prominence to Eugen d'Albert's first symphony in F major, op. 4, a work which was planned as a novelty of last season, if memory serves.

Gratified curiosity must be taken as the largest result obtained in this performance. The work is eminently conservative in its construction, it is a scholarly effort, and the composer shows a masterly acquaintance with orchestral combinations, but, unfortunately, he uses all these abilities in presenting in various colors phrases of little musical value, and in working out indefinite thoughts rather than well formed musical ideas. The symphony is decidedly interesting as an orchestral study, but as an evidence of the genius of D'Albert as a composer it is decidedly disappointing. The final movement is by all odds the best, but the merits of this portion of the work are hardly sufficient to win a permanent place for the symphony in the repertoire of the day. The performance of the symphony by the orchestra was calculated to give its meritorious features their due prominence, and whatever interest was lacking was caused by the weakness and deficiencies of the composition.

A thoroughly delightful performance of the suite in D major, by J. S. Bach, was the opening number of the evening's programme, and the excellent work done by the string players, especially by Mr. Kneisel in the lento movement, was the cause of genuine pleasure to all.

The glorious "Flying Dutchman" overture came with revivifying effect after the symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gave this popular selection from the Wagner repertoire a magnificent reading, the brass section of the band being used in a grand, broad fashion that gave the strong contrasts demanded with inspiring results.

The orchestra goes on its second occasional tour this week, and the regular series will be resumed on the 17th inst., when both the eighth and ninth of the Beethoven symphonies are announced, the chorus organized by Mr. Nikisch appearing for the first time in the latter work, assisted by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

A delightful concert was given in the Newton club house last Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, when a large number of the club, with their wives, daughters and friends, were present, among them being represented the fashion of the Newtons in full force. Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, the 'cellist, played delightfully the "Moment Musical," and a selection from Gluck's "Orpheus" was beautifully rendered by Mr. Charles Mole, the flutist.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1892.

The novelty introduced by Mr. Nikisch at the Symphony concert at Music Hall was Symphony No. 1 in F major, the work of Eugene D'Albert. Mr. D'Albert is a young man who has attained eminence as a pianist and also as a composer, the symphony in question being one of his most ambitious works. It has an element of interest from its orchestral combinations, some of which are exceedingly unique and surprisingly well worked out in so young a composer. The theme with which the symphony begins and terminates is a lofty one and all the movements are ably handled, but it cannot be termed a thoroughly enjoyable work. The third movement is the best, with its light and shade. It was rendered in a masterly manner by the orchestra, Mr. Nikisch giving a comprehensive reading of the score.

Bach's suite in D major was attentively listened to and heartily appreciated. It is somewhat familiar to Boston concert-goers, and is always received with pleasure. The second movement in the strings was admirably given, especially the work of the first violin. The programme closed with the overture of "The Flying Dutchman."

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1892.

The Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite, D major.....Bach
Symphony No. 1, F major.....d'Albert
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The performance of the suite was too often ragged and untuneful. The air, as played by Mr. Kneisel, was an agreeable relief, although one might with justice have asked for a fuller tone and a broader delivery. The symphony by Eugen d'Albert was first played in the United States November 26, 1887, by the Symphony Society of New York, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. When this symphony was first heard in European cities it attracted attention, chiefly on account of the comparative youth of the composer-virtuoso. But when it was heard in January of this year in Berlin, even Otto Lessmann, the warm admirer of d'Albert, protested against its appearance in a concert hall. The symphony showed five years ago the considerable command of the composer over orchestral resources, and it is said that since the first production d'Albert has applied the file to his score. It is not worth the while to review the work at length. Having heard the symphony of the pianist, let us rather remember pleasantly and gratefully the pianist himself. Instead of pointing out Brahms, Wagner and other members of the noble army of martyrs, who at times rise above the sullen billows of d'Albert's music, let us consider the words of Charles Avison, organist in Newcastle a century ago—the Avison treated so singularly by Robert Browning. Master Avison speaks as follows:

"In these vague and unmeaning pieces we often find the bewildered composer either struggling with the difficulties of an extraneous modulation or tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious repetition of some jejune thought, imagining he can never do enough till he has run through every key that can be crowded into one movement, till, at length, all his force being exhausted, he drops into a dull close where his languid piece seems rather to expire and yield its last than conclude with a spirited and well-timed cadence."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was just like dear old Boston not to neglect the symphony concert Saturday evening, but to put on its best bib and tucker and occupy just as many seats as usual, and all this, to be sure, out of love and admiration for the heavenly maid music—for herself alone.

Yes, if there is any place on this earth where music is worshipped for its own sake, is experienced as a lofty revelation, to which Satan is a bitter enemy: where the much vaunted brilliancy of the show-virtuoso no longer with his radiant yet polluting smiles allures and dazzles the puolic as of yore—that place is our own Athens. So just as of old a Pythagorean spirit prevails, and it would seem as though music and geometry were on the very verge of being taught here as at the foundation of the universe.

Now, "to return to our mutton," the programme for Saturday evening began with the Bach suite for orchestra in D major, went on with a symphony by D'Albert in F major, op. 4; and ended with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

The Bach suite has not been given here for several years, possibly not since Mr. Gericke was here, although it is vastly important that the music by Bach in this form should be kept before the public. The solemn and dignified opening and close of the overture were given by the orchestra with some breadth. The intervening vivace was not so clearly given out by Mr. Nikisch as cheerful expression of a massive mind, but the performance was all too sombre and unrobust.

The adagio so well known as the Bach air on the G string was played with delicacy, if not with sentimentality conspicuous by its absence. The graceful gavottes, bourees and gignes as usual pleased the audience immensely. Throughout the playing of the suite there was a lack of breadth—except the opening grave—force and volume of tone which are so essential for an adequate experience with Bach's music; yet in point of shading there was an exuberance of it. The gigne was somewhat jerkily played. The whole interpretation was of the feminine gender.

Any musician will appreciate that in designating as a quasi-important symphony the work of Eugen d'Albert produced at this concert, not the slightest disrespect is intended. After a single hearing the writer may perhaps best express his opinion of it by partially quoting what he has already given out in the columns of an esteemed contemporary.

The work is not without certain great excellencies, but on the other hand it has many mannerisms, is incoherent and desultory in statement; but portions of it are masterly. The composer's originality appears to be in the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of traditional methods. As has been stated, the work is quite as remote from genius as oratorical fluency, intermixed with scholasticism, is from the imperishable gift of poesy. The concert ended with an excellent performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

C. L. CAPEN.

SUNDAY HERALD.

DECEMBER 4, 1892.

Mr. Grossmith's "society up to date" should be heard and seen by everybody who enjoys a skit of the nonsense of the day. He is certainly one of the cleverest monologists we have had here, and if he hasn't met with that test of success—packed audiences—it is because Music Hall is a big place to fill, and performances like his are somewhat lost in too much space. Boston really needs a new hall for public entertainments of this character, exactly as it has long needed one for the hearing of chamber music. We have outgrown the bare, shabby Music Hall of our youthful adoration, and from hearsay of those handsome modern halls in other cities, long to have them copied or excelled in Boston. Of course a gilt-edged Boston audience is highly decorative, and would embellish a barn, when it comes to that. For do we not know who is who at the Symphony concerts, and that it matters little if the auditorium is a species of superannuated barracks? For isn't Everybody, with a big capital E, filling all the benches, and are not two of Boston's critics leaning over the balcony rail like those Raphael cherubs in the picture? But, unhappily, a time comes when some lone star fills the stage, and only a handful of the Four Hundred lends light and leading to the scene, and then, indeed, worn paint and rattling doors speak up with impartial frankness. Nevertheless, I must be honest, and admit that Music Hall is much better illuminated than it was a few seasons ago, and, though old associations are fast fading out, we can see to peruse our programme without having to strike a match. One of these days Boston's musical Mæcenas will have a generous fit, and then a grand temple dedicated to the Heavenly Maid will be an accomplished fact. In the lesser halls of this noble building can then be given any style of public performance. Amen!

[54]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 4, 1892.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

So far from anything of orchestral importance being lost by not performing the Grieg suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" at the Symphony concert last evening there was a welcome gain in the substitution of the great D major suite by Bach. The suite by Grieg which Mr. Nikisch had selected but had wisely concluded not to have performed is well known to pianoforte teachers as a very serviceable teaching piece; but is is pianoforte music pure and simple, and would not prove effective if given by string orchestra. The Bach suite in D was well known to our grandparents in the days of the well-remembered Harvard concerts. If our memory serves us correctly, Conductor Gericke had it performed here several times; but it was then interpreted in a far more Bachian spirit than characterized the performance last evening. One good healthy fortissimo from the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be agreeable for a change and just such a dynamic quality was invariably lacking whenever it was required of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Bach suite, which was smoothly and refinedly played, but nevertheless in a manner that was at once sterile and ineffective.

The novel feature of the concert was with Eugen D' Albert's symphony of 4. It is easy to err in judgment when attempting to speak ex cathedra after a single hearing of a work so elaborate, lengthy and pretentious as this new symphony, but a few impressions if not in character tainted with pinchbeckism may well be given. The chief fault of the symphony would appear to be with certain mannerisms; and there is an inexplicable mixture in it also of masterly passages, of the quasi-fugue style, of one excellent fugue also having two subjects on the one hand and on the other of puerile weaknesses, of bold phrase now and then followed by a certain lack of individual resources and warm imaginativeness. Portions of the second movement are involved in just such dryness as the amateur might naturally mistake for classicality, while it is not classicality, but more like pedantry. The form of it is very peculiar and even grotesque at times. As a whole, it appears not to be the work of an essentially personal, self-evolved composer.

D'Albert's originality as shown in this work appears to be the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of past methods yet it is all in all as remote from genius as oratorical fluency intermixed with scholasticism is from the divine gift of poesy

The concert ended with a surprisingly fine performance of the overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," by Wagner.

The next concert will not take place until Saturday evening, Dec. 17, Beethoven's birthday, when the eighth and ninth symphonies will be performed. The Boston Symphony chorus will make its debut, and the soloists for the symphony will be Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Mein.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC: 4, 1892.

D'Albert's First Symphony Finely Played.

The feature of the seventh of this season's symphony concerts was the performance for the first time in America of Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4. So great is the reputation of this composer as a pianist, and so cordial has been the favor accorded the few of his compositions heard here, that there was naturally a great deal of interest felt in the performance of his most pretentious composition. Consequently Music Hall was more than ordinarily crowded, both at the Friday rehearsal and at last evening's concert.

The symphony received splendid interpretation from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and it was evident that the beauties of the work were fully displayed. It is an exceedingly voluminous composition, and it is possible that its great length accounted in a measure for the lack of enthusiasm awakened by its performance. It is certainly an interesting work, and displays musical intelligence of a very high order.

It is not particularly notable for originality, neither is it strikingly beautiful in the variety or melodiousness of its themes. But it is treated in a thoroughly scholarly manner: the scoring is vigorous, rich and highly colored and very elaborate in ornamentation.

There are four movements, and they approach the old, true, symphonic form much more closely than do the average works of modern composers. The first movement presents three pleasing themes, which are worked out in regular form, and the movement is brought to a close by a short, but effective, coda. The second or slow, movement is, perhaps, the most interesting of the four. It is written mainly for the strings and the wood wind, and is most delightful in its melodic effects.

The scherzo is unconventional in treatment, and some very pleasing results are attained. The finale is brilliant and forceful, an uncommonly grand effect being gained by free use of the brasses.

Bach's suite in D major and "The Flying Dutchman" overture were the other offerings on the programme. The five short movements of the Bach suite were played with much expression and evidently gave a great deal of pleasure to the audience, even to those of its members who do not always find much delight in listening to the works of this old master.

The Wagner overture was played in the same effective style which has in the past characterized Mr. Nikisch's presentation of this beautiful series of tone pictures. The Symphony orchestra will be away on its travels this week, so that the next concert will be given on Dec. 17, when two of Beethoven's symphonies, the eighth and ninth, will be performed, with the assistance of Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists, and the Boston Symphony chorus.

THE LEADER.

DECEMBER, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its eighth season at Chickering Hall, Oct. 16. The programme was:—Quartet, D minor, Haydn; Fragment (one movement) in C minor, Schubert; Sextet for strings, A major, Dvörák, Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Leo Schultz assisting in this work. The second concert was given Nov. 7, with the programme:—Quartet, E flat, Ed. Lalo; sonata for piano and violin, A minor, Schumann; quartet, D minor, Schubert. The works were given with an artistic finish, a delicacy and a completeness that distinguish the labors of this fine organization. The qualities that distinguish each of the composers were rendered with faithfulness and with a perfection that deserves nothing but praise. A large audience was present on each occasion and greeted with enthusiasm the artistic interpretations of this artistic quartet.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 157.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1892.

Notable Orchestra Concerts the Coming Week.

In making the programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's present home season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave prominence to Eugen d'Albert's first symphony in F major, op. 4, a work which was planned as a novelty of last season, if memory serves.

Gratified curiosity must be taken as the largest result obtained in this performance. The work is eminently conservative in its construction, it is a scholarly effort, and the composer shows a masterly acquaintance with orchestral combinations, but, unfortunately, he uses all these abilities in presenting in various colors phrases of little musical value, and in working out indefinite thoughts rather than well formed musical ideas. The symphony is decidedly interesting as an orchestral study, but as an evidence of the genius of D'Albert as a composer it is decidedly disappointing. The final movement is by all odds the best, but the merits of this portion of the work are hardly sufficient to win a permanent place for the symphony in the repertoire of the day. The performance of the symphony by the orchestra was calculated to give its meritorious features their due prominence, and whatever interest was lacking was caused by the weakness and deficiencies of the composition.

A thoroughly delightful performance of the suite in D major, by J. S. Bach, was the opening number of the evening's programme, and the excellent work done by the string players, especially by Mr. Kneisel in the lento movement, was the cause of genuine pleasure to all.

The glorious "Flying Dutchman" overture came with revivifying effect after the symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gave this popular selection from the Wagner repertoire a magnificent reading, the brass section of the band being used in a grand, broad fashion that gave the strong contrasts demanded with inspiring results.

The orchestra goes on its second occasional tour this week, and the regular series will be resumed on the 17th inst., when both the eighth and ninth of the Beethoven symphonies are announced, the chorus organized by Mr. Nikisch appearing for the first time in the latter work, assisted by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

A delightful concert was given in the Newton club house last Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, when a large number of the club, with their wives, daughters and friends, were present, among them being represented the fashion of the Newtons in full force. Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, the 'cellist, played delightfully the "Moment Musical," and a selection from Gluck's "Orpheus" was beautifully rendered by Mr. Charles Mole, the flutist.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1892.

The novelty introduced by Mr. Nikisch at the Symphony concert at Music Hall was Symphony No. 1 in F major, the work of Eugene D'Albert. Mr. D'Albert is a young man who has attained eminence as a pianist and also as a composer. the symphony in question being one of his most ambitious works. It has an element of interest from its orchestral combinations, some of which are exceedingly unique and surprisingly well worked out in so young a composer. The theme with which the symphony begins and terminates is a lofty one and all the movements are ably handled, but it cannot be termed a thoroughly enjoyable work. The third movement is the best, with its light and shade. It was rendered in a masterly manner by the orchestra, Mr. Nikisch giving a comprehensive reading of the score.

Bach's suite in D major was attentively listened to and heartily appreciated. It is somewhat familiar to Boston concert-goers, and is always received with pleasure. The second movement in the strings was admirably given, especially the work of the first violin. The programme closed with the overture of "The Flying Dutchman."

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1892.

The Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite, D major.....Bach
Symphony No. 1, F major.....d'Albert
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The performance of the suite was too often ragged and untuneful. The air, as played by Mr. Kneisel, was an agreeable relief, although one might with justice have asked for a fuller tone and a broader delivery. The symphony by Eugen d'Albert was first played in the United States November 26, 1887, by the Symphony Society of New York, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. When this symphony was first heard in European cities it attracted attention, chiefly on account of the comparative youth of the composer-virtuoso. But when it was heard in January of this year in Berlin, even Otto Lessmann, the warm admirer of d'Albert, protested against its appearance in a concert hall. The symphony showed five years ago the considerable command of the composer over orchestral resources, and it is said that since the first production d'Albert has applied the file to his score. It is not worth the while to review the work at length. Having heard the symphony of the pianist, let us rather remember pleasantly and gratefully the pianist himself. Instead of pointing out Brahms, Wagner and other members of the noble army of martyrs, who at times rise above the sullen billows of d'Albert's music, let us consider the words of Charles Avison, organist in Newcastle a century ago—the Avison treated so singularly by Robert Browning. Master Avison speaks as follows:

"In these vague and unmeaning pieces we often find the bewildered composer either struggling with the difficulties of an extraneous modulation or tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious repetition of some jejune thought, imagining he can never do enough till he has run through every key that can be crowded into one movement, till, at length, all his force being exhausted, he drops into a dull close where his langrid piece seems rather to expire and yield its last than conclude with a spirited and well-timed cadence."

***

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was just like dear old Boston not to neglect the symphony concert Saturday evening, but to put on its best bib and tucker and occupy just as many seats as usual, and all this, to be sure, out of love and admiration for the heavenly maid music—for herself alone.

Yes, if there is any place on this earth where music is worshipped for its own sake, is experienced as a lofty revelation, to which Satan is a bitter enemy: where the much vaunted brilliancy of the show-virtuoso no longer with his radiant yet polluting smiles allures and dazzles the public as of yore—that place is our own Athens. So just as of old a Pythagorean spirit prevails, and it would seem as though music and geometry were on the very verge of being taught here as at the foundation of the universe.

Now, "to return to our mutton," the programme for Saturday evening began with the Bach suite for orchestra in D major, went on with a symphony by D'Albert in F major, op. 4; and ended with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

The Bach suite has not been given here for several years, possibly not since Mr. Gericke was here, although it is vastly important that the music by Bach in this form should be kept before the public. The solemn and dignified opening and close of the overture were given by the orchestra with some breadth. The intervening vivace was not so clearly given out by Mr. Nikisch as cheerful expression of a massive mind, but the performance was all too sombre and unrobust.

The adagio so well known as the Bach air on the G string was played with delicacy, if not with sentimentality conspicuous by its absence. The graceful gavottes, bourees and gignes as usual pleased the audience immensely. Throughout the playing of the suite there was a lack of breadth—except the opening grave—force and volume of tone which are so essential for an adequate experience with Bach's music; yet in point of shading there was an exuberance of it. The gigue was somewhat jerkily played. The whole interpretation was of the feminine gender.

Any musician will appreciate that in designating as a quasi-important symphony the work of Eugen d'Albert produced at this concert, not the slightest disrespect is intended. After a single hearing the writer may perhaps best express his opinion of it by partially quoting what he has already given out in the columns of an esteemed contemporary.

The work is not without certain great excellencies, but on the other hand it has many mannerisms, is incoherent and desultory in statement; but portions of it are masterly. The composer's originality appears to be in the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of traditional methods. As has been stated, the work is quite as remote from genius as oratorical fluency, intermixed with scholasticism, is from the imperishable gift of poesy. The concert ended with an excellent performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

C. L. CAPEN.

SUNDAY HERALD DECEMBER 4, 1892

Mr. Grossmith's "Society up to Date" should be heard and seen by everybody who enjoys a skit of the nonsense of the day. He is certainly one of the cleverest monologists we have had here, and if he hasn't met with that test of success—packed audiences—it is because Music Hall is a big place to fill, and performances like his are somewhat lost in too much space. Boston really needs a new hall for public entertainments of this character, exactly as it has long needed one for the hearing of chamber music. We have outgrown the bare, shabby Music Hall of our youthful adoration, and from hearsay of those handsome modern halls in other cities, long to have them copied or excelled in Boston. Of course a gilt-edged Boston audience is highly decorative, and would embellish a barn, when it comes to that. For do we not know who is who at the Symphony concerts, and that it matters little if the auditorium is a species of superannuated barracks? For isn't Everybody, with a big capital E, filling all the benches, and are not two of Boston's critics leaning over the balcony rail like those Raphael cherubs in the picture? But, unhappily, a time comes when some lone star fills the stage, and only a handful of the Four Hundred lends light and leading to the scene, and then, indeed, worn paint and rattling doors speak up with impartial frankness. Nevertheless, I must be honest, and admit that Music Hall is much better illuminated than it was a few seasons ago, and, though old associations are fast fading out, we can see to peruse our programme without having to strike a match. One of these days Boston's musical Mæcenas will have a generous fit, and then a grand temple dedicated to the Heavenly Maid will be an accomplished fact. In the lesser halls of this noble building can then be given any style of public performance. Amen!

[54]

...ONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1892.

...usic Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...he programme of the seventh Symphony ...ncert, given in Music Hall last Saturday ...ning, was as follows:

... Suite for Orchestra, in D major.
...ert: Symphony No. 1, in F major, Opus 4.
...er: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

The Bach suite was a treat indeed. With the ...ception of the Air, it was finely played, and, ...f the audience did not appear to enjoy it quite ...s much as they do some other things, so much ...he worse for them. But it was a delight to ...isten to this great, genial, stoutly built music, ...in which every phrase fits into its place as by a ...divine right, in which every part has something ...to say, and every portion is felt to bear some ...organic relation to every other portion. We ...have hinted that the Air was less well played ...than the rest; to our ear, the phrasing of the ...first violins sounded rather artificial and ...overdone, a little "Ole-Bullish," in fact—...not as a fine singer would have sung it. We ...know it is no joke to phrase with the bow as ...one phrases with the voice; and yet the two ...processes are not entirely dissimilar; the length ...of stroke of the bow corresponds in a measure to ...the singer's length of breath at one inhalation; ...more than this, both singers, when near the end ...of their breath, and string players, when near ...the end of their bow, often find it difficult not ...to end the phrase with a little lunge, with ...something very like a gasping sforzando—a ...trick which only good schooling and a fine ...musical sense can overcome. Being neither ...a violinist nor a singer, and judging merely ...from what we have heard, we should say that ...this difficulty is apparently more easily over ...come in the voice than it is in bowing; unless-...indeed, the prevalency of this trick among ...string players is an instance of something not ...unknown in the history of musical perform-...ance, an instance of what is intrinsically a vice ...or an awkward mannerism, becoming a ..."school." But if the playing of the Air left ...something to be desired, the other movements ...in the suite went finely; Mr. Pierre Müller is ...especially to be complimented on his playing ...of the first trumpet part.

The d'Albert symphony was first given in ...this country by Mr. Damrosch in New York in ...1888. It is reported that d'Albert wrote this ...symphony when only nineteen years old: it is ...certainly that the work was first performed in ...public when he was twenty-two. This should ...not be lost sight of in considering the sym-...phony. It bears many marks of youthfulness. ...Its length, a certain lack of individuality and ...homogeneity of style, a tendency on the com-...poser's part to fire off all his guns at once; ...these are the common characteristics of young ...writers. The source of the young man's ...inspiration is not hard to guess at; ...Brahms and Wagner evidently haunted his ...mind when he wrote it. Admirable influences, ...both of them, only not very easily reconcilable. ...The predominating influence is plainly Brahms; ...not only does the character of many of the ...themes recall him, but there is not a little ...in the working-out that reminds one of ...his style. But every now and then one ...comes upon very Wagnerish bits of har-...mony, which sound strangely enough in their ...Brahmsian surroundings. Be it said at once, too ...that d'Albert has been decidedly happier in fol-...lowing Brahms's lead than Wagner's—quite ...apart from the fact that the former master's ...style and methods are eminently more ...symphonic than those of the tone-poet of Bay-...reuth. What of Brahms, d'Albert has here ...given us may not always be very good Brahms; ...but what he has caught from Wagner is ...often little better than a caricature. Wag-...ner by no means minced matters when ...he wrote complicated chromatic harmony; ...but in this symphony d'Albert has writ-...ten some combinations of notes that ...are positively hair-raising—and written them, ...too, with a thoroughness of conviction that ...makes one smile a little. But, with and in ...spite of all this, there is a great deal in the ...symphony to excite admiring respect and won-...der. Earnestness of purpose, a noble disdain of ...triviality and mere display, the most whole-...hearted conviction show themselves through-...out; some of the tasks the young composer has ...set himself are no child's play, and he often ...gets through with them with great credit. ...Personally we liked the first two movements ...best; but this may have been mainly because ...they came first, and we were less worn out. ...The performance was excellent.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture was ...grandly played; here Mr. Nikisch scored an-...other triumph in "interpretation." The work ...is, at best, not very coherently written; but if ...anything could make it seem coherent, it was ...the way Mr. Nikisch conducted it, while all its ...strong emotional and dramatic features were ...made the most of.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, ...Dec. 16, and Saturday evening, Dec. 17)) is: ...Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F major, opus ...93; Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor ...(choral), opus 125. The solo parts will be sung ...by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, ...Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. ...There will be no symphony concert this week.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, DEC. 11, 1892.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of the 3d inst., was the dullest in the season's series, thus far, which is saying much for since these concerts were instituted the programmes have not been so uninteresting as they have been this year. The performances opened with Bach's familiar Suite in D, which was read weakly, and was played in a slovenly manner that was positively discreditable. In the vivace the attack was loose throughout, and in the Bourree there were moments when the strings were quite at loggerheads in respect to unity and emphasis. It was a species of go-as-you-please performance, and toward the end of the Gigue there was so much confusion in an apparent effort of some of the instruments to "be in first," that it was a relief, and something of a surprise, when they ended together. The Air was given in a finical sugary manner from which "jerkiness" was not wholly absent, and the performance of the work as a whole left almost everything to be desired in regard to style and character. In other words, it was unworthy the conductor and the orchestra. It fell flat with the audience. D'Albert's Symphony No. 1 in F, op. 4, followed. It is a wearisome work, extremely modern, distinctly sophomoric, and exceedingly wanting in individuality. From beginning to end it suggests a composition for the pianoforte that has been adapted to orchestral performance. Of music pure and simple, it contains little, and at every stage the composer seems to have been moved to show how much he knew of harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation rather than to exemplify an irresistible inspiration to write a symphony. Why the work was performed it is not easy to decide. D'Albert, though a fine pianist, has no standing as a composer, and this effort will do little if anything toward winning for him such standing. The symphony has had no success elsewhere that imperatively called for its presentation here, and it could well have been passed by in favor of a work by some better known composer; let us say, for example, a work by Professor Paine, or by M. Chadwick, or by Mr. Foote, who have a certain deserved recognition as writers for the orchestra. It is probable that they may be heard later in the season, but that is no excuse for boring a symphony audience with such a boyish failure as is this D'Albert symphony. The concert ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture. This evening there will be no concert, the orchestra being away on one of its periodical tours. For next Saturday evening the programme is to consist of two symphonies by Beethoven—No. 8 and No. 9. The solo parts in the latter will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH will be the pianist at the Kneisel Quartet concert this afternoon at Chickering Hall. The program embraces Haydn's quartet in D major, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Op. 95, and Brahm's piano quartet in A major, Op. 26.

MADAME Nordica arrived from London Dec. 2. The prima donna will make an extensive concert tour.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co., Limited.

E. Friedlaender.....President

408 NORTH FOURTH STREET.

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, or $5 per annum.

Dienstag, 6. Dez. 1892.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Gestern Nachmittag gab das Boston Symphonie Orchester in der Academy of Music ein Konzert, in welchem diese ausgezeichnete Organisation unter Leitung des Herrn Nikisch ein gemischtes Programm, meist leichteren Charakters zum Vortrag brachte. Die wichtigste Nummer war Griegs „Peer Gynt Suite", eine melodische und packende Composition, welche das Orchester ganz brillant zum Vortrag brachte. Außerdem wurde die Tannhäuser Ouverture und „Danse Macabre" von Saint Saens geboten. In letzterem dokumentirte sich Herr Kneisel, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, wiederum als ein Violinen-Virtuose ersten Ranges, ferner erfreute das reizende „Loin du Bal" von Gillett und Liszts wunderbare Polonaise. Die Solisten waren die tüchtige Sängerin Mme Nordica, welche das Lied „Una voce poca fa" aus Roissinis „Barbier" und eine Polacca aus „Esmeralda" von Goving Thomas ganz vortrefflich sang und stürmischen Beifall erntete. Die Vorträge des Cellisten Herrn Schröder, eine Nocturne von Chopin, ein Adagio von Bach und das schwierige Capriciso von Klengel standen auf gleich hoher Stufe mit denen des Orchesters.

Das zweite Subskriptions-Konzert des Orchesters findet morgen Abend statt und kommt in demselben die dritte Symphonie von Brahms, Piano-Konzert Nr. 2 von Liszt, Orchester-Suite von Dvorak und der Sachermarsch von Wagner zum Vortrag.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 164.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1892.

Mme. Lillian Nordica has, under the management of Charles A. Ellis, made a most successful beginning of her season in this country. She is to visit her "native wilds" way down in Maine the coming week, singing at Bangor, Augusta and Lewiston.

[55]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Bach: Suite for Orchestra, in D major.
D'Albert: Symphony No. 1, in F major, Opus 4.
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

The Bach suite was a treat indeed. With the exception of the Air, it was finely played, and, if the audience did not appear to enjoy it quite as much as they do some other things, so much the worse for them. But it was a delight to listen to this great, genial, stoutly built music, in which every phrase fits into its place as by a divine right, in which every part has something to say, and every portion is felt to bear some organic relation to every other portion. We have hinted that the Air was less well played than the rest; to our ear, the phrasing of the first violins sounded rather artificial and overdone, a little "Ole-Bullish," in fact—not as a fine singer would have sung it. We know it is no joke to phrase with the bow as one phrases with the voice; and yet the two processes are not entirely dissimilar; the length of stroke of the bow corresponds in a measure to the singer's length of breath at one inhalation; more than this, both singers, when near the end of their breath, and string players, when near the end of their bow, often find it difficult not to end the phrase with a little lunge, with something very like a gasping sforzando—a trick which only good schooling and a fine musical sense can overcome. Being neither a violinist nor a singer, and judging merely from what we have heard, we should say that this difficulty is apparently more easily overcome in the voice than it is in bowing; unless, indeed, the prevalency of this trick among string players is an instance of something not unknown in the history of musical performance, an instance of what is intrinsically a vice or an awkward mannerism, becoming a "school." But if the playing of the Air left something to be desired, the other movements in the suite went finely; Mr. Pierre Müller is especially to be complimented on his playing of the first trumpet part.

The d'Albert symphony was first given in this country by Mr. Damrosch in New York in 1888. It is reported that d'Albert wrote this symphony when only nineteen years old: it is certainly that the work was first performed in public when he was twenty-two. This should not be lost sight of in considering the symphony. It bears many marks of youthfulness. Its length, a certain lack of individuality and homogeneity of style, a tendency on the composer's part to fire off all his guns at once; these are the common characteristics of young writers. The source of the young man's inspiration is not hard to guess at: Brahms and Wagner evidently haunted his mind when he wrote it. Admirable influences, both of them, only not very easily reconcilable. The predominating influence is plainly Brahms; not only does the character of many of the themes recall him, but there is not a little in the working-out that reminds one of his style. But every now and then one comes upon very Wagnerish bits of harmony, which sound strangely enough in their Brahmsian surroundings. Be it said at once, too that d'Albert has been decidedly happier in following Brahms's lead than Wagner's—quite apart from the fact that the former master's style and methods are eminently more symphonic than those of the tone-poet of Bayreuth. What of Brahms, d'Albert has here given us may not always be very good Brahms; but what he has caught from Wagner is often little better than a caricature. Wagner by no means minced matters when he wrote complicated chromatic harmony; but in this symphony d'Albert has written some combinations of notes that are positively hair-raising—and written them, too, with a thoroughness of conviction that makes one smile a little. But, with and in spite of all this, there is a great deal in the symphony to excite admiring respect and wonder. Earnestness of purpose, a noble disdain of triviality and mere display, the most wholehearted, conviction show themselves throughout; some of the tasks the young composer has set himself are no child's play, and he often gets through with them with great credit. Personally we liked the first two movements best; but this may have been mainly because they came first, and we were less worn out The performance was excellent.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture was grandly played; here Mr. Nikisch scored another triumph in "interpretation." The work is, at best, not very coherently written; but if anything could make it seem coherent, it was the way Mr. Nikisch conducted it, while all its strong emotional and dramatic features were made the most of.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Dec. 16, and Saturday evening, Dec. 17)) is: Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93; Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), opus 125. The solo parts will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. There will be no symphony concert this week.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, DEC. 11, 1892.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of the 3d inst., was the dullest in the season's series, thus far, which is saying much, for since these concerts were instituted the programmes have not been so uninteresting as they have been this year. The performances opened with Bach's familiar Suite in D, which was read weakly, and was played in a slovenly manner that was positively discreditable. In the vivace the attack was loose throughout, and in the Bourree there were moments when the strings were quite at loggerheads in respect to unity and emphasis. It was a species of go-as-you-please performance, and toward the end of the Gigue there was so much confusion in an apparent effort of some of the instruments to "be in first," that it was a relief, and something of a surprise, when they ended together. The Air was given in a finical sugary manner from which "jerkiness" was not wholly absent, and the performance of the work as a whole left almost everything to be desired in regard to style and character. In other words, it was unworthy the conductor and the orchestra. It fell flat with the audience. D'Albert's Symphony No. 1 in F, op. 4, followed. It is a wearisome work, extremely modern, distinctly sophomoric, and exceedingly wanting in individuality. From beginning to end it suggests a composition for the pianoforte that has been adapted to orchestral performance. Of music pure and simple, it contains little, and at every stage the composer seems to have been moved to show how much he knew of harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation rather than to exemplify an irresistible inspiration to write a symphony. Why the work was performed it is not easy to decide. D'Albert, though a fine pianist, has no standing as a composer, and this effort will do little if anything toward winning for him such standing. The symphony has had no success elsewhere that imperatively called for its presentation here, and it could well have been passed by in favor of a work by some better known composer; let us say, for example, a work by Professor Paine, or by M. Chadwick, or by Mr. Foote, who have a certain deserved recognition as writers for the orchestra. It is probable that they may be heard later in the season, but that is no excuse for boring a symphony audience with such a boyish failure as is this D'Albert symphony. The concert ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture. This evening there will be no concert, the orchestra being away on one of its periodical tours. For next Saturday evening the programme is to consist of two symphonies by Beethoven—No. 8 and No. 9. The solo parts in the latter will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co.,
Limited.

R. Friedlander.....President
406 NORTH FOURTH STREET.

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, or $5 per annum.

Dienstag, 6. Dez. 1892.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Gestern Nachmittag gab das Boston Symphonie Orchester in der Academy of Music ein Konzert, in welchem diese ausgezeichnete Organisation unter Leitung des Herrn Nikisch ein gemischtes Programm, meist leichteren Charakters zum Vortrag brachte. Die wichtigste Nummer war Griegs „Peer Gynt Suite", eine melodische und packende Composition, welche das Orchester ganz brillant zum Vortrag brachte. Außerdem wurde die Tannhäuser Ouverture und „Danse Macabre" von Saint Saens geboten. In letzterem dokumentirte sich Herr Kneisel, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, wiederum als ein Violinen-Virtuose ersten Ranges, ferner erfreute das reizende „Loin du Bal" von Gillett und Liszts wunderbare Polonaise. Die Solisten waren die tüchtige Sängerin Mme Nordica, welche das Lied „Una voce poca fa" aus Roissinis „Barbier" und eine Polacca aus „Esmeralda" von Goring Thomas ganz vortrefflich sang und stürmischen Beifall erntete. Die Vorträge des Cellisten Herrn Schröder, eine Nocturne von Chopin, ein Adagio von Bach und das schwierige Capriciso von Klengel standen auf gleich hoher Stufe mit denen des Orchesters.

Das zweite Subskriptions-Konzert des Orchesters findet morgen Abend statt und kommt in demselben die dritte Symphonie von Brahms, Piano-Konzert Nr. 2 von Liszt, Orchester-Suite von Dvorak und der Sachermarsch von Wagner zum Vortrag.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 164.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1892.

Mme. Lillian Nordica has, under the management of Charles A. Ellis, made a most successful beginning of her season in this country. She is to visit her "native wilds" way down in Maine the coming week, singing at Bangor, Augusta and Lewiston.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH will be the pianist at the Kneisel Quartet concert this afternoon at Chickering Hall. The program embraces Haydn's quartet in D major, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Op. 95, and Brahm's piano quartet in A major, Op. 26.

MADAME Nordica arrived from London Dec. 2. The prima donna will make an extensive concert tour.

[55]

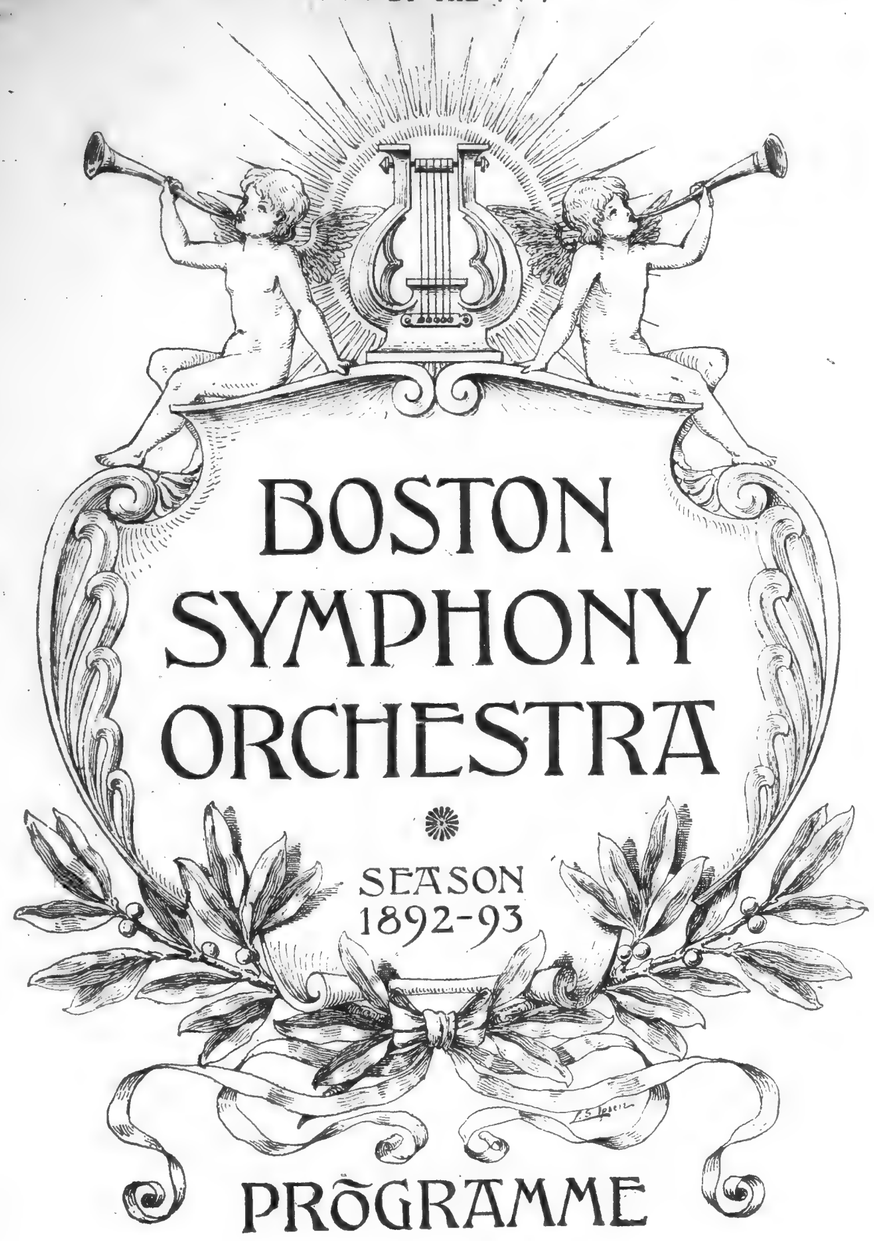
- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Monday Afternoon, December 5, at 3.

ONLY POPULAR MATINEE

. . . BY THE . . .



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

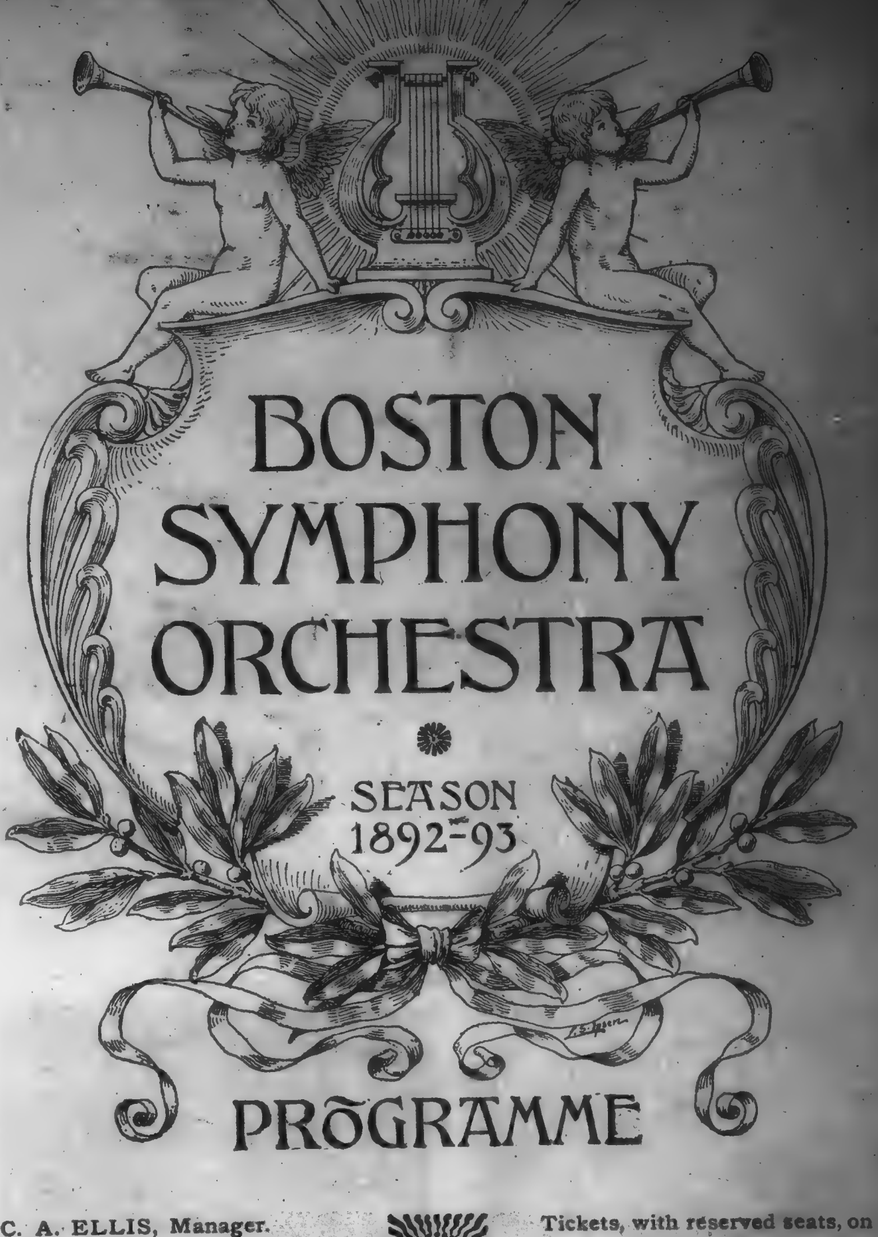
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 6, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

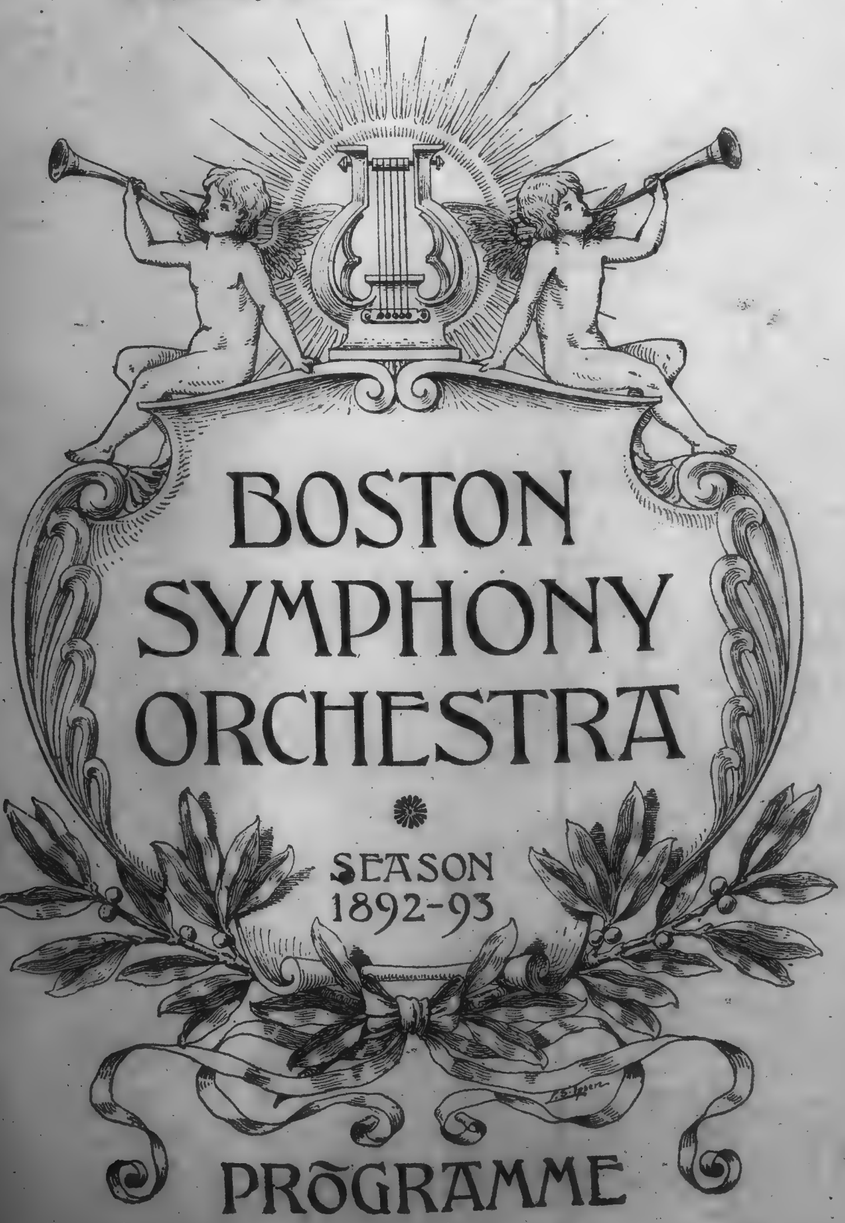
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, December 7, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

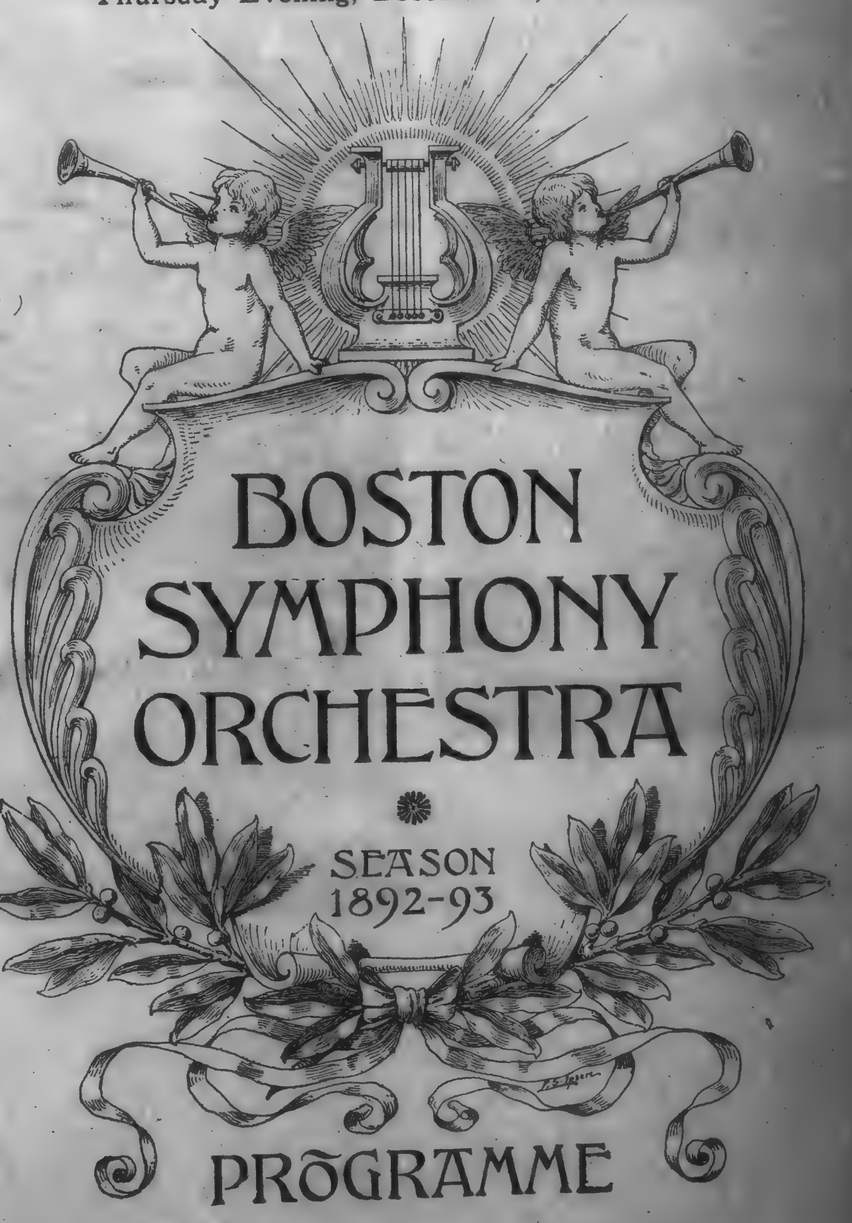
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, December 8, at 8 oclock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

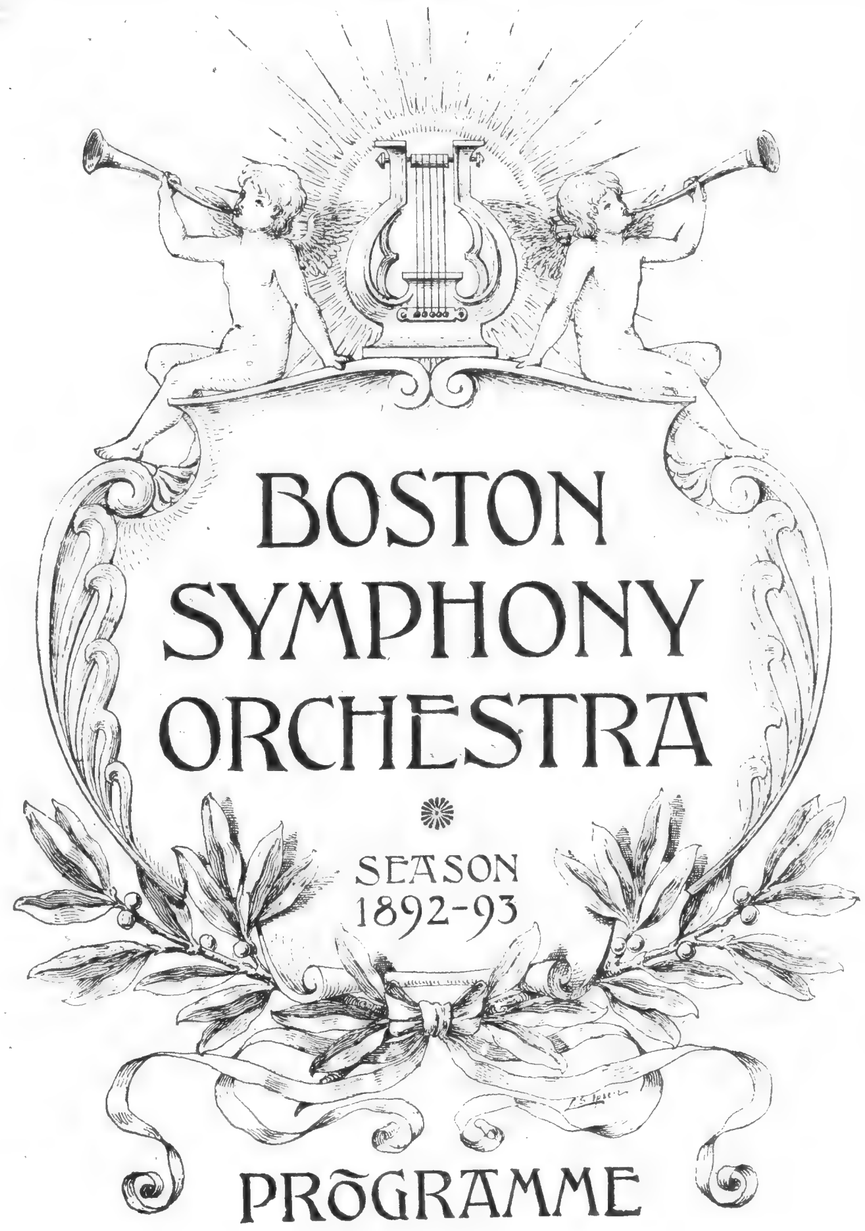
- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Monday Afternoon, December 5, at 3.

ONLY POPULAR MATINEE

. . . BY THE . . .



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 6, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

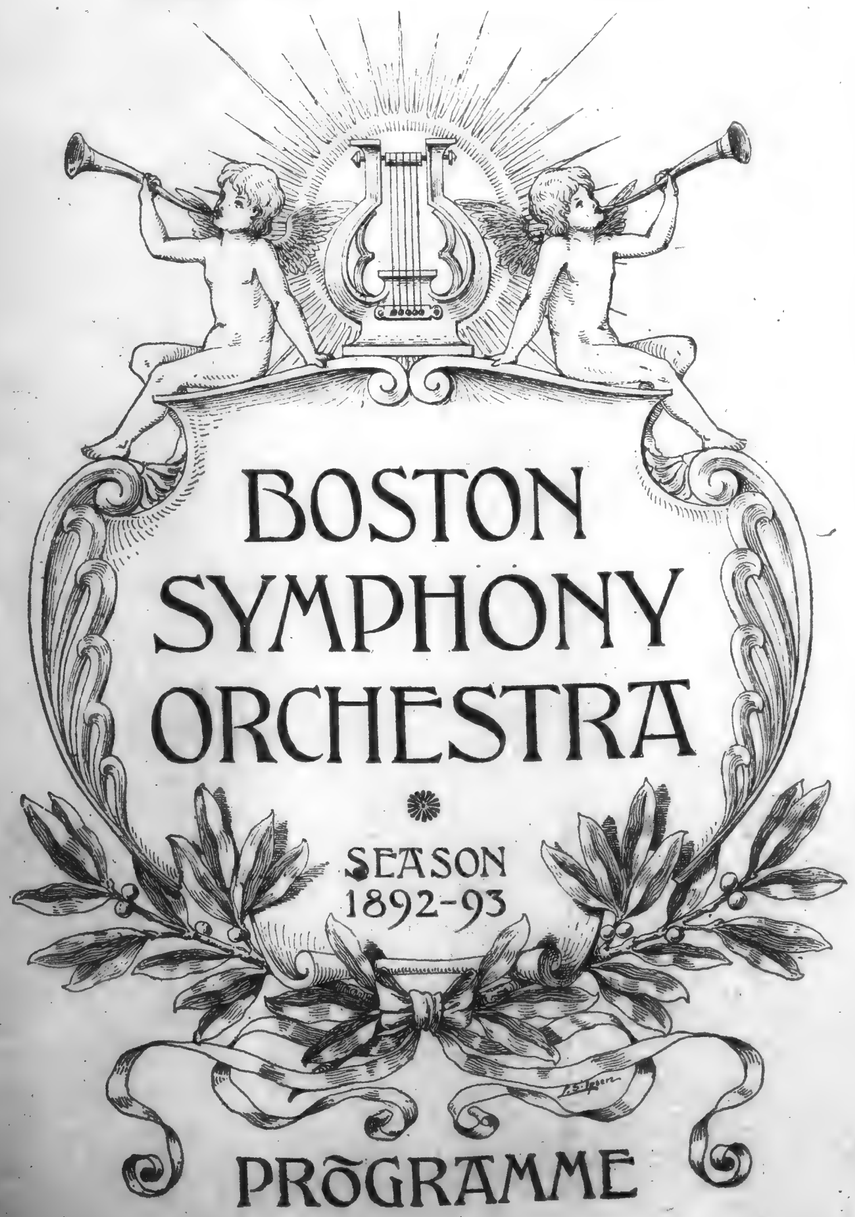
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, December 7, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, December 8, at 8 oclock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Dec. 9, at 3. Saturday Evening, Dec. 10, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, December 14, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Evening Post.

New York, Monday, Dec. 12, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Brahms epidemic appears to be raging in Boston. "There is the enduring odor of incense," says Mr. Philip Hale; "there is a perpetual flame on the altar, a flame that is tenderly nurtured by the vestals of the Back Bay." They have so much Brahms, in fact, that they are beginning to export him to New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday gave us his third symphony, and the Kneisel Quartet on Saturday afternoon the A major piano quartet. Whatever the Kneisel Quartet does it does well. In the matter of precision it has no superior, and in delicacy of shading all our local chamber-music clubs could learn of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder. But in programme-making the Boston Club is not always successful. Saturday's programme was open to the objection of monotony, all the pieces being of the same school, the romantic and really modern being left out. Haydn's quartet in D major was the most enjoyable piece played; it seemed more melodious, more spontaneous, than the Beethoven in F minor, opus 95, which followed. The anti-climax was reached in the Brahms quartet, which is an excellent illustration of Mr. Apthorp's remark that when Brahms's themes "do not recall with more or less vividness something one has heard before, they are too often curiously lacking in distinctness of outline and definiteness of musical purpose." The two allegros and the scherzo are pure Brahms, that is, weak in invention and tiresomely elaborated. The slow movement, on the other hand, is interesting, and even emotional. Why? Listen attentively and you will hear. In those weird chords on the muted strings Brahms has "materialized" the ghost of Emma in Weber's "Euryanthe" (tomb motive); and that stormy little dramatic passage following must be Schubert—ah, yes! it reminds one of the accompaniment of "Die Stadt." Surely it was unkind on the part of Weber and Schubert thus to anticipate Brahms's best things.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 14, at 8.
Friday Evening, Dec. 16, at 8.
Saturday Afternoon, Dec. 17, at 2.30.

MR. GEORGE GROSSMITH'S

HUMOROUS AND MUSICAL RECITALS.

PROGRAMME.

• Part I. •

A Humorous Sketch entitled

IS MUSIC A FAILURE?

The following Musical Illustrations will be introduced:

"ANNIE ROONEY."—A la Modern Composer.—"HOME, SWEET HOME" (with remarkable variations).—"GO ON TALKING, DON'T MIND ME!" (Song by an Imperturbable Tenor). To conclude with

THE WOOING OF PHYLLIS,

a pastoral Cantata as rehearsed by an English Country Choral Society.

The illustrations will include The Mild Accompanist.—The Disagreeable Conductor.—The Troublesome Chorus.—Miss Kitten's Recitative and Solo.—The Near-sighted Tenor.—Grand Finale, etc.

AN INTERVAL OF FIVE MINUTES.

• Part II. •

A Humorous Sketch entitled

Homburg, or Haunted by the Mikado.

THE MIKADO and the necessity for a little rest.—THE MIKADO here, there, and everywhere.—I think of it in the daytime, act it in the evening, and dream of it at night.—Sole topic of conversation.—I flee from it and go abroad.—I hear a real German band.—It does not play Wagner.—Oh, dear, no! only the Mikado.—The Homburg baths and their effect on different people.—Imitations of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Mozart, etc.

Mr. Grossmith will conclude the Sketch with his famous song,

THE HAPPY FATHERLAND.

AN INTERVAL OF THREE MINUTES.

• Part III. •

Illustrations and Imitations (Varied).

SONG, "THE VERY EYES OF ME."
How to compose a French Song.
Mr. Henry Irving and his little dog.

N.B.—The programme is subject to slight alteration.

Mr. Grossmith will accompany himself on a Chickering Grand Piano.

[57]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Dec. 9, at 3. Saturday Evening, Dec. 10, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, December 14, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Evening Post.

New York, Monday, Dec. 12, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The Brahms epidemic appears to be raging in Boston. "There is the enduring odor of incense," says Mr. Philip Hale; "there is a perpetual flame on the altar, a flame that is tenderly nurtured by the vestals of the Back Bay." They have so much Brahms, in fact, that they are beginning to export him to New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday gave us his third symphony, and the Kneisel Quartet on Saturday afternoon the A major piano quartet. Whatever the Kneisel Quartet does it does well. In the matter of precision it has no superior, and in delicacy of shading all our local chamber-music clubs could learn of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder. But in programme-making the Boston Club is not always successful. Saturday's programme was open to the objection of monotony, all the pieces being of the same school, the romantic and really modern being left out. Haydn's quartet in D major was the most enjoyable piece played; it seemed more melodious, more spontaneous, than the Beethoven in F minor, opus 95, which followed. The anti-climax was reached in the Brahms quartet, which is an excellent illustration of Mr. Apthorp's remark that when Brahms's themes "do not recall with more or less vividness something one has heard before, they are too often curiously lacking in distinctness of outline and definiteness of musical purpose." The two allegros and the scherzo are pure Brahms, that is, weak in invention and tiresomely elaborated. The slow movement, on the other hand, is interesting, and even emotional. Why? Listen attentively and you will hear. In those weird chords on the muted strings Brahms has "materialized" the ghost of Emma in Weber's "Euryanthe" (tomb motive); and that stormy little dramatic passage following must be Schubert—ah, yes! it reminds one of the accompaniment of "Die Stadt." Surely it was unkind on the part of Weber and Schubert thus to anticipate Brahms's best things.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 14, at 8.
Friday Evening, Dec. 16, at 8.
Saturday Afternoon, Dec. 17, at 2.30.

MR. GEORGE GROSSMITH'S

HUMOROUS AND MUSICAL RECITALS.

PROGRAMME.

• Part I. •

A Humorous Sketch entitled

IS MUSIC A FAILURE?

The following Musical Illustrations will be introduced:

"ANNIE ROONEY."—A la Modern Composer.—"HOME, SWEET HOME" (with remarkable variations).—"GO ON TALKING, DON'T MIND ME!" (Song by an Imperturbable Tenor). To conclude with

THE WOOING OF PHYLLIS,

a pastoral Cantata as rehearsed by an English Country Choral Society.

The illustrations will include The Mild Accompanist—The Disagreeable Conductor.—The Troublesome Chorus.—Miss Kitten's Recitative and Solo.—The Near-sighted Tenor.—Grand Finale, etc.

AN INTERVAL OF FIVE MINUTES.

• Part II. •

A Humorous Sketch entitled

Homburg, or Haunted by the Mikado.

THE MIKADO and the necessity for a little rest.—THE MIKADO here, there, and everywhere.—I think of it in the daytime, act it in the evening, and dream of it at night.—Sole topic of conversation.—I flee from it and go abroad.—I hear a real German band.—It does not play Wagner.—Oh, dear, no! only the Mikado.—The Homburg baths and their effect on different people.—Imitations of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Mozart, etc.

Mr. Grossmith will conclude the Sketch with his famous song,

THE HAPPY FATHERLAND.

AN INTERVAL OF THREE MINUTES.

• Part III. •

Illustrations and Imitations (Varied).

SONG, "THE VERY EYES OF ME."

How to compose a French Song.

Mr. Henry Irving and his little dog.

N.B.—The programme is subject to slight alteration.

Mr. Grossmith will accompany himself on a Chickering Grand Piano.

[57]

THE WASHINGTON POST, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7,

NIKISCH AND HIS ORCHESTRA

The Popular Boston Organization at Metzerott Music Hall.

FROM LIVING COMPOSERS

A Programme Made Up Almost Entirely of Modern Music—A Finished Performance Throughout, Though Disappointment Was Felt Because Two of the Numbers Had Often Been Heard in This City—Some Recent Changes Made in the Orchestra.

An essentially modern programme was presented by Mr. Nikisch last evening at Metzerott Music Hall on the occasion of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the exception of the Liszt concerto, the orchestral numbers were all works of living composers, and the Tschaikowsky symphony is a novelty, this orchestra playing it this season for the first time. Modern as it was, many found fault with the programme because it included Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg. Both works have been given here on several occasions by orchestra and both are favorites with Sousa and frequently given by the Marine Band. With Washington's limited facilities for hearing orchestral music, it is a hardship to have the programme filled up with familiar numbers when there are so many important works that have never been played here. Mr. Nikisch is evidently fond of these two numbers, and believes they belong together, for they were both given in the February concert, 1890, in Lincoln Music Hall.

The fault-finding must all be done with the make-up of the programme, as the performance itself was well-nigh perfect. The "Sakuntala" overture is justly a favorite, brilliant and gorgeous in coloring, in the best style of the composer of "The Queen of Sheba." Goldmark's name constantly appears on concert programmes, and the overture is the most frequently played of his works. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is full of beauty, the "Death of Ase" being especially pleasing, while the odd final movement always calls forth the applause of the audience, and last night, contrary to Mr. Nikisch's rule in regard to encores, was repeated. Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 is one of the best examples of the Russian school, which is at present the craze in musical circles. Other composers of the same nationality regard Tschaikowsky as too little national in his work, but it is difficult to conceive that he can be outdone in originality or wildness of effect. The intensity and energy of the Slav appears in full force in all his music. The slow movement is particularly attractive, and one is dazed by the wild fury of the finale.

The soloists were Mr. Ferrucio Busoni, pianist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Busoni was born less than thirty years ago in Trieste, and received his first instruction from his mother, a finished performer, who still lives and takes pride in the success of her son. He began playing in public while a mere child, and attracted much attention, being styled "the young Mozart." After studying with the best masters and playing in the important capitals he came to America a little over a year ago to join the faculty of the New England Conservatory. He has played in Boston, New York, and Chicago with great success, and this season has resigned his post at the conservatory in order to fill his numerous concert engagements. Last evening he played the Liszt Concerto No. 2, which has not been played here before, as far as can be learned. Liszt's other concerto has been played on several occasions, and is more frequently found on concert programmes, though regarded as less in accord with the composer's best style. The second concerto is typical of Liszt and his genius, being free in form and abounding in brilliant cadenza work for the solo instrument. It is the fashion to decry Liszt, and speak of his music as solely a medium for the display of technique, but he was a complete master of the resources of both piano and orchestra. Mr. Busoni's playing was scholarly, full of fire when needed, with an evident abundance of reserve force. He was recalled a number of times, but could not be persuaded to seat himself again at the piano.

Mr. Schroeder is a master of the 'cello, and a more satisfactory performance than his rendering of the Bach adagio is difficult to conceive. His second number was a capricio by Klengel, deliciously delicate in conception and delightfully played. The piano accompaniments were furnished by Mr. Nikisch.

The audience was larger than at the first concert, and there were few vacant seats. There were a number of changes in the orchestra, Loeffler being missed from the first violins and Akeroyd from the seconds, Roth taking his place. The orchestra left immediately after the concert for their hotel in Baltimore, and will return for their next concert on January 10. No concerts are given in Baltimore this season for lack of a suitable hall. These monthly trips away from home call for concerts Monday in Philadelphia, Tuesday in Washington, Thursday in New York, and Friday and Saturday in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1892.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Subscription Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second subscription concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening with its usual measure of artistic and popular success. But though the presence of a large audience had been assured on this as on every other similar occasion this season by an advance sale so large as to leave scarcely any reserved seats unsold for any of the projected concerts, the house was less crowded than it would have been had a more varied and attractive programme been announced for performance. Mr. Nikisch is a skilled and appreciative musician, but when he presents an arrangement whose four numbers consist of a symphony by Brahms, a pianoforte concerto by Liszt a suite by Dvorak and a march by Wagner, he shows that he has yet much to learn in the art—for it is an art—of programme making. The average amateur likes to hear something with which he is pleasantly familiar. He wants to have at least one standard classic upon the programme, and he wants a little variety. He is willing to hear new things, and is indeed desirous of doing so, but he doesn't want too much that is new and strange all at once, and he wants to have the dry abstruseness of a Brahms symphony relieved by some less scientific music which he has already learned to love. A programme of Brahms, Dvorak, Liszt and Wagner is too much like all caviare to be attractive to the general. These remarks are made not by way of fault-finding, but of suggestion. It will be worth while for Mr. Nikisch to consider them. Apart from the nature of the programme the concert gives no occasion for adverse comment. The symphony, that by Brahms in F Major, No 2, was played with a lucidity of expression and nicety of balance which rendered the complexities of its construction clearly discernible and eloquently interpreted the idea and meaning of its composer. It is not easy music either to play or follow, and cannot be appreciated without study, but it could hardly have been made more intelligible and enjoyable than it was last evening. The Dvorak suite in D major, which has been heard here before, was also given with extreme brilliancy, and the orchestra produced a fine sonority of tone in Wagner's pompous but rather stupid, "Kaisermarch." The soloist was Mr. F. Busoni, a pianist who had not before played here, but who, by his performance of Liszt's concerto No. 2, approved himself an artist of high rank. His playing is brilliant, vigorous, intelligent and sympathetic. He has great breadth of manner and an excellent touch, with a dynamic range which renders his pianissimo and fortissimo alike remarkable. His playing pleased the audience greatly, and it insisted on an encore.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Yesterday Afternoon.

For the first time since it has been coming to Philadelphia the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a "matinee" concert at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, when a well-selected programme of miscellaneous music—rather lighter in character than that heard at the regular subscription concerts—was rendered in faultless style, to the great enjoyment of an audience which if it did not crowd the spacious auditorium comfortably filled it. The most important number on the programme was Grieg's fantastic but melodious and imaginative "Peer Gynt" suite, which the Boston Orchestra introduced here under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and which went to perfection. The closing movement especially, with its curious suggestion of flight and pursuit and its effective accelerando, pleased the audience so much that Mr. Nikisch could not without seeming ungracious decline the encore. Other orchestral features were the "Tannhauser" overture, brilliantly done, the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens, in which Mr. Kneisel's fine tone and finished technique were advantageously displayed; the familiar and favorite "Loin du Bal" of Gillet, most daintily interpreted, and Liszt's grandiose polonaise in E major, with which the concert closed. The soloists were Mme. Nordica and Mr. Alwyn Schroeder. Mme. Nordica's selections were "Una voce" of Rossini and a polacca from Goring Thomas' "Esmeralda," both of which she sang with facile fluency and appreciative taste. Her voice, always of a lovely quality, has lost none of its beauty, but there were some lapses from pitch, which are probably attributable to the not yet recovered weariness of a long sea voyage. Mr. Schroeder played Chopin's E flat nocturne, an adagio by Bach and a difficult capriccio by Klengel with perfect tone and extraordinary brilliancy.

The second subscription concert by the orchestra will occur on Wednesday evening, when the programme will comprise a Brahms symphony and a pianoforte concerto by Liszt.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 8, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

One of those fine assemblages that do credit to the musical culture of Philadelphia crowded the Academy of Music last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme prepared by Mr. Nikisch was one of the meat-for-strong-men sort—Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Wagner. The symphony, Brahms's No. 3 (F major) occupied the top of the list, and was magnificently performed. The bright, melodious and blithesome D major suite of Dvorak made a very pleasant contrast to the gravity of Brahms, and there was a union of both elements in the concluding number, Wagner's "Kaiser March." Throughout the orchestra was in its own very best form. A column of comment could scarcely express more.

The soloist of the evening, Ferruccio Busoni, achieved a triumph. He played Liszt's No. 2 pianoforte concerto in a way that stirred the admiration of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's Fantasia, from "Lucrezia Borgia," with the same excellent power he displayed on the concerto. Mr. Busoni came here with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with—and made a deeper impression than most of them.

The Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Orchestra and Madame Nordica at a Matinee.

Yielding to much pressure from certain Philadelphia people, Mr. Nikisch brought his orchestra and Madame Lillian Nordica hither for an afternoon concert yesterday at the Academy of Music. There was a large audience, as afternoon audiences go. Madame Nordica sang twice; first the aria "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville," afterward a polacca from Goring Thomas' "Esmeralda." She was better in the first selection than in the second, her runs were smoother and her expression was more significant. But in both, her singing was exceedingly artistic.

Alwin Schroeder played three solos on the 'cello with exquisite finish. His tone, though not powerful, was beautiful in quality and his fingering was marvelously smooth.

The orchestra was in fine form as usual. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the "Tannhauser" overture compares well with the two other interpretations that have been given here this season. It is less passionate than Mr. Seidl's, but more delicate. If he loses something in his limited expression of the intense emotions that belong to some passages, he certainly gains in the beautiful delicacy with which he can, with his perfectly controlled orchestra, render the quieter passages. His rendering of the "Peer Gynt" suite was eminently satisfactory, except at the close of the last movement, which should be given with more volume if it is to be thrilling.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 6, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon. Coming Musical Entertainments.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very delightful concert at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. The programme included the favorite "Tannhauser" overture and Grieg's weird suite, "Peer Gynt," which Mr. Nikisch directs with great skill. Then the extreme delicacy of the orchestra was shown in the dreamy "Loin du Bal" followed by a most vivid rendering of the familiar "Danse Macabre." The final number was the Lizst polonaise in E. The soloists were Madame Nordica, who sang "Una voce" and the polacca from Goring Thomas' "Esmeralda," with a clear, firm and graceful method, and Mr. Schroeder, who played three or four short pieces for the 'cello with exquisite smoothness and fluency, Mr. Nikisch accompanying him upon the piano delightfully. Altogether the afternoon concert was most enjoyable.

The regular subscription concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday evening. The programme includes Brahms' symphony in F major, a suite by Dvorak and Liszt's second piano concerto, with Mr. Busoni as pianist.

Haydn's oratorio of "The Creation" will be performed this evening at the Temple, Broad and Berks streets, by the Temple Chorus, with eminent soloists and an orchestra conducted by W. W. Gilchrist, the whole under the direction of David D. Wood, the organist.

Paul Tidden will give a piano recital this afternoon at the New Century Club.

The Adamowski Quartette will give its second chamber concert of the season at the New Century Drawing Room on Thursday afternoon.

J. B. Tipton, one of the most accomplished of the resident church organists, gave an interesting recital on the Drexel Institute organ yesterday afternoon.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Pianist Introduced to Philadelphia Last Night.

The second regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was particularly noticeable by the introduction of a new pianist to Philadelphians. Mr. Ferrucio Busoni is evidently an Italian, but his methods are entirely German, and there is nothing whatever in his work to suggest southern birth or education. He has a masterly technique. Last night he played the Liszt Concerto No. 2 admirably.

It is a showy work, calling for great powers of execution, all of which the pianist sustained. There is, however, a notable lack of the poetic in his work. He has delicacy of touch rather than of feeling, although an encore showed better capacity for expression than the concerto. He is quite young and full of vigor, and we shall hope to hear him again. His command of the instrument seems unusually perfect, as was shown in his excellent execution of the brilliant cadenzase of the concerto. Just enough was learned of him last night to make a further acquaintance highly desirable.

The symphony by Brahms, in F, was somewhat disappointing though excellently played. It hardly reaches the full measure of a symphony. The Dvorak suite was given with finish. We think Mr. Nikisch can be justly criticized for his program making, which of late has hardly been such as to satisfy the large audiences that invariably attend his performances. A little change here and there would greatly add to the enjoyment of the educated musical people who are constant in their attendance on these delightful occasions.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Dec. 6, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Conductor Arthur Nikisch demonstrated yesterday afternoon at the Academy of Music that he knows how to put together an exceptionally attractive "popular" programme, and he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were found just as effective relatively as in the most massive kind of a symphony concert. Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, which is equally welcome—played as it was yesterday—whether given in a popular or classical list—opened the concert grandly, for it was given a memorable performance. The numbers that followed were scarcely less familiar or less favorite with concert-goers—Grieg's highly characteristic settings of episodes from Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," Gillet's "Loin du Bal," Saint Saens's wierd "Danse Macabre," and Liszt's great E Polonaise, all played with a spirit and finish enhanced by intimate knowledge on the part of the band and Mr. Nikisch, who conducted without notes.

Mme. Lillian Nordica sang the Una voce poca fa from Rossini's "Barber," giving the aria with piquancy as well as with admirable technical facility, and afterward the polacca from Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" with corresponding effectiveness. Alwin Schrœder played three solos—an adagio from Bach, a Chopin nocturn and a "capriccio" by Klengel—which severally and jointly served to show what a fine mastery he has over the resources of that instrument. Both soloists were recalled by the audience, which was what might be called a large one for a matinée concert.

To-morrow evening the second regular subscription concert of the Orchestra will take place in the Academy. The programme is to include Brahm's No. 3 symphony, Liszt's pianoforte concerto No. 2, a new suite by Dvorak, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The piano soloist will be M. F. Busoni.

The Press

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert at the Academy.

The symphony concerts this year have been replete with the music of modern composers. There have not been a half dozen names in this season's programmes that belong to any but nineteenth century musicians. Yet the attendance at the concerts and the enthusiasm of the audiences have perhaps never been greater than they have been this Fall. The programme of the "Boston Symphony" concert last evening included pieces by Brahms, Liszt, Dvorak and Wagner. The soloist was Ferruccio B. Busoni, who played Liszt's Concerto No. 2 for the pianoforte. He is a fine pianist. His touch is firm and accurate yet not ponderous, and he uses the pedal freely and judiciously.

He has discovered many new beauties in this concerto of Liszt's, and last night he presented them and was rewarded with tumultuous applause which never lessened till Mr. Busoni granted an encore.

The orchestra played beautifully throughout the concert, and surpassed itself in the last number, the Wagner "Kaiser Marsch." The fine chords of this piece came from the instruments with a splendid volume, which was yet delicately modulated, and with a most admirable smoothness.

---

[58]

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special matinee yesterday afternoon, at which the following program was presented:

Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhaeuser."
Rossini—Aria, "Una Voce," from "Barberof Seville."

Mme. Lillian Nordica.

Grieg.....Suite, "Peer Gynt."
I. "Morgenstimmung." Allegretto pastorale (E major).
II. "Ases Tod." Andante doloroso (B minor).
III. "Anitras Tanz." Tempo di mazurka (A minor).
IV. "In der Halle des Bergkoenigs." Alla marcia e molto marcato (B minor).

Soli for Violoncello.

a. Bach.....Adagio.
b. Chopin.....Nocturne.
c. Klengel.....Capriccio.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Gillet.....'Loin du Bal."
Saint-Saens.....Danse Macabre."
Goring Thomas.Polacca from "Esmeralda."
Liszt.....Polonaise in E.

All these were familiar and were well given. Mme. Nordica sang sweetly and artistically, and Mr. Schroeder played his solos admirably. The "Tannhaeuser" overture was given with less force than could be wished, but otherwise no criticism seems warranted. The "Peer Gynt" suite, which was first played here three years ago, was received with many manifestations of ap-

The Telegram.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUB. CO.,
2 Weybosset Street.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1892.

A GREAT PROGRAM.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Third Concert.

Pianist Busoni Receives Gratifying and Deserved Applause.

It was the verdict of at least nine-tenths of the gathering that the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night overshadowed anything that has been given thus far in the local season in the city. The program was adorned by two of the most prized of musical treasures, Beethoven's No. 2 D minor symphony and Weber's exquisite overture, "Euryanthe," and after these two great and vivifying works, so splendidly recited by Nikisch's musicians, the whole audience gave freedom to its rapture by storm after storm of applause. To go into an analyses of such a beautiful creation as the symphony Beethoven left for the world to admire, would be useless, for as the almost empyrean measures are interpreted by the symphony men, the most unmusical intellect must take on a quickening impression and acknowledge the wondrous power of orchestration. In addition to the Beethoven piece, Doorak's suite in D major, No. 39, was executed, and its five interesting divisions illustrated in the fullness of their strength and elegance.

The sensation of the evening was the personage whom Conductor Nikisch introduced to the city, the pianist, Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. He was a pianist, able and wonderfully dexterious, and after a few of the rippling runs and delicious codenzes in Liszt's second concerto had been served up on the chime toned Steinway instrument, he held every listener enraptured. As the last note was struck, a wild burst of enthusiasm followed with deafening effect, increasing in volume and energy each time that the artist advanced to the edge of the platform to bow his appreciation, till finally he had to return to the piano and grant the encore his hearers were bound they would have. It was a success, instant and gratifying, and the intelligent visage of the player gleamed with the thankfulness with which his heart must have been filled. The accompaniment by the orchestra was perfectly timed and regulated in the Liszt selection, as if the musicians were in firm sympathy with M. Busoni and wanted to assist him in the kindest manner possible.

The fourth concert will be given Jan. 25.

NEW YORK HERALD,
DECEMBER 9, 1892.

A BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra gave its second concert this season in Chickering Hall last night before the usual overflowing audience. The brilliant and crowded houses that are now looked upon as a matter of course at these concerts could be attracted in this music surfeited city by nothing but an orchestral performance of extraordinary value, and this is what this fine body of players from Boston offer. No matter what may be the programme selected by Herr Nikisch, or the soloists he may choose, the audience is sure of a musical treat.

The programme last night consisted of Brahms' third symphony, Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise, played by Miss Suza Doane, Dvorak's D major suite, and Wagner's "Kaiser March." Of this list the most brilliant and sensational numbers, both as to music and performance, were the first two movememts of the Brahms symphony and the polka and minuet of the Dvorak suite. These were as remarkable for technical finish and brilliancy as was the "Kaiser March" for splendid sonority and almost overpowering wealth of sound. Perhaps Herr Nikisch wished to show New York that his brass choir is as remarkable as his body of strings.

Miss Suza Doane, a very young pianist, a pupil of Reinecke, and but recently back from Europe, played the familiar and not over grateful "Andante Spianato and Polonaise" of Chopin, with abundant technical facility and much intelligence. It is no easy task for a woman to hold her own against such an orchestra as this, and Miss Doane, a very slight and delicate girl, astonished the audience by the verve and dash with which she went through a most difficult task. She was [illegible] and responded

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL.

Third Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ever-welcome monthly visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Infantry Hall last evening, when a brilliant programme was given before a large and enthusiastic audience. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, who made his first appearance in this city and scored a most pronounced success. The following programme was presented:

Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, in D-major, op. 36; I. Adigo molto (D-major); Allergo con brio (D-major); II. Larghetto (A-major); III. Scherzo, Allegro (D-major); trio, the same tempo (D-major); IV. Allegro molto (D-major); Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A-major; Dvork's Suite for orchestra, in D-major, op. 39; I. Praeludium (Pastorale), Allegro moderato (D-major); II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D-minor); III. Minuet (Sousedska), Allegro giusto (B-flat major); IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G-major); V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D-minor); Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Beethoven's Second symphony, with which the concert began, is one of the great orchestral composer's finest works. It is not only delightful to the listener, but is also of interest to the student as one of the best examples of Beethoven's unsurpassed ability in producing great results from comparatively simple means. The themes are of the briefest sort and for the most part of the simplest character. In the development and combination of these, and in the unerring judgment displayed in contrasting them by means of the different groups of instruments, the genius of the world's greatest music thinker is fully displayed. The lovely melody which forms the first theme of the larghetto is an exception to the rule, however, inasmuch as it is complete in itself, and is not afterwards used for purposes of "working out." Its intrinsic beauty has caused it to be appropriated for various uses by arrangers. Another marked feature of the symphony is its strong tonality, the parent key of D-major decisively dominating the whole work, and the modulations being largely kept within one or two removes. Dvorak's suite is a strongly written composition, and, like most of the Bohemian composer's work, displays much of originality in conception and treatment. Both of these numbers, together with Weber's effectively scored overture, were admirably played by the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch departs sometimes from the traditional readings of Beethoven, but, as a rule, justifies his procedure by making his points quite as effectively in his own way.

Mr. Busoni's piano playing was something in the nature of a surprise to most of the audience. The story goes that Paderewski, upon hearing him play, remarked that there was little need of his coming to Boston to play so long as they had Mr. Busoni there. The anecdote, if true, serves to illustrate Paderewski's well-known unselfish recognition of his brother artists, and while perhaps putting it rather strongly, contains enough of truth to render the compliment deserved. It is very seldom that as good piano playing has been heard in this city as that to which last night's audience listened. The unfamiliar concerto of Liszt which he played, would not of itself be likely to arouse much enthusiasm. It is one of those musical extravaganzas which no one but Liszt would ever dream of perpetrating, and, in spite of the undeniable brilliancy of its latter half, would be better described as an accidental combination of noises than as anything possessing musical form and coherence. The opportunities for display of virtuosity are plenty—as in all Liszt's music—and Mr. Busoni availed himself of them to the utmost. The outburst of applause which followed was spontaneous and genuine. After three or four recalls the player consented to an encore, and gave Liszt's "Campanella" in such magnificent style that he was recalled as many times more. Mr. Busoni possesses every qualification of a great pianist to a high degree, and the prompt recognition of his merits goes to show that the symphony audiences are sufficiently critical to recognize an unknown artist when they hear one.

The next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 25.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place yesterday afternoon. It is a genuine pleasure to record the fact that the music lovers of the city across the East River have fully realized the uncommon excellence of the entertainments offered them by the gentlemen of Boston. They crowded the house yesterday to its utmost capacity, and they testified by the warmth of their applause to the heartiness of their appreciation.

The programme combined classic and romantic music in a most delightful manner. Beethoven's fifth symphony, a work which stands at the high-water mark of the transition period, was at the beginning of the concert; and the other numbers were Xaver Scharwenka's charming piano concerto in B flat minor, two excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Beethoven work was the interpretation of a poet. It throbbed with the warmth of a fervent temperament and was polished by the scholarship of a profound musician. The performance of the andante was without doubt one of the most beautiful ever heard in this part of the country, and it was immediately appreciated by an audience quick to respond to the touch of true art. The Berlioz numbers displayed the virtuosity of the orchestra in a high light. Surely nothing more delicate in its finish could have been demanded than the performance of the valse.

Mr. Scharwenka's excellent piano concerto has already been praised in these columns. Yesterday afternoon the composer, who was the soloist, had the support of a sympathetic and trustworthy accompaniment, and as a natural result his performance shone to especially bright advantage. The whole programme will be repeated to-night.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1892.

INFANTRY HALL.

Third Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ever-welcome monthly visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Infantry Hall last evening, when a brilliant programme was given before a large and enthusiastic audience. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, who made his first appearance in this city and scored a most pronounced success. The following programme was presented:

Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, in D-major, op. 36; I. Adigo molto (D-major); Allergo con brio (D-major); II. Larghetto (A-major); III. Scherzo, Allegro (D-major); trio, the same tempo (D-major); IV. Allegro molto (D-major); Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A-major; Dvork's Suite for orchestra, in D-major, op. 39; I. Praeludium (Pastorale), Allegro moderato (D-major); II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D-minor); III. Minuet (Sousedska), Allegro giusto (B-flat major); IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G-major); V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D-minor); Weber's overture, "Euryanthe."

Beethoven's Second symphony, with which the concert began, is one of the great orchestral composer's finest works. It is not only delightful to the listener, but is also of interest to the student as one of the best examples of Beethoven's unsurpassed ability in producing great results from comparatively simple means. The themes are of the briefest sort and for the most part of the simplest character. In the development and combination of these, and in the unerring judgment displayed in contrasting them by means of the different groups of instruments, the genius of the world's greatest music thinker is fully displayed. The lovely melody which forms the first theme of the larghetto is an exception to the rule, however, inasmuch as it is complete in itself, and is not afterwards used for purposes of "working out." Its intrinsic beauty has caused it to be appropriated for various uses by arrangers. Another marked feature of the symphony is its strong tonality, the parent key of D-major decisively dominating the whole work, and the modulations being largely kept within one or two removes. Dvorak's suite is a strongly written composition, and, like most of the Bohemian composer's work, displays much of originality in conception and treatment. Both of these numbers, together with Weber's effectively scored overture, were admirably played by the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch departs sometimes from the traditional readings of Beethoven, but, as a rule, justifies his procedure by making his points quite as effectively in his own way.

Mr. Busoni's piano playing was something in the nature of a surprise to most of the audience. The story goes that Paderewski, upon hearing him play, remarked that there was little need of his coming to Boston to play so long as they had Mr. Busoni there. The anecdote, if true, serves to illustrate Paderewski's well-known unselfish recognition of his brother artists, and while perhaps putting it rather strongly, contains enough of truth to render the compliment deserved. It is very seldom that as good piano playing has been heard in this city as that to which last night's audience listened. The unfamiliar concerto of Liszt which he played, would not of itself be likely to arouse much enthusiasm. It is one of those musical extravaganzas which no one but Liszt would ever dream of perpetrating, and, in spite of the undeniable brilliancy of its latter half, would be better described as an accidental combination of noises than as anything possessing musical form and coherence. The opportunities for display of virtuosity are plenty—as in all Liszt's music—and Mr. Busoni availed himself of them to the utmost. The outburst of applause which followed was spontaneous and genuine. After three or four recalls the player consented to an encore, and gave Liszt's "Campanella" in such magnificent style that he was recalled as many times more. Mr. Busoni possesses every qualification of a great pianist to a high degree, and the prompt recognition of his merits goes to show that the symphony audiences are sufficiently critical to recognize an unknown artist when they hear one.

The next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 25.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Dec. 9, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In making up the programme of his second concert, which was heard at Chickering Hall last evening, Mr. Nikisch showed considerable astuteness. It may be remembered that about two years ago he gave, with his famous Boston Orchestra, a concert, at which one of Brahms's symphonies was played. It came last on the programme, and the audience did not take kindly to it, although it was by no means a novelty. After the first movement an exodus began, which, after the second, became a stampede, so that the last two movements were played before a half-filled house. It was perhaps to prevent a repetition of this calamity that Mr. Nikisch last evening put another Brahms symphony, the third, at the head of the programme. If that was the motive, the well-laid plan did not gang a-gley; as there were interesting pieces by Chopin, Dvorák, and Wagner to follow, everybody remained to the end.

The symphony was admirably played, as a matter of course, and it is perfectly proper that the works of Brahms should be heard occasionally. At the same time it is necessary to protest emphatically against the Brahms fad, the tendency in some quarters to regard Brahms as the greatest living composer, which is simply ridiculous when we have among us such men as Dvorák, Rubinstein, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, Saint-Saëns, Gounod, and Verdi. Brahms owes his vogue largely to the enthusiastic endorsement given him at the beginning of his career by Schumann, and later on to the frantic efforts to push him into prominence made by that arch-enemy of modern music and musical progress, Dr. Hanslick in Vienna. Now, concerning that Schumann endorsement, Mr. W. F. Apthorp, who writes the historical and descriptive notes for the Boston Symphony concerts, makes the interesting revelation that he has it directly from a personal friend of Schumann's that some time after the appearance of the endorsement of Brahms, Schumann expressed himself as "much disappointed in young Brahms, after all," and that there was not a little in his article that he would like to take back. Mr. Apthorp makes another interesting remark, which lets the cat out of the bag: "It may be said that no other composer, at any period in the history of art, ever owed his recognition by the musical world to so strangely few high qualities as Brahms." But Mr. Apthorp forgets Hummel. The parallel between Hummel and Brahms is a striking one, and would make a subject for a suggestive essay. Neither of them is a really spontaneous, creative genius, but both have to a high degree the technique of composition; they are virtuosi of composition, and virtuosity is very apt to be taken for a while for genius, both by professionals, who are interested in technique, and by a certain portion of the public which does not discriminate between musical themes and musical ideas. Hummel, in his day, was frequently exalted even above Beethoven, even by such eminent experts as Cherubini, just as to-day we find musicians and critics who ought to know better exalting Brahms above Rubinstein, who has more creative genius in his little fingers than Brahms in his whole body. Time, however, sets all these things right.

In regard to the symphony played last evening it should be added that there is a charming passage in the first movement, but as it is stolen from the chorus of sirens in "Tannhäuser" it does not add much to the glory of Brahms. The "Lohengrin" swan harmonies are also heard, and the opening of the second movement is a ludicrous plagiarism of a very unsymphonic tune from "Zampa," an opera of the level of "Martha." The last two movements are, however, all Brahms—that is, dry, monotonous, uninspired. The finale is supposed to be Hungarian, but no one would suspect it if he were not told so. The orchestral coloring has all the sensuous beauty of a painted board fence.

In welcome contrast to this symphony were Dvorák's orchestral suite, opus 39, with its charming Slavic rhythms and exquisite instrumental colors, and Wagner's imposing Kaisermarsch, which closed the concert. The soloist of the occasion was a young American pianist, Miss Luza Doane, fresh from the Leipsic Conservatory. She doubtless made a mistake in choosing so old-fashioned a piano-teacher as Reinecke, who is not in sympathy with modern music. It is not from him that she could expect to catch the proper spirit of interpreting such a piece as Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise. However, Miss Doane played with excellent technique, and the audience rewarded her by asking her to play again, which, in the case of such an audience, is a compliment worth having.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 9, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Willard's Change of Bill.

It is most gratifying to note the progressive appreciation with which the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are being received. A full measure of recognition has not yet been awarded to its superlative work in the domain of orchestral music, but another season will, beyond doubt, add what is yet lacking. Curiously enough, it is among the ranks of the public critics that there seems to be a holding back of the admission that this body of musicians represents the highest degree to which orchestral work has as yet been brought in America. The only explanations that can be offered are those of local pride and loyalty to resident maestri. There should be no such questions in matters of art. That such an orchestra belongs to Boston and not to New York is simply an incidental fact. The conditions are just as favorable here as there, and all that is needed is a little public spirit and some pecuniary sacrifices. Boston has been fortunate in those respects, and the result is one of which it may be proud. But the whole country is the gainer. By the support it gives to Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, each community acquires an indirect moral proprietary interest in it and shares in the fame which these artists earn by their superb work in the cause of music.

The second concert of the season of 1892-'93 took place last evening as usual at Chickering Hall. There are several reasons why this building is not the proper habitat for the organization in question, most of which were emphasized on this occasion. The hall is too small for fortissimo effects, its seating capacity is not adequate, it is too remote from the centre of population and it is lacking in comforts. The performance of the first number was marred by the delays attendant on the seating of late comers, and imperfect ventilation was a source of physical discomfort which affected a complete intellectual enjoyment of the programme provided.

The first number was Brahms's symphony No. 3 in F major, opus 90. With the exception of Wagner, who occupies a special position in modern music, no modern composer has been the subject of such contradictory discussion as Johannes Brahms. His individuality is definite. It asserts itself in a glorification of musical form. Few composers can compose with him in style and construction. But he is indifferent to the principle which should be the dominant one in all phases of art—the principle of beauty. This is not the time nor place for an elaborate brief in advocacy of this estimate of the composer. Condensing the arguments, it may be said that his earnestness in adhering to form for form's sake render him uninteresting to the great mass—not of uneducated but of musical people—who wish to feel music as well as understand it. The work performed last evening is a good example of his music. It has all his perfection of style, but also its insignificance of melodic purpose. It is thorough, intense, full of original harmonic modulations, and makes an elaborate utilization of all instrumental resources; but its thoughts have little melodic significance. It was played in a most admirable manner, particularly the third movement, which is startling in its rhythmic originality. The first movement presents in what the explanatory text of the programme calls "cross relations" a difficult problem of interpretation. There is a daring combination of major and minor which must be handled as to relative force with the utmost nicety in order that the harmonic harshness may not dominate the dramatic effect of the peculiar contrast. Mr. Nikisch in this displayed his usual correct judgment. The Dvorak suite is of the modern type. Classical principles of suites were the persistence of a uniform type of dance rhythm written in a uniform key. The composers of to-day present the grouping of short detached numbers, but add the contrast of key to that of time. Mr. Nikisch demonstrated in this number his absolute command of his orchestra. It was a remarkable display of mechanical precision and unanimity of expression. Each of the six movements illustrated some one good quality of the orchestra. The shading and the changes of tempo in the finale were perfect. "The Kaisermarsch," which Wagner wrote con amore—for his hatred of the French was well known—was played with such sonority of tone and breadth and majesty of phrasing that it held the audience breathless. Miss Suza Doane is a type of the class of pianists which is to-day very large. Ambitious, patient and tireless, they study assiduously under able teachers, who impart to them all that can be imparted. Nature must do the rest. Miss Doane is a pupil of Reinicke. Her playing in its technical phrase is admirable. She has learnt everything. But there was no display of musical intelligence; no evidence that she understood Chopin. There was but little character to her performance of the Polonaise.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

This paper has the largest circulation in the United States.

MRS. THEODORE HAVEMEYER HAS A MUSICALE.

Herr Nikisch Leads a Band from the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the First of Four Concerts in Private Houses Arranged by Mr. Harry Cannon.

The most brilliant gathering of society since the season began was at Mrs. Theodore A. Havemeyer's splendid mansion on Madison aveuue last evening for the first of the subscription musicales by a band from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Herr Nikisch.

The Havemeyer mansion is too beautiful to call for extensive floral decorations, so this embellishment was restricted to graceful palms, which were placed in the halls and in the corners of the ballroom. The fireplaces under the mantels in the ballroom and halls were filled with Japanese lilies and daisies in jardinières.

Mrs. Havemeyer, in a beautiful gown of gold colored satin and velvet embroidered with silver and pearls; Mrs. E. C. Potter, in pearl colored satin, and Miss Marie Havemeyer, in white satin and crêpe, embroidered in gold, received the guests. They came in after dinner parties and were in place so that the concert began shortly after ten o'clock.

The orchestra of fifty-seven was stationed at one end of the ballroom and seated on gilded chairs, placed on the floor level. Herr Nikisch directed from a slightly raised platform. The guests were seated in the ballroom, the picture gallery and in the hall. Nearly three hundred people were present.

These concerts were conceived by Mr. H. Le Grand Cannon, who hurriedly got together fifty subscribers, who on account of the lack of opera were glad of such an opportunity. Each subscriber pays $100 for four concerts, with the privilege of asking four people to each concert. There is to be no dancing at any of the concerts.

The full list of subscribers includes Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Mrs. John Alexandre, Mrs. Henry I. Barbey, Mrs. I. Townsend Burden, Mrs. James Burden, Mrs. Charles Barney, Mrs. H. Le Grand Cannon, Mrs. Brockholst Cutting, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer Cruger, Mrs. George B. De Forest, Mrs. Elisha Dyer, Jr.; Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, Miss De Forest, Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Chester Griswold, Miss Gurnee, Mrs. Beach Grant, Mrs. Havemeyer, Mrs. Hewitt, Mrs. Hitchcock, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Jr.; Mrs. James P. Kernochan, Mrs. Lawrence Kip, Miss Carola Livingston, Miss Leary, Mrs. John Minturn, Mrs. Richard Mortimer, Mrs. Stanley Mortimer, Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. William Osgood, Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs, Mrs. Burke Roche, Mrs. Schermerhorn, Mrs. Philip Schuyler, Mrs. William E. Strong, Mrs. William D. Sloane, Mrs. Henry Sloane, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. Paran Stevens, Mrs. Edward Taller, Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Miss Townsend, Miss Turnure, Mrs. Frederick Vanderbilt, Mrs. Hamilton Fish Webster, Mrs. William C. Whitney, Mrs. Stanford White, Miss E. Whitney, Mrs. Buchanan Winthrop, Mrs. James M. Waterbury, Miss Whiting, Mrs. Frank W. Witherbee, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson, Mrs. Willing, Mrs. John Hobart Warren and Mrs. George Peabody Wetmore. With the exception of those who were in mourning they were all present last night as well as various members of their immediate families.

The programme was as follows:—

1. Polonaise in E.....Liszt
2. "Marche Hongroise".....Franz Schubert
3. "Am Springs quel," from "Manfred".....Schumann
4. "Menuette della Regina".....Max Vogrich
5. Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
6. Vorspiel, "Lohengrin" / Waldweben, "Siegfried" / Feuerzauber, "Walküre".....Wagner

After the concert a buffet supper was served in the dining room by Mrs. Havemeyer's chef. The other concerts will be given on January 13 at Mrs. Le Grand Cannon's, February 9 at Mrs. William C. Whitney's and March 17 at Mrs. De Forest's.

THE WORLD: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Another Successful Appearance in Concert at Chickering Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Chickering Hall last night. The programme, which was, as usual with Mr. Nikisch, interesting and well balanced, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3.....Brahms
Andante Spianato and Polonaise.....Chopin
Piano and orchestra.
Suite for orchestra.....Dvorak
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Soloist, Miss Suza Doane.

Criticism of such a concert as that of last night savors almost of temerity, and can be at best little more than the expression of an individual opinion or preference. To say that a composition has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically equivalent to saying that it has been well played—consistently, logically, with considered effect and an interpretation of the composer's meaning which, if not always classically conventional, is ever artistically reasonable. In spite of an almost devotional regard and respect for pure form, Brahms in his powerful Third Symphony is by turns passionate, dramatic, joyous, tender, playfully graceful and vehement, always in an individual and forceful way, and in this work at least shows none of the somewhat stilted classicism of which he has been accused. The symphony can hardly be said to possess many of the elements of popularity for even a work of its class, but its breadth, strength, the thoroughness of its workmanship and its many charms of thought and treatment, especially in the last two movements, will always make it enjoyable and interesting to the musician and amateur, if it be somewhat like caviare to the general public. The performance of the symphony was entirely admirable throughout, the work of the brass and wood-wind being noticeably good.

To be invited to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra almost amounts to a certificate of merit, and so Miss Suza Doane, the soloist of last evening, made her metropolitan début under exceptionally conspicuous, if somewhat trying, conditions. Miss Doane is, if we are correctly informed, a native of Brooklyn and a pupil of Reinecke; she plays well now and, being still young, will probably play better. At present her playing, though marked by considerable taste, intelligence and fair technical power, is still unformed in style and lacking in color. Miss Doane was cordially received, recalled and may justly be credited with having made, to all appearances, a good first impression. Her present attainments, however, hardly warranted her musical surroundings of last night.

To go from the Brahms symphony to the Dvorak suite is to pass from the study of the savant into the open air of country—all here is fresh, breezy and spontaneous. Although the workmanship is ever admirable, it is subsidiary to the melodic thought itself, and never allowed to override or obscure it or block or stem its easy and genial flow. Here, again, the wood-wind was beyond reproach, and the work of the strings (the work is scored for small orchestra) was, as usual, remarkable for precision, elegance and great purity and richness of tone. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the work was full of an almost tender appreciation, combined with great spirit and vigor.

The concert ended with a splendid rendering of Wagner's impressive Kaisermarsch. The magnificent sonority of tone at the command of this orchestra and Mr. Nikisch's faculty for well-considered contrast, climax and dramatic display combined to make the effect of this number almost overwhelming in power and intensity.

The next concert in this series will take place on the evening of Jan. 12.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

THE SUN, FRIDAY. DECEMBER 9, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The demand for seats at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was even greater than on the first occasion this season, every ticket in this instance having been sold as early as last Monday. The debilitating warmth of the atmosphere last night was not only balefully against the performers and their instruments, but calculated to lessen the enthusiasm of an audience. In spite, however, of the weather's most depressing influence, there was ample energy among the performers, and a profound interest and animated enthusiasm evinced by the listeners.

Brahms's Third Symphony in F major majestically led the procession of splendid sounds that filled delighted ears through two long hours. The first three movements of this symphony are more beautiful than the last one. The opening theme of the allegro is so noble and so full of that meaning which is untranslatable, except in the silent language of the soul, that its constant recurrence is welcomed with joy. Brahms is not essentially dramatic like most modern composers, but he is always amiable and gentle, yet with a tenderness born of strength. Variety with him is endless, yet nothing is strained or far-fetched. The programme last night was entirely modern, if Chopin may still be classed among the writers of our own day. His was the most ancient composition given—and this was the andante spianato and polonaise in E b, played by Miss Suza Doane. Miss Doane made her first public appearance in America last night, and won genuine applause even to the point of an encore, which she gave in the shape of Liszt's arrangement of "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges." Her chief attraction is the clearness and crispness of her touch, and the exactness and neatness of her execution. Her limitations seem to lie in a possible lack of variety in tone, color, and of expression—a subordination, as it were, of sensitive musical feeling to the exactions of technique. The polonaise was played with much precision, in absolutely even tempo, and with few or no climaxes, and but a minimum of light and shade. Miss Doane has studied at Leipsic under Reinecke and Zwintscher. The applause she gained shows that she has many elements of success or popularity.

Dvorak's charming suite in D, op. 39 made an effective bit of piquante descriptive music. The movements are all in dance form, the wild dances of Dvorak's country, except the first, which is called "pastorale," and is so full of rural feeling that one heaves a sigh of happiness and refreshment, and feels as though he had been wandering in the woods or among green and quiet meadows. Dvorak is the best musical painter we have now. His sketches are so clearly outlined, his colors so vivid, and his subjects so cheerful that they warm the very cockles of the heart. They are tonic and bracing and healthy.

Wagner's Kaiser March came like the bold north wind, proclaiming "I am the King." His work is always full of conscious majesty and power. In this there are reminiscences of "Die Meistersinger," but they only endear the composition to us; and how nobly is the choral "Ein Feste Burg" set there, like a jewel of much price in a gorgeous setting.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 9, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall, last night, afforded abundant food for thought. It would be an easy matter to write a small volume on certain tendencies in modern music exemplified significantly by the first two orchestral numbers and offset with tremendous emphasis by the last. But this is not a convenient time nor a suitable place for a dissection of general æsthetic principles, or perhaps one might be tempted to cry, "Heaven save us from certain museum varieties of rhythm!"

The first orchestral number on the list was the Third Symphony of that often-abused composer, Johannes Brahms. It is a considerable time since this work has been heard here, and it was a pleasure to every free-minded lover of music to listen to it once more, if only to readjust his ideas. There ought not to be much room for controversy about a composition of this kind. It has its weaknesses, to be sure; but they certainly are not in the field of invention. There is good, substantial thematic material of an original cut, and the treatment is wholly characteristic. It is the treatment that is open to censure, however, for Brahms writes abominably for the orchestra. His instrumentation is so densely thick and overweighted in the middle voices that it gives rise to wonder that he could have failed to perceive its sad need of clarification. This heavy instrumentation of the middle voices—often accentuated by the allotment of notes to obviously unsuitable instruments—acidulates his harmony and robs his melodies of their natural poety. The vigorous and faithful performance of the orchestra simply made the errors of the composer more conspicuous, though nothing could rob that exquisite third movement of its moving charm.

The second orchestral number was a suite for orchestra in D major by Dr. Antonin Dvorak, Director of the National Conservatory of Music. Here the hand of a master of instrumentalism was manifest in every measure. There was nothing dark or clouded. Everything was clear and unmistakable. But the heart of man grows weary in trying to untangle the hard knots into which it is brought by those weird rhythms. And when the last number is Richard Wagner's massively rectangular "Kaisermarsch," with its great, booming fourfold rhythm that invites the soul to glory and the feet to the warpath, one heaves a huge sigh of relief and rejoices that the primeval prosody of sound is still capable of moving the heart when used by a real poet. Mr. Nikisch and his men gave their auditors fine performances of both works, and the really stirring "Furiant" of the Dvorak suite was the tour de force of the evening. But the Wagner music satisfied the appetite.

A young lady named Miss Suza Doane played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise" for piano, with the orchestra. Miss Doane belongs to New-York, and has recently returned to her home, after a course of four years of study in Leipsic. She may be accounted fortunate or unfortunate to have secured a first appearance on any stage with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not always a privilege to walk with the immortals; sometimes it is a penalty. It would be breaking a butterfly to treat Miss Doane's performance seriously. It is only necessary to say that she was wholly out of place in such a concert, and her performance excited in the minds of the well informed only a mild surprise at her temerity. It is extremely probable that she was laboring under the disadvantage of considerable nervousness, and that is all that can be said in her favor.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The epithets of praise which suggest themselves at each recurring concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are becoming trite, and if Mr. Nikisch is not careful he will soon have nothing for the reviewer to do but to make record of his performances. We do not know that such a contingency would be in any respect deplorable. Talk about music and musical performances is frequently very unentertaining when it is not amusing because of its rhapsodic hysteria, and if the time shall come when so delightful an entertainment as Mr. Nikisch provides can be disposed of with a hearty "well done, good and faithful servant of the beautiful," it will be an indication of advancing culture, at least on the part of the critic, and possibly also on the part of the public that shall be willing to accept such a criticism.

Concerning last night's concert in Chickering Hall, we leave the reader to recall to memory the warmest praise that has been spoken of Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi in these columns, and to imagine them repeated with such emphasis as is invited by the fact that on this occasion there was a special appeal to gratitude on the score of a performance of Brahms's symphony in F. It may be that there are some enthusiastic admirers of this composer who go too far in their estimation of him. That question may be left open. There is no doubt, however, that he is being too persistently neglected in our concert-rooms since the departure of Mr. Thomas.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were a suite in D-major, op. 39, by Dvorak, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The suite is a dainty and extremely characteristic bit of music, in which all of the composer's marvellous ingenuity and skill are expended in dance-rhythms of peculiar piquancy and grace. Between the symphony and the suite, Miss Suza Doane, a young woman, native, we believe, of New-York, and recently returned from four years' study in Leipsic, played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise." Miss Doane was honored beyond the usual measure meted out to novices in being introduced to the public at such a concert. She is far from being a ripe pianiste, though she has some of the elements which go into the education of one. Her style is dry, unelastic and unpoetical. This was obvious enough in her reading of the Chopin composition, with its wholly superfluous accompaniment, but it was emphasized in Heller's transcription of Mendelssohn's "Auf Fluegeln des Gesanges," which she played in recognition of a kind recall. The orchestra will play this afternoon and to-morrow evening in Brooklyn.

[60]

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"Fate, knocking at the door" is known to be the intent of the triple notes that open the Fifth symphony—one thinks of it only as the Fifth symphony, and not as Beethoven's Fifth symphony—but when it is played as it was at the Academy of Music yesterday, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, it is plain that the notes are compelling blows at the gates of heaven. The work is one that in the art of harmony holds the place that the Greek temples keep in the art of building; and as "earth proudly wears her Parthenon as the best gem upon her zone," so the memory of man treasures the divine measures of this symphony, and hopes and feels in it the higher attributes that assert themselves through this vesture of earth. It is a conspectus of musical genius up to the time when a new illuminant arrived in the person of Wagner, and it is the one work that most men unite in praising as the perfect creation. It is, at least, the image of the greatness that was granted to the soul of one man and that declared itself in terms so strong and free that his fellow creatures stood astonished before him and still fail to measure him at his worth. It is the transcription in music of all that marked Beethoven among his fellows and distinguished his nature as grand, gloomy and peculiar. The performance that Mr. Nikisch and his unequaled band gave of it yesterday was affectionately powerful and sympathetic. Its originalities of reading were not such as to call for extended comment and were mostly nuances that it would be difficult to describe without a score and futile to attempt in this brief space. The colorings made by stress on certain passages for wind instruments are different from those that Mr. Seidl and Mr. Thomas have acquainted us with, and at times they seemed to lack the authority that was asserted in more dramatic renderings of the work, gaining smoothness at the expense of spirit; but the really epic portions of the symphony had no such lack and the pæan into which the tragedy in music resolves itself with optimistic and commanding fervor had all needful resolution and vigor. The lucidity and childlike innocence of tone that mark the string playing was warmed into vocal quality and had organ fullness in the ensembles. Xaver Scharwenka's concerto in B flat minor is the best known of his works and it had yesterday the personal interest of the composer's presence at the piano. That he succeeded less as a soloist than as a composer is a compliment to his higher musical faculties, but such was the fact; for, while his concerto is fresh and youthful, happy and musicianly, his playing of it was inconspicuous for dash, power, feeling or brilliancy. He possessed all desirable qualities in a moderate degree and astonished with none. The orchestral setting for the piano's diverse and interesting movements is as modern as Wagner and it had to stand the strain of immediate comparison with that fantastic and nimble witted instrumentalist. Berlioz, for the dances of the will o' wisps and sylphs, from the "Damnation of Faust," followed directly on this composition. These were given with a delicacy that is not to be surpassed, the diminuendo at the close of the sylph dance fading into a merest whisper of sound. Contrary to his habit Mr. Nikisch succumbed to applause and played it again. The closing number in a short but delightful programme was the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," one of the best things in the repertory of the band. Here the impetuous playing of the strings is especially remarkable, and the vivacity, crispness and buoyancy, together with precision, attest the absolute efficiency of the force. The brief episode, the Vision, for muted strings, a weird succession of harmonies, and the more effective for suppression, is a wonderful piece of technic. The programme will be repeated this evening.

The Montreal Herald

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 10.

MENDELSSOH CHOIR.

The twenty-ninth season of the Mendelssohn choir opened last evening before a brilliant audience at the Windsor Hall. The programme mostly consisted of pieces of a slow tempo and quiet character. The light and shade were carefully marked, and the whole organization was under perfect control of the conductor. The balance of the choir was good, on the whole, but the male portion was rather weak in volume, though good in tone, especially the basses. The sopranos were very brilliant, and kept a perfect pitch. There was nothing very novel or very extraordinary in the program except St.-Saens' part song "To the night"—a succession of the most extraordinary and difficult modulations imaginable, and was beautifully rendered. It is a pure French lyral. Dvorak's "Woodland Angelus" was also well rendered and made a charming piece. The other choral members were Jensen's "First Song," Leslie's "Charm me Asleep," Rheinberger's "Morning Song," Mendelssohn's setting of the second psalm, and Gounod's Mottet "By Babylon's Wave," A lighter selection was the Raff Winter Carol, which had to be repeated.

Madame Nordica was the soloist and is too well known to need any praise. She was in excellent voice and received a most flattering ovation which was well merited. Her voice is clear, powerful and sweet to a degree in every register, and her chest tones are rich and beautiful in quality.

She was most gracious in responding to the encores which followed each appearance and her personal charm and magnetism increased the enthusiasm after each.

Mr. Gould received the homage of the audience and conducted with his usual care and skill, although most of his hard work has been accomplished in the excellent training he has given his graceful and sweet toned choir.

NEW YORK RECORDER, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Brahms Rules in the Second Concert at Chickering Hall.

The musical meat of last night's orchestral banquet at Chickering Hall was emphatically the beautiful F major symphony of Johannes Brahms, his third work in that form. Surely its beauties, and there are many, must have appealed to the small knot of malcontents who, because Richard Wagner disliked Brahms's personality (he disliked every one, personally), therefore, see fit to denounce him as uninspired.

Now, what "inspiration" has to do with music in general and symphonies in particular is one of those questions only Annie Besant or others of her ilk can answer. Brahms has a tremendous musical temperament. He, too, can tear passion to tatters, but he can also think musically, and to do that requires more, much more, than surface traits like vivacity, versatility (i. e., superficiality) or tricks of color—in a word, mere sound-making.

As if to prove that he can be Allegro as well as Penseroso, Ariel as well as Caliban, Brahms seems to have penned this work in the happiest frame of mind (despite the grewsome remarks in Mr. Apthorpe's analytical notes on last evening's programme). Color there is, mood coloring, subtle, swift in transition, darkling at times, but the keynote throughout is pitched high, blithe, sweetly eloquent and impressively fiery. The color scheme, as far as instrumentation goes, is brighter, less turbid and generally clearer than in other of Brahms's orchestral works. But his orchestral speech, at the best, is stammering and ill-tempered when compared to Dvorak's. The third movement seems to fit, so to speak, the orchestra, better than the other three; upon its quaint, pathetic grace one cannot dwell sufficiently. It is a musical gem of the first water, and accorded a better setting than most of Brahm's precious stones.

The sadante spianto and polonaise which followed, for piano and orchestra, and played by Miss Suza Doane, a Leipsic Conservatory and a Carl Reinecke pupil, was, after the Brahms symphony, like a plunge into tepid, troubled waters. Of the andante it may be said that it was not spianato, and of the polonaise that the best part of it was the orchestral accompaniment, and every one knows that Chopin scored badly. Miss Doane was ill-advised to play with orchestra, for her style,, crisp, neat and accentless, is better adapted for the drawing room than the concert stage.

The Chopin E flat polonaise has the misfortune to have been mortgaged in 1879 by one Rafael Joseffy. With that pianistic incumbrance floating in our minds retrospectively need more be said? The young lady, who was evidently nervous, has a hurried touch rather than meagre tone and possesses little sentiment. She amply demonstrated this in the encore piece. She played Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Song," paraphrased.

Dvorak's suite in D for orchestra was the third number of the programme, and extremely interesting in character and invention. Dvorak's enormous knowledge of scoring is a help to him, even when his musical ideas are trite. He is always interesting and always says things in a piquant manner, even though he has nothing to say, which sounds paradoxical, and which is Dvorak.

There is lots of good musical blood in this suite, however. The bagpipe drone of the praeludium, the melancholy grace of the polka, the very delightful strains of the Mennett, the poetic romanza (scored lovely for the wood choir) and the Furiante finale, with its tangle of cross rhythms—bold, impetuous galloping across country—and its truly Roman Catholic finale (Dr. Dvorak is a fervent Catholic)—all these make the suite indeed noteworthy.

Like the symphony, it was nobly conducted. It was not an inspiring night for an orchestra, but Mr. Nikisch fought a good fight and made for us a night of good music. The evening closed with a brilliant performance of Wagner's pompous "Kaiser-Marsch."

This afternoon the orchestra plays at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

MONTREAL DAILY STAR.
Y. DECEMBER 10, 1892.—

OF MADAME LILLIAN NORDICA

only words of praise can be written. A consummate artist, with perfect vocal technique and great intelligence, her singing was a great delight. Madame Nordica's voice is of rich penetrating quality and rare sweetness. It is very clear and fresh without the slightest suggestion of weariness or fatigue, and like all great singers the beauties of her voice are not apparent in any special register, but throughout its whole compass. But added to the beautiful there is the perfection of style, or knowledge skilfully put into practice. Her first selection was the charming aria from Massenet's Herodiade. The sweet phrase "Il est doux, il est bon," and the rich setting of the whole aria, combined with the beauties of voice and style of the artist created great enthusiasm. The second number was the Ave Maria from Cavelleria Rusticana, the opera which has created such a furore in Europe, but which we in Montreal have hitherto only been able to hear in snatches. This beautiful melody was sung with much artistic grace, and many were the expressions of delight and most hearty the applause which followed the gifted singer at the conclusion of it. Madame Nordica's third number was an aria from Rossini's Barber of Seville, and served to show her complete control of all the devices of vocal technique. Brilliant without ostentation, displaying an easy mastery over all difficulties of mere vocalization, Madame Nordica's singing can only be pronounced such as has not been heard in Montreal for many a day. Mr. Horace W. Reyner played the piano accompaniments with good taste and facile execution, while Mr. E. A. Hilton supplied a very effective support in the Ave Maria upon the reed organ.

Daily Kennebec Journal.

THURSDAY, DEC. 15, 1892.

AUGUSTA LOCALS.

THE NORDICA CONCERT

Last Evening the Grandest Musical Entertainment Ever Given in This City.

The Nordica concert at the Opera house last evening attracted the leading society people from the cities of the Kennebec and every seat in the house was occupied, standing room only. A special train came down from Waterville with 75 people, and the evening train brought from down-river about 200.

The concert was the finest musical event ever given in the city. The audience was appreciative, and such outbursts of applause, even to the point of furore, were never before equalled here. Many of the company have sung in this city and are favorites, but Madame Nordica had never sung here and with delightful expectancy her appearance in the fourth number was awaited. Imagine then the wave of bitter disappointment that swept over the house when Mr. Luckstone announced that Madame was suffering from serious hoarseness and it had been thought impossible for her to sing. But the next words brought a sigh of relief when he said that with her accustomed indomitable courage, this being a Maine audience, she had decided to make the attempt. No sweeter singer than she the world over and while it was evident that the reference to her hoarseness had not been exaggerated, the wonderful gift and power of the woman was seen in it all. That bell like tone was impaired somewhat but it was a rare treat to hear her. Her sweet grace and charm of manner made all amends. Several times in her career, once before a brilliant audience in New York City, when similarly indisposed she refused to sing. Nothing but the fact that Maine was her early home and that she never had appeared in Augusta led her to make the attempt. Every one who listened felt a desire to express their gratitude to her for making the effort.

A perfect revelation in violin music was given by Miss Powell. Her stage presence, so winning, womanly and modest, almost prepared her listeners for the riches in store for them. What resonant quality in every tone from her instrument, clear, sweet, penetrating to the utmost parts of the hall in the softest notes! What attack! What delicacy and breadth combined! Every detail was perfect, every effort was as thorough as though she played before the most critical audience in the world.

The ninth number created a perfect furore and three encores followed and she graciously responded. The genius and fire of her playing is contagious and one only need hear her to believe the prediction that the time is near when she will be the finest violinist in the world.

One thing should not be omitted, the seventh number when Madame Nordica sang a group of old favorites, "Annie Laurie," "When the Swallows Homeward Fly," "Coming Thro' the Rye" and on the encore "Home Sweet Home." It was one of the most delightful numbers of the evening. Del Puente received a royal welcome and encore followed encore. He responded to the first encore with "Tarantella" by Rossini, that charming melody which captivated his audience on his recent appearance here. Following the eighth number, the "Barber of Seville," he was twice encored responding once with the Toreador song from Carmen. Miss Rollwagen, the contralto, is possessed of a contralto voice of pleasing rich quality. Her songs were chiefly classical. Mr. Luckstone played his usual important part as accompanist, as admirably as was expected.

GOVERNOR BURLEIGH

Entertains the Members of the Executive Council and Ladies.

Governor Burleigh entertained the members of the Executive Council and ladies at tea at his home on State street last evening.

At the close of the tea the party took an electric car in waiting at the door and went to the Opera house to attend the Nordica concert. The occasion was a most enjoyable one and will be pleasantly remembered by all who participated in it.

Bangor Whig
Dec 14th 92

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Charming Evening of Music at the Opera House.

The Artists Warmly Welcomed by a Large Audience.

It was a real musical treat of the finest flavor that was given a very large and fashionable Bangor audience at the Opera House last night, when Mme. Nordica and the other artists who accompany her appeared in the most pleasantly anticipated concert, and it was an occasion long to be held in remembrance.

Mme. Nordica has previously delighted an appreciative assemblage of musical people in this city, but the other artists are new to Bangor, although not a few of those present last evening have heard some, or all of them, in other cities. Each one stands in the front rank of the vocal or instrumental world, and a better collection of concert talent than that of last evening it would be difficult to find. The singers and players are prominent on both sides of the Atlantic and hold an assured position in the public estimation.

Although a critical audience a more enthusiastic assemblage probably has never attended a similar event, and the prima donna and her very able assistants can feel assured that their efforts met with the warmest appreciation. Double encores were the rule and notwithstanding the taxing music the artists in each case cheerfully responded, much to the delight of the listeners.

The following was the Programme.

1. Piano Solo, Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 6 ..... Listz
   Mr. Luckstone.
2. Songs { a. Ritournelle Chaminade / b. My Heart's in the Highlands ..... Shumann
   Miss Rollwagen.
3. Violin Solo, "Airs De Russe".... Wiemawski
   Miss Powell.
4. Valse Song, from "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Gonnod
   Mme. Nordica.
5. Aria, "Il Balen"..... Verdi
   Sig. Del Puente.
6. Songs { a. Still in the Night... ....Bohm / b. Ask Nothing More..... Cowen
   Miss Rollwagen.
7. A Group of Old Favorites..... .....
   Mme. Nordica.
8. Aria, from "Il Barbiere De Seveglia" ..... Rossini
   Sig. Del Puente.
9. Violin Solo, "Zigennerweisen".. ....Sarasate
   Miss Powell.
10. Duet, from "Cavalleria Rusticana..Mascagni
    Mme. Nordica and Sig. Del Puente.

The piano used is a Steinway Grand.

Mme. Nordica sang last evening with the same delicious harmony and brilliancy which have previously made her vocalization so perfect and her splendid rendition, intelligent interpretation and charming manner again won the marked favor of the audience. The group of favorite English songs was a very pleasant feature of the programme and they were sung with true feeling. The beautiful gown worn by Mme. Nordica attracted the admiring attention of the ladies.

Miss Powell has deservedly won the proud distinction of being the leading lady violinist of America and her magnificent playing last evening was a most agreeable part of the concert. She is a very attractive and graceful person and has the most skillful command over that sweetest of instruments, the violin. Miss Powell received a very warm welcome and the heartiest kind of applause at the conclusion of her numbers.

Miss Rollwagen, a favorite Boston contralto, took the place of Miss Campbell, who was detained in Philadelphia by illness, and she proved a very satisfying substitute, as she possesses a voice of strong musical timbre and uses it with good effect. She was heard with much pleasure.

Sig. Del Puente has long been one of the foremost of operatic baritones and he sings with a spirit, dash and power that give the most stirring effect. He possesses a magnificent voice and gave the intricate operatic airs a most masterly rendition last evening, every appearance being the signal for prolonged applause.

Mr. Luckstone's piano solo and his accompaniments to the singing and playing of the evening demonstrated his thorough ability and acquaintance with the instrument and his work was entirely praiseworthy.

Reception to Mme. Nordica.

After the concert a reception was given by Mr. and Mrs. Arad Thompson at their home on Broadway, in honor of Mme. Nordica and her sister, Mrs. S. F. Baldwin, of Dorchester, Mass., who are their guests. There was a large attendance of prominent people of the city and the opportunity to meet the ladies socially was a well appreciated pleasure. The guests were received by Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, the Misses Thompson, Mme. Nordica and Mrs. Baldwin. Delicious refreshments were served during the even-

[61]

The Daily Witness.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

MENDELSSOHN CHOIR.

The first Mendelssohn Choir Concert of the season was given last night in the Windsor Hall, and as usual at the Mendelssohn Concerts there were few seats unoccupied.

Each of the choral members upon the programme had been sung at some former time by the choir; and to those in the audience who were fortunate enough to have been present at the first singing of these numbers, the concert must have been doubly enjoyable. The pleasure and profit to be derived from good music is seldom greatest at the first hearing of it. And it has been the experience of not one or two Montrealers only that the Mendelssohn concerts were a series of delicious fleeting moments, freighted with more than the listeners could grasp at one time, and leaving one tantalized with the wish to pass through it all again. It is to be hoped that this will not be the last of the Mendelssohns' "special request" programmes.

The work of the choir was, as in former seasons, very fine. In the double quartette of the Mendelssohn number, "Why do the heathen rage," the general effect was somewhat spoiled by the undue strength of the alto parts, but aside from this, little fault could be found.

The most interesting choral numbers were the Madrigal, "Charm me to Sleep," by that wonderfully clever part-song writer, Henry Leslie, and the "Woodland Angelus," by Dvorak. The latter song showed to advantage the rich low tones of the Mendelssohn's basses, but its chief interest lay in the fact of its being an example in four-part voice writing of the color effect which the modern composers have been bringing to such perfection in their orchestral work.

The closing selection of the choir, "The Motett," by Gounod, gave the audience a chance to hear how large and firm a fortissimo the choir could bring forth when it permitted itself to do so unrestrainedly.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Lillian Nordica, whose singing has recently been creating excitement in England. Madame Nordica's first song was "Herodiade," by Massenet. The words of the song were French, and it was at once noticeable with what clearness almost every syllable of it could be heard. Presently the listener was struck by the intellectuality of Madame Nordica's interpretation. Expression, with her was not a matter of haphazard or momentary impulse, nor was it limited to the two varieties of tone—very soft and very loud. Finally, one could not but be carried away by the perfection of Madame Nordica's method of using her voice. It is a question indeed, if Montreal has ever heard more perfect vocalization than that of Madame Nordica last night, Albani's and Patti's not excepted. Her Aria from "Il Barbiere di Seviglia" brought down the house, and deservedly, and her attack of the opening high note in Mascagni's "Ave Maria" was so clear, clean and at the same time soft, that it was a thing for students of singing to wonder at and remember with delight.

Each time Madame Nordica sang, she was recalled, and each time she responded with an English song. She is a dramatic rather than a lyric singer, and forceful rather than sympathetic, but both as an interpreter of music and a vocalist she is unquestionably great.

DECEMBER

Commercial Dec 10-92 BANGOR

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Expectations of Bangor Musical People Fully Met at Last Evening's Entertainment.

Last evening, for the second time, in only a little more than a year, Madame Lillian Nordica, with competent accompanying artists, held captive for fully two hours all the musical sympathy and enthusiasm possessed by a Bangor audience, superb in point of numbers, brilliancy and cultivation. Every person who went to the Opera House expected a treat and there was no feeling of disappointment when the last notes of the final selection had died away and the delighted auditors were ready to congratulate each other that Bangor was favored with such an entertainment and that Maine had been able to give to the musical world so many great artists and among them, a Nordica.

Although perhaps not artistically, last evening's concert was in many respects more pleasing than the one a year ago. Two reasons in the minds of many, contributed to bringing this about. One was the happy impression made by the violiniste, Miss Maud Powell and the other, and it is hoped that the refined and delicate sensibilities of the critics may not be too deeply shocked by stating it, was undoubtedly the introduction of the English songs by Mme. Nordica herself.

Miss Powell succeeded here, as she has elsewhere, in creating a furore by her superb work with the violin and the people who heard her will not be contented until she comes to Bangor again. She certainly shared with the great prima donna in the honors of the evening.

Madame Nordica, as promised, was in perfect voice and her selections so happily made that her numbers were all perfectly charming. Nothing that could be said at this late day, would add in the minutest degree to the high opinion of Nordica's work previously formed in Bangor. To say that it was up to her usual standard is praise enough. Nordica's costume was of a peculiar design and created no little comment among the ladies.

Sig. Del Puente enthused his audience by his vigor and almost faultless execution. This veteran baritone had never before appeared in Bangor, but it is hoped that now he has so pleasantly broken the ice, we may hear him frequently.

Miss Bollwagen, the contralto, and Mr. [illegible], the pianist, did very credit-

[illegible] one of the concert fol-

The Gazette.

MONTREAL, SATURDAY, DEC. 10.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Mendelssohn Quartette.

To say, last night, that the Windsor hall was crowded to the doors was a foregone conclusion, for, in addition to the Mendelssohn choir, Lillian Nordica was to sing. The choir itself was not quite so strong as usual. The famous Mendelssohn basses were not so great as they have been in times past, and the tenors were somewhat weak. Most of the programme has been given here before, and Jansen's "First Song," Leslie's "Charm Me Asleep," Rheinberger's "Morning Joy," Saent-Saens "To the Night," Mendelssohn's psalm "Why do the Heathen," Duorak's "Woodland Angelus," Raft's "Winter Carol," and Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave," were all sung with that appreciation of their inherent beauties which the choir possesses.

It may be said that Madame Nordica surpassed herself last night. At the concert last year she was considered by the Montreal musical public to be the equal of Albani, and rightly, too. Her selections last night were Massenet's "Herodiade," Mascoyne's lovely "Ave Maria," and an aria from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." In all these she was rapturously encored, and had to bow her acknowledgments three times at the end. Truly Nordica is a great artist and one whom Montreal will be always pleased to hear. Mr. Horace W. Reyner accompanied Madame Nordica with great taste on the piano, and in the "Ave Maria" Mr. Hilton accompanied on the organ.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Philadelphia on December 7. In commenting upon the concert the Philadelphia Ledger says: "The soloist of the evening, Ferruccio Busoni, achieved a triumph. He played Liszt's No. 2 pianoforte concerto in a way that stirred the imagination of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and most rapid fingering was most admirable and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's Fantasia, from "Lucrezia Borgia," with the same excellent power he displayed on the concerto. Mr. Busoni came here with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with—and made a deeper impression than most of them.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its second concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows:

Symphony No. 3 ..... Brahms
Andante, spianato and polonaise ..... Chopin
Piano and Orchestra.
Suite for orchestra ..... Dvorák
Kaisermarsch ..... Wagner
Soloist, Miss Suza Doane.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The second public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Nikisch, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, concerto for piano in B flat minor, Xaver Scharwenka (to be played by the composer); two movements from the "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and the overture "Euryanthe," Weber.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall November 21. The program included the E flat quartet, Mozart (which was beautifully played), the F minor quartet by Beethoven and Schumann's piano quintet. The pianist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood. Once or twice he was inclined to take the bit between his teeth, but he recovered himself without material damage to the music. The scherzo was particularly delightful, so crisp and clean was the performance of Mr. Sherwood. This performance was more pleasing than was the shop window illustration that proclaimed the approach of the performer.

Nor was the seventh Symphony concert, December 3, altogether a happy affair. Mr. Kneisel was applauded loudly for his performance of the air in Bach's D major suite, but the rest of the suite was played carelessly. Mr. D'Albert's F major symphony is known to you. It was heard here for the first time. No doubt when it was first performed in Europe it attracted attention on account of the age of the composer, but now there is little kindness shown to him by the revival of this labored collection of reminiscences of Brahms, Wagner, et al., peppered with grotesque and barbaric originality. The remaining number of the program was the "Fliegende Holländer" overture. The program of the next concert, December 17, will include the eighth and the ninth symphony of Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet.—The four concerts of the Kneisel String Quartet are to be given at Chickering Hall on the afternoons of December 10, January 14, February 11, March 18. At the first concert, next Saturday, Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist. The program to be given is as follows:

Quartet in D major ..... Haydn
Allegro. Cantabile e mesto. Menuetto (allegro). Finale (presto).
Quartet in F minor, op. 95 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio. Allegretto ma non troppo. Allegro assai vivace ma serioso. Larghetto espressivo; allegretto agitato.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo. Poco adagio. Scherzo (poco allegro). Finale (allegro).
Mr. Nikisch, piano.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Kislev 27, 5653, December 16, 1892

Music.

On Thursday night, of last week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert at Chickering Hall, and it has already been made evident that another season must see this series of concerts given in a much larger hall, so that all who desire to attend may be accommodated. The performances of this orchestra seem to have reached that state of perfection that leaves nothing to be said beyond recording the event and giving the programme. The one composer in the interpretation of whom we always thought was Mr. Nikisch's one weak point, and that only in his failure to sufficiently emphasize the dramatic force in his music, was thoroughly modified by the magnificent performance of the "Kaiser Marsch," which closed the concert. The other orchestral works were Brahm's third symphony, and a suite in D major, by Dvorak. The latter was a most charming and delightful composition, full of the composer's individuality and graceful instrumental coloring. It came as a positive relief after Brahm, whose symphonic works do not seem to us to improve on acquaintance. We have endeavored, over and over again, to reach that condition of musical intelligence which would enable us to recognize what his admirers claim for his works. He is with many, a fad—it can hardly be called anything else—and they claim him as the greatest of living composers. How he can be mentioned in the same breath with Tchaikowsky, Dvorak, and others that can be named, is beyond comprehension, and it is hard to understand how discriminating listeners can find much beyond what might be termed musical mathematics in most of his greater compositions. Of course there are occasional snatches of charming music in his works, more particularly in his trios, quartets, etc.; but in the aggregate we fail to find that which is so ardently claimed by his admirers, and which is necessary to a thorough enjoyment of music, namely, the possession o original formulated musical ideas. The soloist at the concert was a young American pianist, Miss Suza Doane, who has just returned from Leipsic, where she has been studying for some years. She played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise," and while giving every evidence of the possession of the elements which enter into the foundation of a good pianist, she is certainly not the artist that one would expect to listen to at a Boston Symphony concert.

On Friday night there was introduced to an American audience, two artists who will undoubtedly add in a great degree to the fascinations which form so much of musical life in this city. Mr. Wolff, the violinist, and Mr. Hollman, the 'cellist, are indeed great performers on their respective instruments, more particularly Mr. Hollman, whose playing of the violincello seemed to arouse a veritable sensation. His broad full tone and its sensuous beauty are positively stirring, and his artistic intelligence is such that stamps him as one of the greatest of virtuosi. Both these artists will give exquisite pleasure to music lovers, and any who have not already heard them should certainly do so at their next concert, which will take place next Monday evening, at Chickering Hall.

On Saturday afternoon, the Kneisel Quartet gave the first of a series of four concerts, at Chickering Hall, before an exceedingly large audience, and demonstrated that it is the best organization heard here in chamber music. In precision, delicacy and charm they are the ideal interpreters of this form of musical entertainment. The programme consisted of Haydn's quartet in D major, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, and Brahm's A major piano quartet. In the latter work Mr. Nikisch played the piano part and added materially to the high merit of the performance. His musicianly instincts as well as artistic expression enhanced very much the enjoyment of a not too interesting work.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 18.

At the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, on the evening of Dec. 7, the soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Public Ledger thus comments on his playing: "The soloist of the evening, Ferruccio Busoni, achieved a triumph. He played Liez.'s Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in a way that stirred the admiration of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's Fantasia, from "Lucretia Borgia," with the same excellent power he displayed in the concerto. Mr. Busoni came here with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with—and made a deeper impression than most of them."

[62]

The Daily Witness.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1892.

MENDELSSOHN CHOIR.

The first Mendelssohn Choir Concert of the season was given last night in the Windsor Hall, and as usual at the Mendelssohn Concerts there were few seats unoccupied.

Each of the choral members upon the programme had been sung at some former time by the choir; and to those in the audience who were fortunate enough to have been present at the first singing of these numbers, the concert must have been doubly enjoyable. The pleasure and profit to be derived from good music is seldom greatest at the first hearing of it. And it has been the experience of not one or two Montrealers only that the Mendelssohn concerts were a series of delicious fleeting moments, freighted with more than the listeners could grasp at one time, and leaving one tantalized with the wish to pass through it all again. It is to be hoped that this will not be the last of the Mendelssohns' "special request" programmes.

The work of the choir was, as in former seasons, very fine. In the double quartette of the Mendelssohn number, "Why do the heathen rage," the general effect was somewhat spoiled by the undue strength of the alto parts, but aside from this, little fault could be found.

The most interesting choral numbers were the Madrigal, "Charm me to Sleep," by that wonderfully clever part-song writer, Henry Leslie, and the "Woodland Angelus," by Dvorak. The latter song showed to advantage the rich low tones of the Mendelssohn's basses, but its chief interest lay in the fact of its being an example in four-part voice writing of the color effect which the modern composers have been bringing to such perfection in their orchestral work.

The closing selection of the choir, "The Motett," by Gounod, gave the audience a chance to hear how large and firm a fortissimo the choir could bring forth when it permitted itself to do so unrestrainedly.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Lillian Nordica, whose singing has recently been creating excitement in England. Madame Nordica's first song was "Herodiade," by Massenet. The words of the song were French, and it was at once noticeable with what clearness almost every syllable of it could be heard. Presently the listener was struck by the intellectuality of Madame Nordica's interpretation. Expression, with her was not a matter of haphazard or momentary impulse, nor was it limited to the two varieties of tone—very soft and very loud. Finally, one could not but be carried away by the perfection of Madame Nordica's method of using her voice. It is a question indeed, if Montreal has ever heard more perfect vocalization than that of Madame Nordica last night, Albani's and Patti's not excepted. Her Aria from "Il Barbiere di Seviglia" brought down the house, and deservedly, and her attack of the opening high note in Mascagni's "Ave Maria" was so clear, clean and at the same time soft, that it was a thing for students of singing to wonder at and remember with delight.

Each time Madame Nordica sang, she was recalled, and each time she responded with an English song. She is a dramatic rather than a lyric singer, and forceful rather than sympathetic, but both as an interpreter of music and a vocalist she is unquestionably great.

DECEMBEI

Communal Dec 10-92 BANGOR

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Expectations of Bangor Musical People Fully Met at Last Evening's Entertainment.

Last evening, for the second time, in only a little more than a year, Madame Lillian Nordica, with competent accompanying artists, held captive for fully two hours all the musical sympathy and enthusiasm possessed by a Bangor audience, superb in point of numbers, brilliancy and cultivation. Every person who went to the Opera House expected a treat and there was no feeling of disappointment when the last notes of the final selection had died away and the delighted auditors were ready to congratulate each other that Bangor was favored with such an entertainment and that Maine had been able to give to the musical world so many great artists and among them, a Nordica.

Although perhaps not artistically, last evening's concert was in many respects more pleasing than the one a year ago. Two reasons in the minds of many, contributed to bringing this about. One was the happy impression made by the violiniste, Miss Maud Powell and the other, and it is hoped that the refined and delicate sensibilities of the critics may not be too deeply shocked by stating it, was undoubtedly the introduction of the English songs by Mme. Nordica herself.

Miss Powell suceeeded here, as she has elsewhere, in creating a furore by her superb work with the violin and the people who heard her will not be contented until she comes to Bangor again. She certainly shared with the great prima donna in the honors of the evening.

Madame Nordica, as promised, was in perfect voice and her selections so happily made that her numbers were all perfectly charming. Nothing that could be said at this late day, would add in the minutest degree to the high opinion of Nordica's work previously formed in Bangor. To say that it was up to her usual standard is praise enough. Nordica's costume was of a peculiar design and created no little comment among the ladies.

Sig. Del Puente enthused his audience by his vigor and almost faultless execution. This veteran baritone had never before appeared in Bangor, but it is hoped that now he has so pleasantly broken the ice, we may hear him frequently.

Miss Rollwagen, the contralto, and Mr. Luckstone, the pianist, did very creditable work.

The full programme of the concert fol-

The Gazette.

MONTREAL, SATURDAY, DEC. 10.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Mendelssohn Quartette.

To say, last night, that the Windsor hall was crowded to the doors was a foregone conclusion, for, in addition to the Mendelssohn choir, Lillian Nordica was to sing. The choir itself was not quite so strong as usual. The famous Mendelssohn basses were not so great as they have been in times past, and the tenors were somewhat weak. Most of the programme has been given here before, and Jansen's "First Song," Leslie's "Charm Me Asleep," Rheinberger's "Morning Joy," Saent-Saens "To the Night," Mendelssohn's psalm "Why do the Heathen," Duorak's "Woodland Angelus," Raft's "Winter Carol," and Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave," were all sung with that appreciation of their inherent beauties which the choir possesses.

It may be said that Madame Nordica surpassed herself last night. At the concert last year she was considered by the Montreal musical public to be the equal of Albani, and rightly, too. Her selections last night were Massenet's "Herodiade," Mascoyne's lovely "Ave Maria," and an aria from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." In all these she was rapturously encored, and had to bow her acknowledgments three times at the end. Truly Nordica is a great artist and one whom Montreal will be always pleased to hear. Mr. Horace W. Reyner accompanied Madame Nordica with great taste on the piano, and in the "Ave Maria" Mr. Hilton accompanied on the organ.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 17, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Philadelphia on December 7. In commenting upon the concert the Philadelphia Ledger says: "The soloist of the evening, Ferruccio Busoni, achieved a triumph. He played Liszt's No. 2 pianoforte concerto in a way that stirred the imagination of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and most rapid fingering was most admirable and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's Fantasia, from "Lucrezia Borgia," with the same excellent power he displayed on the concerto. Mr. Busoni came here with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with—and made a deeper impression than most of them.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its second concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows:

Symphony No. 3 ..... Brahms
Andante, spianato and polonaise ..... Chopin
Piano and Orchestra.
Suite for orchestra ..... Dvorák
Kaisermarsch ..... Wagner
Soloist, Miss Suza Doane.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The second public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Mr. Nikisch, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program includes the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, concerto for piano in B flat minor, Xaver Scharwenka (to be played by the composer); two movements from the "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and the overture "Euryanthe," Weber.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall November 21. The program included the E flat quartet, Mozart (which was beautifully played), the F minor quartet by Beethoven and Schumann's piano quintet. The pianist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood. Once or twice he was inclined to take the bit between his teeth, but he recovered himself without material damage to the music. The scherzo was particularly delightful, so crisp and clean was the performance of Mr. Sherwood. This performance was more pleasing than was the shop window illustration that proclaimed the approach of the performer.

Nor was the seventh Symphony concert, December 3, altogether a happy affair. Mr. Kneisel was applauded loudly for his performance of the air in Bach's D major suite, but the rest of the suite was played carelessly. Mr. D'Albert's F major symphony is known to you. It was heard here for the first time. No doubt when it was first performed in Europe it attracted attention on account of the age of the composer, but now there is little kindness shown to him by the revival of this labored collection of reminiscences of Brahms, Wagner, et al., peppered with grotesque and barbaric originality. The remaining number of the program was the "Fliegende Holländer" overture. The program of the next concert, December 17, will include the eighth and the ninth symphony of Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet.—The four concerts of the Kneisel String Quartet are to be given at Chickering Hall on the afternoons of December 10, January 14, February 11, March 18. At the first concert, next Saturday, Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist. The program to be given is as follows:

Quartet in D major ..... Haydn
Allegro. Cantabile e mesto. Menuetto (allegro). Finale (presto).
Quartet in F minor, op. 95 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio. Allegretto ma non troppo. Allegro assai vivace ma serioso. Larghetto espressivo; allegretto agitato.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo. Poco adagio. Scherzo (poco allegro). Finale (allegro).
Mr. Nikisch, piano.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Kislev 27, 5653, December 16, 1892

Music.

On Thursday night, of last week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert at Chickering Hall, and it has already been made evident that another season must see this series of concerts given in a much larger hall, so that all who desire to attend may be accommodated. The performances of this orchestra seem to have reached that state of perfection that leaves nothing to be said beyond recording the event and giving the programme. The one composer in the interpretation of whom we always thought was Mr. Nikisch's one weak point, and that only in his failure to sufficiently emphasize the dramatic force in his music, was thoroughly modified by the magnificent performance of the "Kaiser Marsch," which closed the concert. The other orchestral works were Brahm's third symphony, and a suite in D major, by Dvorak. The latter was a most charming and delightful composition, full of the composer's individuality and graceful instrumental coloring It came as a positive relief after Brahm, whose symphonic works do not seem to us to improve on acquaintance. We have endeavored, over and over again, to reach that condition of musical intelligence which would enable us to recognize what his admirers claim for his works. He is with many, a fad—it can hardly be called anything else - and they claim him as the greatest of living composers. How he can be mentioned in the same breath with Tchaikowsky, Dvorak, and others that can be named, is beyond comprehension, and it is hard to understand how discriminating listeners can find much beyond what might be termed musical mathematics in most of his greater compositions. Of course there are occasional snatches of charming music in his works, more particularly in his trios, quartets, etc.; but in the aggregate we fail to find that which is so ardently claimed by his admirers, and which is necessary to a thorough enjoyment of music, namely, the possession o original formulated musical ideas. The soloist at the concert was a young American pianist, Miss Suza Doane, who has just returned from Leipsic, where she has been studying for some years. She played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise," and while giving every evidence of the possession of the elements which enter into the foundation of a good pianist, she is certainly not the artist that one would expect to listen to at a Boston Symphony concert.

On Friday night there was introduced to an American audience, two artists who will undoubtedly add in a great degree to the fascinations which form so much of musical life in this city. Mr. Wolff, the violinist, and Mr. Hollman, the 'cellist, are indeed great performers on their respective instruments, more particularly Mr. Hollman, whose playing of the violincello seemed to arouse a veritable sensation. His broad full tone and its sensuous beauty are positively stirring, and his artistic intelligence is such that stamps him as one of the greatest of virtuosi. Both these artists will give exquisite pleasure to music lovers, and any who have not already heard them should certainly do so at their next concert, which will take place next Monday evening, at Chickering Hall.

On Saturday afternoon, the Kneisel Quartet gave the first of a series of four concerts, at Chickering Hall, before an exceedingly large audience, and demonstrated that it is the best organization heard here in chamber music. In precision, delicacy and charm they are the ideal interpreters of this form of musical entertainment. The programme consisted of Haydn's quartet in D major, Beethoven's quartet in F minor, and Brahm's A major piano quartet. In the latter work Mr. Nikisch played the piano part and added materially to the high merit of the performance. His musicianly instincts as well as artistic expression enhanced very much the enjoyment of a not too interesting work.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 18.

At the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, on the evening of Dec. 7, the soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Public Ledger thus comments on his playing: "The soloist of the evening, Ferruccio Busoni, achieved a triumph. He played Liez.'s Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in a way that stirred the admiration of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's Fantasia, from "Lucretia Borgia," with the same excellent power he displayed in the concerto. Mr. Busoni came here with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with—and made a deeper impression than most of them."

[62]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

The Symphony Chorus Heard in Beethoven's Ninth.

The feature of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, was the first appearance of the chorus organized for the present season as an adjunct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fact as well as name, the programme being made up of the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, a choice which probably appealed to the taste and judgment of a portion of those present.

The readings of the instrumental movements of the two symphonies were in keeping with traditional interpretations in the main, and gave general satisfaction. An especially enjoyable performance was given of the lovely allegretto of the eighth symphony, and the brilliant allegro "Vivace" of the same work was delightfully given.

The preparations for the performance of the final movement, made necessary by the limited space available for the singers, caused so much confusion that the continuity of the interpretation was sadly interrupted, and much of the pleasure usually attending a hearing of this finale was missed. The solo singers selected to assist were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Henrich Meyn, all of whom proved amply equal to the demands made upon them. Miss White made her first prominent appearance here on this occasion, and the rare quality of her voice as well as her admirable skill as a singer was effectively shown in the trying passages for the soprano voice. Mr. Meyn delivered the opening recitative in a thoroughly artistic fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the organization of the chorus has been to get competent singers, and the work of its members last evening must have amply rewarded Messrs. Nikisch and Foote for their labors in this direction. The chorus sang with a degree of confidence and certainty that was delightful, and followed the intelligent direction of their conductor with always admirable results. The good work of all the musical forces of the evening was highly enjoyed by the immense audience present, which was fully up to the legal limit put upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signorina Eugenia Castellano, pianist, and the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, "Italian," Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in G. major, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The piano playing of Ferruccio Busoni in the Liszt No. 2 concerto, at the Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is spoken of as a remarkable exhibition of the great abilities of this artist who was most highly commended by the critics of the Quaker city.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall, Boston.

[63]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8 P.M.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

The Symphony Chorus Heard in Beethoven's Ninth.

The feature of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, was the first appearance of the chorus organized for the present season as an adjunct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fact as well as name, the programme being made up of the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, a choice which probably appealed to the taste and judgment of a portion of those present.

The readings of the instrumental movements of the two symphonies were in keeping with traditional interpretations in the main, and gave general satisfaction. An especially enjoyable performance was given of the lovely allegretto of the eighth symphony, and the brilliant allegro "Vivace" of the same work was delightfully given.

The preparations for the performance of the final movement, made necessary by the limited space available for the singers, caused so much confusion that the continuity of the interpretation was sadly interrupted, and much of the pleasure usually attending a hearing of this finale was missed. The solo singers selected to assist were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Henrich Meyn, all of whom proved amply equal to the demands made upon them. Miss White made her first prominent appearance here on this occasion, and the rare quality of her voice as well as her admirable skill as a singer was effectively shown in the trying passages for the soprano voice. Mr. Meyn delivered the opening recitative in a thoroughly artistic fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the organization of the chorus has been to get competent singers, and the work of its members last evening must have amply rewarded Messrs. Nikisch and Foote for their labors in this direction. The chorus sang with a degree of confidence and certainty that was delightful, and followed the intelligent direction of their conductor with always admirable results. The good work of all the musical forces of the evening was highly enjoyed by the immense audience present, which was fully up to the legal limit put upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signorina Eugenia Castellano, pianist, and the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, "Italian," Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in G. major, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The piano playing of Ferruccio Busoni in the Liszt No. 2 concerto, at the Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is spoken of as a remarkable exhibition of the great abilities of this artist who was most highly commended by the critics of the Quaker city.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall, Boston.

[63]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

Thursday, Dec. 15, at 8 P.M.

BANGOR OPERA HOUSE,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13, at 8. . . .

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna Soprano

Mme. Lillian Nordica

Assisted by the following Artists:

Miss HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL,
The noted New York Contralto.

Sig. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Eminent Baritone.

Mr. ISADOR LUCKSTONE,
Solo Pianist and Accompanist,

and

Miss MAUD POWELL,
The leading Lady Violinist of the World.

TICKETS, 75 cts. and $1.00.

On sale Friday, Dec. 9, at 9 A.M. Out of town parties, by sending orders for tickets, accompanied by cash or check, to Mr. Owen at once, can be assured of their seats.

Excursion rates on the M. C. R.R. from all the adjacent towns.

Madame Nordica.

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

VOL. XCII. NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18.

The Symphony Chorus in Beethoven's Nint

The feature of the eighth conce Boston Symphony orchestra, M Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall ing, was the first appearance of th organized for the present season junct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fac as name, the programme being m the eighth and ninth symphonie thoven, a choice which probably to the taste and judgment of a those present.

The readings of the instrumen ments of the two symphonies wer ing with traditional interpretatio main, and gave general satisfac especially enjoyable performa given of the lovely allegretto of t symphony, and the brilliant "Vivace" of the same work wa fully given.

The preparations for the perfor the final movement, made necess limited space available for th caused so much confusion that tinuity of the interpretation was terrupted, and much of the usually attending a hearing of was missed. The solo singers a assist were Miss Priscilla W Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. W Mr. Henrich Meyn, all of wh amply equal to the demands them. Miss White made her fi nent appearance here on this occ the rare quality of her voice as w admirable skill as a singer was shown in the trying passage soprano voice. Mr. Meyn de opening recitative in a thorough fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the orga the chorus has been to get com ers, and the work of its member ing must have amply reward Nikisch and Foote for their lab direction. The chorus sang wi of confidence and certainty t lightful, and followed the int rection of their conductor with mirable results. The good work musical forces of the evening w enjoyed by the immense audien which was fully up to the leg upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the sol Signorina Eugenia Castellano, t the programme will consist o sohn's symphony in A major, Tschaikowsky's concerto for No. 2, in G. major, and Lalo's sy Roi d'Ys."

The piano playing of Ferrucci the Liszt No. 2 concerto, at th phia concert of the Boston Sy chestra, is spoken of as a remar bition of the great abilities of who was most highly commend critics of the Quaker city.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,

THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15, AT 8.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

. . . BY . . .

Mme. Lillian Nordica

The distinguished Prima Donna, assisted by MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN, CONTRALTO.

MR. LEO SCHULZ, VIOLONCELLO.

SIG. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE, BARITONE.

MISS MAUD POWELL, VIOLIN.

MR. ISIDORE LUCKSTONE, PIANIST.

Stage decorations and arrangements under the direction of L. L. Blake & Co.

PROGRAMME.

1. PIANO SOLO, Liszt arr. of Overture, "William Tell" Rossini
   Mr. LUCKSTONE.
2. SONGS, { a Ritournelle Chaminade / b My Heart's in the Highlands } . . . Schumann
   Miss ROLLWAGEN.
3. VIOLIN SOLO, Airs de Russe . . . . . Wieniawski
   Miss POWELL.
4. VALSE SONG from "Romeo and Juliet" . . Gounod
   Mme. NORDICA.
5. ARIA, "Il Balen" . . . . . Verdi
   Sig. DEL PUENTE.
6. SOLOS FOR VIOLONCELLO, { a Nocturne . . Chopin / b Selected. / c Gavotte . . . Popper }
   Mr. SCHULZ.
7. A GROUP OF OLD FAVORITES.
   Mme. NORDICA.
8. ARIA from "Il Barbiere de Seviglia" . . . . Rossini
   Sig. DEL PUENTE.
9. VIOLIN SOLO, "Zigeunerweisen" . . . . Sarasate
   Miss POWELL.
10. SONGS, { a Still is the Night . . . . . Bohm / b Ask Nothing More . . . . . Cowen }
    Miss ROLLWAGEN.
11. DUET from "Cavalleria Rusticana" . . . . Mascagni
    Mme. NORDICA and Sig. DEL PUENTE.

The piano used is a Steinway, from M. Steinert & Sons, Boston.

Madame

Under the management o

CITY HALL, LEV

Thursda

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON,
THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna

Mme. Lillian Nordica

Assisted by the following Artists:

Miss LENA LITTLE,
The Eminent Boston Contralto.

Sig. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Famous Operatic Baritone.

Mr. LEO SCHULZ,
'Cello Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

And

Miss MAUD POWELL,
The leading Lady Violinist of the World.

TICKETS, 75 cts. and $1.00.

Sale opens Thursday, Dec. 8, at 9 A.M., at the City Hall. After the first day the sale will be at Douglass & Cook's Book Store, 188 Lisbon Street.

Out of town parties desiring seats can send order, accompanied by cash or check, to Mr. R. C. PENNELL, local agent, care Douglass & Cook's Store, and, if the order is sent in season, good seats guaranteed. No speculating allowed, and not over six seats sold to one person.

FARMINGTON parties can give their orders to Mr. A. W. Pottle, Druggist, and they will be promptly attended to.

In BRUNSWICK orders will be taken by Mr. Emery A. Crawford, at Riley's Music Store.

Orders taken in BATH by Mr. N. W. Ham.

Address any of the above-mentioned gentlemen for further information.

Excursion rates on all divisions of the Maine Central R.R. leading into Lewiston.

Special train for Farmington after the concert, and a round-trip fare of one dollar will be given. Special train also on the Grand Trunk, and round-trip rate given.

Passenger car added to the night freight for Waterville and way stations.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

The Symphony Chorus Heard in Beethoven's Ninth.

The feature of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, was the first appearance of the chorus organized for the present season as an adjunct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fact as well as name, the programme being made up of the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, a choice which probably appealed to the taste and judgment of a portion of those present.

The readings of the instrumental movements of the two symphonies were in keeping with traditional interpretations in the main, and gave general satisfaction. An especially enjoyable performance was given of the lovely allegretto of the eighth symphony, and the brilliant allegro "Vivace" of the same work was delightfully given.

The preparations for the performance of the final movement, made necessary by the limited space available for the singers, caused so much confusion that the continuity of the interpretation was sadly interrupted, and much of the pleasure usually attending a hearing of this finale was missed. The solo singers selected to assist were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Henrich Meyn, all of whom proved amply equal to the demands made upon them. Miss White made her first prominent appearance here on this occasion, and the rare quality of her voice as well as her admirable skill as a singer was effectively shown in the trying passages for the soprano voice. Mr. Meyn delivered the opening recitative in a thoroughly artistic fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the organization of the chorus has been to get competent singers, and the work of its members last evening must have amply rewarded Messrs. Nikisch and Foote for their labors in this direction. The chorus sang with a degree of confidence and certainty that was delightful, and followed the intelligent direction of their conductor with always admirable results. The good work of all the musical forces of the evening was highly enjoyed by the immense audience present, which was fully up to the legal limit put upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signorina Eugenia Castellano, pianist, and the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, "Italian," Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in G. major, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The piano playing of Ferruccio Busoni in the Liszt No. 2 concerto, at the Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is spoken of as a remarkable exhibition of the great abilities of this artist who was most highly commended by the critics of the Quaker city.

Madame Nordica.

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

OPERA HOUSE, BANGOR,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 13.

CITY HALL, LEWISTON, . .
THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 15.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna

Mme. Lillian Nordica

Assisted by the following Artists:

Miss LENA LITTLE,
The Eminent Boston Contralto.

Sig. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Famous Operatic Baritone.

Mr. LEO SCHULZ,
'Cello Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

And

Miss MAUD POWELL,
The leading Lady Violinist of the World.

TICKETS, 75 cts. and $1.00.

Sale opens Thursday, Dec. 8, at 9 A.M., at the City Hall. After the first day the sale will be at Douglass & Cook's Book Store, 188 Lisbon Street.

Out of town parties desiring seats can send order, accompanied by cash or check, to Mr. R. C. PENNELL, local agent, care Douglass & Cook's Store, and, if the order is sent in season, good seats guaranteed. No speculating allowed, and not over six seats sold to one person.

FARMINGTON parties can give their orders to Mr. A. W. Pottle, Druggist, and they will be promptly attended to.

In BRUNSWICK orders will be taken by Mr. Emery A. Crawford, at Riley's Music Store.

Orders taken in BATH by Mr. N. W. Ham.

Address any of the above-mentioned gentlemen for further information.

Excursion rates on all divisions of the Maine Central R.R. leading into Lewiston.

Special train for Farmington after the concert, and a round-trip fare of one dollar will be given. Special train also on the Grand Trunk, and round-trip rate given.

Passenger car added to the night freight for Waterville and way stations.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

The Symphony Chorus Heard in Beethoven's Ninth.

The feature of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, was the first appearance of the chorus organized for the present season as an adjunct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fact as well as name, the programme being made up of the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, a choice which probably appealed to the taste and judgment of a portion of those present.

The readings of the instrumental movements of the two symphonies were in keeping with traditional interpretations in the main, and gave general satisfaction. An especially enjoyable performance was given of the lovely allegretto of the eighth symphony, and the brilliant allegro "Vivace" of the same work was delightfully given.

The preparations for the performance of the final movement, made necessary by the limited space available for the singers, caused so much confusion that the continuity of the interpretation was sadly interrupted, and much of the pleasure usually attending a hearing of this finale was missed. The solo singers selected to assist were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Henrich Meyn, all of whom proved amply equal to the demands made upon them. Miss White made her first prominent appearance here on this occasion, and the rare quality of her voice as well as her admirable skill as a singer was effectively shown in the trying passages for the soprano voice. Mr. Meyn delivered the opening recitative in a thoroughly artistic fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the organization of the chorus has been to get competent singers, and the work of its members last evening must have amply rewarded Messrs. Nikisch and Foote for their labors in this direction. The chorus sang with a degree of confidence and certainty that was delightful, and followed the intelligent direction of their conductor with always admirable results. The good work of all the musical forces of the evening was highly enjoyed by the immense audience present, which was fully up to the legal limit put upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signorina Eugenia Castellano, pianist, and the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, "Italian," Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in G. major, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

The piano playing of Ferruccio Busoni in the Liszt No. 2 concerto, at the Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is spoken of as a remarkable exhibition of the great abilities of this artist who was most highly commended by the critics of the Quaker city.

Madame Nordica.

. . .

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

BOSTON THEATRES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 18, 1892.

The Symphony concert programme in Music hall last evening was: Beethoven, symphony No. 8 in F. major, opus 93; Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), opus 125. The solo parts were sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

SECOND ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second Adamowski quartette concert, at which Mr. William H. Sherwood, pianist, will assist, will be given in Chickering hall on Tuesday next, Dec. 20, at three o'clock. The programme will consist of the following numbers:

Mendelssohn. Trio, D minor, op. 49.
Molto allegro agitato.
Andante con moto tranquillo.
Scherzo.
Finale.
Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Sherwood.
Beethoven. Quartette, F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.
Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.
Adagio molto e mesto.
Allegro (theme russe.)
Grieg. Piano and 'Cello Sonata, A minor, op. 36.
Allegro agitato.
Andante molto tranquillo.
Allegro.
Mr. Joseph Adamowski and Mr. Sherwood.

The Mason & Hamlin grand piano will be used.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 18, 1892.

Symphony Orchestra Offers Beethoven Programme.

Mr. Nikisch offered a Beethoven programme at the ninth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the works selected being No. 8, known as the "little symphony," and the ninth or choral symphony. In the latter composition the orchestra was assisted by the newly-organized chorus and Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, soloists.

The charming eighth symphony appeals strongly to the popular taste, for its melodic form and delicate instrumentation is simpler than in the ninth, and to an uncultivated musical ear the former work is really the more enjoyable.

The first movement is of a sweet and gentle character, which is suddenly interrupted by a sad motif breaking in upon the joyous song.

The second, allegreto scherzando, introduces a crisp dialogue, as it were, between the violins and basses, an effect whose beauty has few if any equals in orchestral writing. A dainty minuet follows and a lively finale closes the composition, a peculiar and, to many, a commonplace ending being given to the piece, as if Beethoven had finished the work in haste and without a revision.

The magnificent work of the string contingent was noticeable in this number and the "conversation" between the woodwinds, basses and violins in the second movement was not only played artistically, but its quaintness brought an involuntary smile to the face of every auditor.

The ninth, the grandest of all the master's compositions, is peculiar in being a combination of vocal and instrumental music. Prior to writing this last symphony Beethoven had written a choral fantasie in which a chorus was employed in the finale: but the ninth is on a much grander scale, and this musical poem is universally conceded to be the most magnificent expression of the great musician's genius.

The vocal finale is founded upon Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and Beethoven is said to have had the idea of writing a score from this poem in his mind for 30 years.

The symphony is a masterpiece, a combination of the gentlest emotions and powerful climaxes of the human soul. It typifies the despair which at that time had settled upon Beethoven and is a reflection of his melancholy and hopelessness.

The first movement resembles nothing previously written by the composer. It is majestic, sombre, and so curiously orchestrated as to be turbulent without being indistinct, a veritable conflict of emotions. The whole effect of this number is profoundly tragic, and many of the chords are dissonant and harsh. The scherzo which follows is genial, pleasant and melodious, and the closing adagio is a hymn of joy as pure and gladsome as musical literature can show.

The chorus is introduced by discordant phrases, and then the hymn of rejoicing peals forth.

The almost perfect "team" work of the orchestra was plainly apparent throughout this difficult composition. Some of the inharmonious measures were ear-splitting, but as they produced the effect intended by the composer criticism is silenced.

The audacious harmony of the first movement, with its intervening cross phrases, was played with electrical effect, strings, woodwinds and brasses performing the various parts with clearness and individuality of sentiment. The grand peroration by the brasses, accompanied by the tremolo of the strings, was also beautifully rendered.

In the lighter moods of the scherzo vivace the freshness and brilliancy of the performance was marked, and the finale was played with infinite grace and dreamy expression.

The introduction to the chorus was, as written, chaotic, and, as was said before, probably correctly interpreted.

The strange introduction for the double basses in the earlier part of the choral is a stumbling-block as a rule, and the rapid variation given to these instruments are almost unplayable. The men succeeded well, though, even if they did not attain the impossible.

The chorus was excellent, and sufficiently powerful to meet the demands of the composition, except when the whirlwind of dissonance furnished an accompaniment.

Miss White's soprano was clear and very true, and Mr. Meyn sang the baritone numbers very acceptably. Mr. Winch was not in perfect voice, but his artistic interpretation is not to be questioned. Miss Reiner's light contralto was pleasing, and she sang satisfactorily.

It was a grand performance of a great programme.

The next concert, Dec. 24, will be made up of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, concerto No. 2, in G minor, Tschaikousky and overture "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1892.

The Eighth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The "Ninth Symphony" Considered as a Stumbling Block.

Notes of Interest and Programmes of Coming Concerts.

The Programme of the eighth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, op. 93 } .....Beethoven
Symphony No. 9, op. 125 }

The orchestra was assisted by the Boston Symphony Chorus, which made its first appearance as an organization, and by Miss Priscilla White, soprano, Miss Louisa Leimer, contralto, Wm. J. Winch, tenor, and Heinrich Meyn, bass. Music Hall was crowded.

***

The programme book of the concert states that Beethoven was born Dec. 17, 1770. It is a pleasure to find a long-disputed point definitely and quietly settled here in our own town. To be sure the patient and accurate Victor Wilder, who had the advantage of the fruits of the labor of Alexander Wheelock Thayer, is more cautious in the matter. He only "permitted" himself to draw from certain facts "the inference" that Beethoven was born the 16th of December and baptized the 17th. The facts are these: First, Beethoven was baptized in the Church of Saint Remy in Bonn Dec. 17. Second, before the French Revolution such civil-records as marriages and births were only preserved in the parish registers. "In the eyes of the church the child did not enter into life until he was a Christian, and so only the date of baptism was recorded." It was the custom at Bonn to bear the child to the baptismal font the day after its birth.

The cautious Hugo Riemann says that Beethoven was born, "in all probability," the 16th. But it seems that in Boston we are cock-sure of the 17th as the birthday.

***

The programme-book contains the passage from Wagner's "Beethoven," and it is printed at length, in which Wagner tells how Beethoven "in the fullness of his own plenipotence" changed Schiller's word "streng" (sternly) to "frech" (impudently), and then exclaims, "Can anything be more significant than this act of passionate violence on the artist's part? We think to see before us Luther in his wrath against the Pope."

Of course the word "frech" appealed irresistibly to the vain and arrogant Wagner. Unfortunately, however, he erred in the premises. Beethoven made no such change. In the autograph copy he wrote "streng." A copyist made the foolish blunder that seemed to Wagner an inspiration of Beethoven.

***

We are all familiar with the performance of the Eighth Symphony by the orchestra under the present administration. To again deplore the lack of delicacy in the treatment of the allegretto, the too frequent anticipation of the climax in other movements, the tendency to tear subdued passion to tatters, is perhaps an unnecessary task. On the other hand, it would be unjust to deny the legitimate effect of certain readings of the conductor.

***

But the Ninth Symphony is not so familiar to our concert goers. Its last performance in this city before the concert of Saturday evening was, if I am not mistaken, April 28, 1888, under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The singers on that occasion were Mrs. Kalisch-Lehmann, Miss Louise Meisslinger, and Messrs Kalisch and Fischer.

The difficulties of this symphony are known to all. They are so great that the question often arises, "in view of the almost inevitable failure, is the attempt of performance worth the while?"

When the Ninth Symphony was given in 1841 at a concert of the Paris Conservatory, Rossini on leaving the hall said to Ferdinand Hiller: "I know nothing more beautiful than the scherzo of this symphony. I could not have made a scherzo like it." For this speech, the tribute of one genius to another, Rossini has stood as the target for sneers; and why? Because he added these words: "The rest of the symphony is wanting in charm; the music does not get there." And if we were not under the spell of a great name, would we not agree in substance with Rossini?

***

Let us suppose, for instance, that an American musician, or an unknown Frenchman, should write the finale of the Ninth Symphony and bring it to a conductor of to-day, and that it should be seen for the first time. Would any conductor in this country put it in rehearsal? Is it not probable that he would look with pity on the young composer and say unto him, "My dear young friend, you must first learn the art of writing for the human voice. There are no singers who could possibly bring out the effects that you demand, and I am not sure that your effects would all be worth the trouble if giant singers were trained expressly for your purpose. The passage, 'Before God the cherub stands,' with its fermata is noble, and I admit that here and there are evidences of great talent if not absolute genius. But your chief theme strikes me as unworthy, and no better than any joyous ditty of the Salvation Army. Your march does not impress me. Your quick movements, if the indicated pace must be maintained, will bring rack and ruin to choral dignity or choral effect of any kind. Nor do I find the instrumentation of this finale in any way remarkable. I advise you to study the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th symphonies of Beethoven."

***

And yet what songs of blind adoration have been chanted at the mere mention of this finale! We are told that "excellence of the highest kind without obscurity cannot exist." We are told that only an absolutely deaf genius could have heard such marvellous strains. It is true that Beethoven was so deaf that he could only see the stormy applause that greeted him when this symphony was first produced. This performance was in 1824. But he was deaf in 1802 when he wrote his pathetic "Will," in which he spoke of the tortures inflicted upon him by his physical infirmity. The "Heroic" symphony, the C minor, the Pastorale, the 7th, were also the work of a deaf man.

***

Some warm admirers of this finale say: "It is true that the vocal passages are almost unsingable, and the actual performance is almost always a terror to the ear, but you must imagine how gloriously they would sound if they could be sung."

***

Others agree with the painter, Eugène Delacroix: "In presence of these grand [illegible] lar productions, still obscure and perhaps destined to remain so for ever, artists, men of the profession, hesitate in pronouncing a fit judgment, but if you remember that the works of the second period of Beethoven were at first regarded as undecipherable and are now acknowledged masterpieces, I should say that he were right, even though it were against my opinion, and I should again believe that it is always safe to bet on genius." That is to say, if out of the collection of Beethoven's compositions you happen to find anything that appears disagreeable, trivial or incomprehensible, you should nevertheless bet that it is sublime, for Beethoven was a genius. Now, this is rank fetichism.

***

The performance Saturday evening of the first three movements of the symphony was in many respects highly creditable to the conductor and the orchestra. There was a praiseworthy attempt in the first movement to preserve the sustained pianissimo which, as played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, excited the admiration of Wagner to such a degree that he preserved the memory of his wonder in his pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren." The lightness and the elasticity of the scherzo were admirably brought out by the strings, and the performance of the scherzo was all in all the feature of the evening. On the contrary, the adagio seemed devoid of genuine feeling, and the work of the wood-wind could not always be commended for its purity or precision. It may be said of the instrumental members that a sincere attempt to realize grand effects was often crowned with success. Whether the effects of the composer are really grand—that is another question so far as the first, third and fourth movements are concerned.

***

The finale was a vocal failure. Of the solo singers Mr. Meyn acquitted himself bravely of his stentorian task. The others made an heroic struggle. The chorus was drowned in the waves of orchestral fury. Here and there a soprano head appeared, gasping above the billows. To judge of the character of the Boston Symphony Chorus from the performance of Saturday evening would be unfair, even if it were possible. Nor would it be just to speak in detail of the singing of Miss White or of Miss Leimer. The task that was presented to the chorus and the quartette was one that strikes terror to the stoutest singer.

***

The programme of the rehearsal and the concert of this week will be as follows: Symphony, A major, Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major, Tschaikowsky; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

The Public Ledger of Philadelphia the 8th inst. spoke in these flattering words of Mr. Busoni, the celebrated pianist and composer. The occasion was a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music:

"Ferruccio Busoni achieved a triumph. He played Liszt's No. 2 pianoforte concerto in a way that stirred the admiration of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color."

It is a pleasure to announce that Mr. Busoni will give four recitals in Music Hall in January.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1892.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch introduced a novelty in the Boston Symphony chorus. The programme was quite long, and the two symphonies of Beethoven, No. 8 in F major and No. 9 in D minor, were just a little wearisome and monotonous. The reading of the various movements was generally satisfactory, the allegretto scherzando in the eighth symphony being delightfully played, with delicacy and finish, and was the gem of the evening.

The chorus showed that Mr. Nikisch has brought together a remarkably strong body of singers, capable of doing admirable work under more favorable circumstances. Saturday evening both singers and musicians were huddled together and under these disadvantages it is not strange that the work was at times unsatisfactory. There was something lacking toward making the choral feature of the programme a success. The soloists were in good voice and are worthy of high praise. Mr. Meyer sang with great spirit, his enunciation being very distinct, while his pure voice was handled in a most artistic manner. Miss Priscilla White acquitted herself most brilliantly. Her high notes were well sustained, and she created a favorable impression. Mr. Winch was also good in the numbers assigned him. Mr. Nikisch's equanimity must have been severely tested during the choral part of the ninth symphony. Perched on top of several boxes, he was called upon to exercise his greatest skill to keep his musicians together. Under many conductors his forces would have gone to pieces, but Mr. Nikisch's work has always been of such high order that one is not surprised to see him do almost impossible things. It is to be hoped that the Symphony Chorus may be heard again in connection with the Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSIC.

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The observance of Beethoven's birthday at the symphony concert last evening was not so wholly appropriate as it should have been made. The composer's eighth symphony, with which the concert opened, has long been known as the "Kleine Sinfonie," or to state the plain English of it, unfair and irreverent though it may sound, it is "the little symphony"—yet its littleness is often noble. Not all nobility is of huge proportions. Art is quality, not quantity. True enough this "little" eighth symphony is as full of life and genius, aye 'tis e'en as full of humor as though it were a poem by Holmes. It is as clear an inspiration, as light and buoyant, as bright and full of grace as anything by Mozart or Haydn. It is the shortest and while never cloying, it is the sweetest of the "Nine." Here, too, is Beethoven's "clock" symphony. The allegretto has a swing so pendulum-like that even by the tick, tick, tick of the accompaniment it recalls that quaint old-time piece, the andante of the "clock" symphony, by Haydn. It seems inexplicable how a work so full of melody, so fairly ear catching in its every bar, yet in the truest sense of the term a work of art, could have dated from the master's saddest period, namely after he became deaf.

The culmination of Beethoven's deafness was at this time; but here surely there can be found not the slightest evidence that the master did not retain, and without the slightest diminution, that genius and creative power, that incomparable capacity for taking pains, and that mastery of his tone-art, which were all Beethoven's, aye though all save death, and e'en the world, the flesh and the devil did assault and try in vain to tear them asunder. But the handwriting was on the wall; the cold "blast of the breath of His displeasure" had been heard, and the dawn of the Day of Doom that included the ninth symphony was at hand. The master was being impelled to his ultimate goal even by his bodily constitution; the sins of the father had paid their damning visit. His deafness slowly but mercilessly separated him from mankind; he was as one banished.

When the ninth symphony was first performed in Vienna May 7, 1824, the Mass in D was also performed.

Umlauf was the conductor. Mlle. Ungher, afterwards Mme. Sabatier, sang one of the solo parts. It would have been historically appropriate of Mr. Nikisch to have reproduced the programme of this concert and to have substituted for the eighth symphony the Mass in D.

The second performance of the work was at the Philharmonic concert in London, March 21, 1825, when Mme. Caradori, Miss Goodhall, Mr. Vaughn and Mr. Philips were the singers and Sir George Smart conducted.

Alexander Teetgen's estimate of the choral (?) symphony would appear after all to be the correct one. True enough. Beethoven's design for the work was colossally grand; "he wished to strive to paint what painting could not, and what sculpture could not," but it is difficult not to believe that the pessimism of his later years worked a fatal amount of disaster. Despite what was said concerning the eighth symphony, when he came to write the "ninth" he betrayed a certain poverty of spirit. It betrayed itself in tones. True he retained his technique and manifested it in the richness of his orchestral effects, and in a flexible management of modulations, but further in what else? No one can gainsay the fact that rude, and detestable violence has been done the vocal parts of the ninth symphony, came not from the talented and perspiring singers who struggled so eagerly to accomplish the impossible last evening. Far from it. Treason and sacrilege though it may be to say as much, the culprit in chief has been and ever will be Beethoven. It is he who has been the first and among the greatest to wage war with the vocal elements of art. His vocal bass is naught but a bassoon; his tenor is a 'cello; his contralto, a viola; his soprano almost anything but a vox humana. Poor, rich Beethoven; yes and happy Beethoven, for he was made deaf before he heard (?) the performance of his choral symphony. In what part of this colossal piece of pessimism is the composer of Adelaide? The Eroica is in some measure responsible for it all. The form of the work is cast in much the same mould; but a heart enshrouded with gloom, an individualism permeated with despair, and what is more unfortunate for any work of art a veritable soul-cynicism that is simply garrulous in its mode of expression; all this cannot easily be mistaken, as lying at the basis of as lugubrious and prolix a symphony as ever a master penned. Truly "it was Beethoven's hand that guided it, but not his genius." The performance of the work last evening was creditable to the chorus; but the impossible did not happen and the effect of ensemble singing as a whole was but slightly less horrible than it has been on former occasions with the same symphony. The bassos whenever an opportunity presented itself for natural vocalism gave forth an uncommonly rich and sonorous quality of tone; while the altos, tenors and sopranos were simply faithful and heroic in their attempt to master the vocal impossibilities of the score. The attempt was a dismal, dreary failure; and the verdict must again be rendered that the vocal parts of the ninth symphony are hopelessly unsingable.

Of the soloists Miss Priscilla White has naturally the voice of a light soprano and while creditably painstaking and energetic in her attempt to overcome the manifold difficulties of the part so unwisely assigned her she was by no means successful. Mr. William Winch and Heinrich Meyn both sang admirably, and the contralto, Miss Louisa Leimer, was excellent. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the work was intensely dramatic and the dynamic suggestions of the score were quite evenly exaggerated throughout the performance.

The eighth symphony was played in a coarse and slovenly manner that was immeasurably below the standard of the orchestra's best work.

[64]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 18, 1892.

The Symphony concert programme in Music hall last evening was: Beethoven, symphony No. 8 in F. major, opds 93; Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), opus 125. The solo parts were sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

SECOND ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second Adamowski quartette concert, at which Mr. William H. Sherwood, pianist, will assist, will be given in Chickering hall on Tuesday next, Dec. 20, at three o'clock. The programme will consist of the following numbers:

Mendelssohn. Trio, D minor, op. 49.
Molto allegro agitato.
Andante con moto tranquillo.
Scherzo.
Finale.
Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Sherwood.
Beethoven. Quartette, F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.
Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.
Adagio molto e mesto.
Allegro (theme russe.)
Grieg. Piano and 'Cello Sonata, A minor, op. 36.
Allegro agitato.
Andante molto tranquillo.
Allegro.
Mr. Joseph Adamowski and Mr. Sherwood.

The Mason & Hamlin grand piano will be used.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 18, 1892.

Symphony Orchestra Offers Beethoven Programme.

Mr. Nikisch offered a Beethoven programme at the ninth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the works selected being No. 8, known as the "little symphony," and the ninth or choral symphony. In the latter composition the orchestra was assisted by the newly-organized chorus and Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, soloists.

The charming eighth symphony appeals strongly to the popular taste, for its melodic form and delicate instrumentation is simpler than in the ninth, and to an uncultivated musical ear the former work is really the more enjoyable.

The first movement is of a sweet and gentle character, which is suddenly interrupted by a sad motif breaking in upon the joyous song.

The second, allegreto scherzando, introduces a crisp dialogue, as it were, between the violins and basses, an effect whose beauty has few if any equals in orchestral writing. A dainty minuet follows and a lively finale closes the composition, a peculiar and, to many, a commonplace ending being given to the piece, as if Beethoven had finished the work in haste and without a revision.

The magnificent work of the string contingent was noticeable in this number and the "conversation" between the woodwinds, basses and violins in the second movement was not only played artistically, but its quaintness brought an involuntary smile to the face of every auditor

The ninth, the grandest of all the master's compositions, is peculiar in being a combination of vocal and instrumental music. Prior to writing this last symphony Beethoven had written a choral fantasie in which a chorus was employed in the finale: but the ninth is on a much grander scale, and this musical poem is universally conceded to be the most magnificent expression of the great musician's genius.

The vocal finale is founded upon Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and Beethoven is said to have had the idea of writing a score from this poem in his mind for 30 years.

The symphony is a masterpiece, a combination of the gentlest emotions and powerful climaxes of the human soul. It typifies the despair which at that time had settled upon Beethoven and is a reflection of his melancholy and hopelessness.

The first movement resembles nothing previously written by the composer. It is majestic, sombre, and so curiously orchestrated as to be turbulent without being indistinct, a veritable conflict of emotions. The whole effect of this number is profoundly tragic, and many of the chords are dissonant and harsh. The scherzo which follows is genial, pleasant and melodious, and the closing adagio is a hymn of joy as pure and gladsome as musical literature can show.

The chorus is introduced by discordant phrases, and then the hymn of rejoicing peals forth.

The almost perfect "team" work of the orchestra was plainly apparent throughout this difficult composition. Some of the inharmonious measures were ear-splitting, but as they produced the effect intended by the composer criticism is silenced.

The audacious harmony of the first movement, with its intervening cross phrases, was played with electrical effect, strings, woodwinds and brasses performing the various parts with clearness and individuality of sentiment. The grand peroration by the brasses, accompanied by the tremolo of the strings, was also beautifully rendered.

In the lighter moods of the scherzo vivace the freshness and brilliancy of the performance was marked, and the finale was played with infinite grace and dreamy expression.

The introduction to the chorus was, as written, chaotic, and, as was said before, probably correctly interpreted.

The strange introduction for the double basses in the earlier part of the choral is a stumbling-block as a rule, and the rapid variation given to these instruments are almost unplayable. The men succeeded well, though, even if they did not attain the impossible.

The chorus was excellent, and sufficiently powerful to meet the demands of the composition, except when the whirlwind of dissonance furnished an accompaniment.

Miss White's soprano was clear and very true, and Mr. Meyn sang the barytone numbers very acceptably. Mr. Winch was not in perfect voice, but his artistic interpretation is not to be questioned. Miss Reiner's light contralto was pleasing, and she sang satisfactorily.

It was a grand performance of a great programme.

The next concert, Dec. 24, will be made up of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, concerto No. 2, in G minor, Tschaikousky and overture "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1892.

The Eighth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The "Ninth Symphony" Considered as a Stumbling Block.

Notes of Interest and Programmes of Coming Concerts.

The Programme of the eighth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, op. 93 }
Symphony No. 9, op. 125 } .....Beethoven

The orchestra was assisted by the Boston Symphony Chorus, which made its first appearance as an organization, and by Miss Priscilla White, soprano, Miss Louisa Leimer, contralto, Wm. J. Winch, tenor, and Heinrich Meyn, bass. Music Hall was crowded.

***

The programme book of the concert states that Beethoven was born Dec. 17, 1770. It is a pleasure to find a long-disputed point definitely and quietly settled here in our own town. To be sure the patient and accurate Victor Wilder, who had the advantage of the fruits of the labor of Alexander Wheelock Thayer, is more cautious in the matter. He only "permitted" himself to draw from certain facts "the inference" that Beethoven was born the 16th of December and baptized the 17th. The facts are these: First, Beethoven was baptized in the Church of Saint Remy in Bonn Dec. 17. Second, before the French Revolution such civil records as marriages and births were only preserved in the parish registers. "In the eyes of the church the child did not enter into life until he was a Christian, and so only the date of baptism was recorded." It was the custom at Bonn to bear the child to the baptismal font the day after its birth.

The cautious Hugo Riemann says that Beethoven was born, "in all probability," the 16th. But it seems that in Boston we are cock-sure of the 17th as the birthday.

***

The programme-book contains the passage from Wagner's "Beethoven," and it is printed at length, in which Wagner tells how Beethoven "in the fullness of his own plenipotence" changed Schiller's word "streng" (sternly) to "frech" (impudently), and then exclaims, "Can anything be more significant than this act of passionate violence on the artist's part? We think to see before us Luther in his wrath against the Pope."

Of course the word "frech" appealed irresistibly to the vain and arrogant Wagner. Unfortunately, however, he erred in the premises. Beethoven made no such change. In the autograph copy he wrote "streng." A copyist made the foolish blunder that seemed to Wagner an inspiration of Beethoven.

***

We are all familiar with the performance of the Eighth Symphony by the orchestra under the present administration. To again deplore the lack of delicacy in the treatment of the allegretto, the too frequent anticipation of the climax in other movements, the tendency to tear subdued passion to tatters, is perhaps an unnecessary task. On the other hand, it would be unjust to deny the legitimate effect of certain readings of the conductor.

***

But the Ninth Symphony is not so familiar to our concert goers. Its last performance in this city before the concert of Saturday evening was, if I am not mistaken, April 28, 1888, under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The singers on that occasion were Mrs. Kalisch-Lehmann, Miss Louise Meisslinger, and Messrs Kalisch and Fischer.

The difficulties of this symphony are known to all. They are so great that the question often arises, "in view of the almost inevitable failure, is the attempt of performance worth the while?"

When the Ninth Symphony was given in 1841 at a concert of the Paris Conservatory, Rossini on leaving the hall said to Ferdinand Hiller: "I know nothing more beautiful than the scherzo of this symphony. I could not have made a scherzo like it." For this speech, the tribute of one genius to another, Rossini has stood as the target for sneers; and why? Because he added these words: "The rest of the symphony is wanting in charm; the music does not 'get there.'" And if we were not under the spell of a great name, would we not agree in substance with Rossini?

***

Let us suppose, for instance, that an American musician, or an unknown Frenchman, should write the finale of the Ninth Symphony and bring it to a conductor of to-day, and that it should be seen for the first time. Would any conductor in this country put it in rehearsal? Is it not probable that he would look with pity on the young composer and say unto him, "My dear young friend, you must first learn the art of writing for the human voice. There are no singers who could possibly bring out the effects that you demand, and I am not sure that your effects would all be worth the trouble if giant singers were trained expressly for your purpose. The passage, 'Before God the cherub stands,' with its fermata is noble, and I admit that here and there are evidences of great talent if not absolute genius. But your chief theme strikes me as unworthy, and no better than any joyous ditty of the Salvation Army. Your march does not impress me. Your quick movements, if the indicated pace must be maintained, will bring rack and ruin to choral dignity or choral effect of any kind. Nor do I find the instrumentation of this finale in any way remarkable. I advise you to study the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th symphonies of Beethoven."

***

And yet what songs of blind adoration have been chanted at the mere mention of this finale! We are told that "excellence of the highest kind without obscurity cannot exist." We are told that only an absolutely deaf genius could have heard such marvellous strains. It is true that Beethoven was so deaf that he could only see the stormy applause that greeted him when this symphony was first produced. This performance was in 1824. But he was deaf in 1802 when he wrote his pathetic "Will," in which he spoke of the tortures inflicted upon him by his physical infirmity. The "Heroic" symphony, the C minor, the Pastorale, the 7th, were also the work of a deaf man.

***

Some warm admirers of this finale say: "It is true that the vocal passages are almost unsingable, and the actual performance is almost always a terror to the ear, but you must imagine how gloriously they would sound if they could be sung."

***

Others agree with the painter, Eugene Delacroix: "In presence of these grand and singular productions, still obscure and perhaps destined to remain so for ever, artists, men of the profession, hesitate in pronouncing a fit judgment, but if you remember that the works of the second period of Beethoven were at first regarded as undecipherable and are now acknowledged masterpieces, I should say that he were right, even though it were against my opinion, and I should again believe that it is always safe to bet on genius." That is to say, if out of the collection of Beethoven's compositions you happen to find anything that appears disagreeable, trivial or incomprehensible, you should nevertheless bet that it is sublime, for Beethoven was a genius. Now, this is rank fetichism.

***

The performance Saturday evening of the first three movements of the symphony was in many respects highly creditable to the conductor and the orchestra. There was a praiseworthy attempt in the first movement to preserve the sustained pianissimo which, as played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, excited the admiration of Wagner to such a degree that he preserved the memory of his wonder in his pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren." The lightness and the elasticity of the scherzo were admirably brought out by the strings, and the performance of the scherzo was all in all the feature of the evening. On the contrary, the adagio seemed devoid of genuine feeling, and the work of the wood-wind could not always be commended for its purity or precision. It may be said of the instrumental members that a sincere attempt to realize grand effects was often crowned with success. Whether the effects of the composer are really grand—that is another question so far as the first, third and fourth movements are concerned.

***

The finale was a vocal failure. Of the solo singers Mr. Meyn acquitted himself bravely of his stentorian task. The others made an heroic struggle. The chorus was drowned in the waves of orchestral fury. Here and there a soprano head appeared, gasping above the billows. To judge of the character of the Boston Symphony Chorus from the performance of Saturday evening would be unfair, even if it were possible. Nor would it be just to speak in detail of the singing of Miss White or of Miss Leimer. The task that was presented to the chorus and the quartette was one that strikes terror to the stoutest singer.

***

The programme of the rehearsal and the concert of this week will be as follows: Symphony, A major, Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major, Tschaikowsky; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

The Public Ledger of Philadelphia the 8th inst. spoke in these flattering words of Mr. Busoni, the celebrated pianist and composer. The occasion was a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music:

"Ferruccio Busoni achieved a triumph. He played Liszt's No. 2 pianoforte concerto in a way that stirred the admiration of the audience to a decided degree of enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color."

It is a pleasure to announce that Mr. Busoni will give four recitals in Music Hall in January.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1892.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch introduced a novelty in the Boston Symphony chorus. The programme was quite long, and the two symphonies of Beethoven, No. 8 in F major and No. 9 in D minor, were just a little wearisome and monotonous. The reading of the various movements was generally satisfactory, the allegretto scherzando in the eighth symphony being delightfully played, with delicacy and finish, and was the gem of the evening.

The chorus showed that Mr. Nikisch has brought together a remarkably strong body of singers, capable of doing admirable work under more favorable circumstances. Saturday evening both singers and musicians were huddled together and under these disadvantages it is not strange that the work was at times unsatisfactory. There was something lacking toward making the choral feature of the programme a success. The soloists were in good voice and are worthy of high praise. Mr. Meyer sang with great spirit, his enunciation being very distinct, while his pure voice was handled in a most artistic manner. Miss Priscilla White acquitted herself most brilliantly. Her high notes were well sustained, and she created a favorable impression. Mr. Winch was also good in the numbers assigned him. Mr. Nikisch's equanimity must have been severely tested during the choral part of the ninth symphony. Perched on top of several boxes, he was called upon to exercise his greatest skill to keep his musicians together. Under many conductors his forces would have gone to pieces, but Mr. Nikisch's work has always been of such high order that one is not surprised to see him do almost impossible things. It is to be hoped that the Symphony Chorus may be heard again in connection with the Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSIC.

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The observance of Beethoven's birthday at the symphony concert last evening was not so wholly appropriate as it should have been made. The composer's eighth symphony, with which the concert opened, has long been known as the "Kleine Sinfonie," or to state the plain English of it, unfair and irreverent though it may sound, it is "the little symphony"—yet its littleness is often noble. Not all nobility is of huge proportions. Art is quality, not quantity. True enough this "little" eighth symphony is as full of life and genius, aye 'tis e'en as full of humor as though it were a poem by Holmes. It is as clear an inspiration, as light and buoyant, as bright and full of grace as anything by Mozart or Haydn. It is the shortest and while never cloying, it is the sweetest of the "Nine." Here, too, is Beethoven's "clock" symphony. The allegretto has a swing so pendulum-like that even by the tick, tick, tick of the accompaniment it recalls that quaint old-time piece, the andante of the "clock" symphony, by Haydn. It seems inexplicable how a work so full of melody, so fairly ear catching in its every bar, yet in the truest sense of the term a work of art, could have dated from the master's saddest period, namely after he became deaf.

The culmination of Beethoven's deafness was at this time; but here surely there can be found not the slightest evidence that the master did not retain, and without the slightest diminution, that genius and creative power, that incomparable capacity for taking pains, and that mastery of his tone-art, which were all Beethoven's, aye though all save death, and e'en the world, the flesh and the devil did assault and try in vain to tear them asunder. But the handwriting was on the wall; the cold "blast of the breath of His displeasure" had been heard, and the dawn of the Day of Doom that included the ninth symphony was at hand. The master was being impelled to his ultimate goal even by his bodily constitution; the sins of the father had paid their damning visit. His deafness slowly but mercilessly separated him from mankind; he was as one banished.

When the ninth symphony was first performed in Vienna May 7, 1824, the Mass in D was also performed.

Umlauf was the conductor. Mlle. Ungher, afterwards Mme. Sabatier, sang one of the solo parts. It would have been historically appropriate of Mr. Nikisch to have reproduced the programme of this concert and to have substituted for the eighth symphony the Mass in D.

The second performance of the work was at the Philharmonic concert in London, March 21, 1825, when Mme. Caradori, Miss Goodhall, Mr. Vaughn and Mr. Philips were the singers and Sir George Smart conducted.

Alexander Teetgen's estimate of the choral (?) symphony would appear after all to be the correct one. True enough. Beethoven's design for the work was colossally grand; "he wished to strive to paint what painting could not, and what sculpture could not," but it is difficult not to believe that the pessimism of his later years worked a fatal amount of disaster. Despite what was said concerning the eighth symphony, when he came to write the "ninth" he betrayed a certain poverty of spirit. It betrayed itself in tones. True he retained his technique and manifested it in the richness of his orchestral effects, and in a flexible management of modulations, but further in what else? No one can gainsay the fact that rude, and detestable violence has been done the vocal parts of the ninth symphony, came not from the talented and perspiring singers who struggled so eagerly to accomplish the impossible last evening. Far from it. Treason and sacrilege though it may be to say as much, the culprit in chief has been and ever will be Beethoven. It is he who has been the first and among the greatest to wage war with the vocal elements of art. His vocal bass is naught but a bassoon; his tenor is a 'cello; his contralto, a viola; his soprano almost anything but a vox humana. Poor, rich Beethoven; yes and happy Beethoven, for he was made deaf before he heard (?) the performance of his choral symphony. In what part of this colossal piece of pessimism is the composer of Adelaide? The Eroica is in some measure responsible for it all. The form of the work is cast in much the same mould; but a heart enshrouded with gloom, an individualism permeated with despair, and what is more unfortunate for any work of art a veritable soul-cynicism that is simply garrulous in its mode of expression; all this cannot easily be mistaken, as lying at the basis of as lugubrious and prolix a symphony as ever a master penned. Truly "it was Beethoven's hand that guided it, but not his genius." The performance of the work last evening was creditable to the chorus; but the impossible did not happen and the effect of ensemble singing as a whole was but slightly less horrible than it has been on former occasions with the same symphony. The bassos whenever an opportunity presented itself for natural vocalism gave forth an uncommonly rich and sonorous quality of tone; while the altos, tenors and sopranos were simply faithful and heroic in their attempt to master the vocal impossibilities of the score. The attempt was a dismal, dreary failure; and the verdict must again be rendered that the vocal parts of the ninth symphony are hopelessly unsingable.

Of the soloists Miss Priscilla White has naturally the voice of a light soprano and while creditably painstaking and energetic in her attempt to overcome the manifold difficulties of the part so unwisely assigned her she was by no means successful. Mr. William Winch and Heinrich Meyn both sang admirably, and the contralto, Miss Louisa Leimer, was excellent. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the work was intensely dramatic and the dynamic suggestions of the score were quite evenly exaggerated throughout the performance.

The eighth symphony was played in a coarse and slovenly manner that was immeasurably below the standard of the orchestra's best work.

[64]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 19, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY DULY RECOGNIZED

And Appropriately Celebrated at Saturday's Concert—Two of the Master's Symphonies, the Eighth and Ninth Produced—The Most Playful Used as a Foil to the Grandest.

Beethoven's birthday was most appropriately celebrated at Saturday's concert by the performance of two of his symphonies. It is always a problem how to introduce the ninth symphony in a concert programme. It is sure to dwarf anything that is placed in juxtaposition with it, and it is not sufficient in itself to constitute the entire concert. Since it is, in a large degree, a tone-poem of liberty, such a work as the "Egmont" overture might precede it to advantage (of course no musical work dare follow it), or, because it is the most dramatic instrumental work in symphonic form, the most dramatic of overtures, "Leonora," No 3, might fittingly usher it in. On this occasion, however, our conductor's great love of contrast led to a different arrangement. The shortest of the nine was given as offset to the vastest, the most playful symphony became a foil to the grandest. If ever a work deserved the title of "the humorous symphony," Beethoven's eighth does. Yet Beethoven's humor was not of the dainty Mendelssohnian order, and there is much of brusqueness and biazarrerie in the work. These points were splendidly brought out in the performance. The odd caperings of the bassoon, the quaint figure on the kettle-drums in the last movement, the dialogue between the violins and the contrabasses in the second movement, the sudden and intentionally prosaic end of the same allegretto, and the grotesque skip from flute to contrabass (from garret to cellar of the orchestra) in the finale, were all perfectly executed. But one did not feel just in the mood for grandeur after so much of playfulness, although the breadth of the contrast was undeniable. Yet in one point the eighth symphony approaches the ninth; in both, the composer has given the humbler instruments some prominence; the contrabasses become obbligato instruments and the kettle-drums have great prominence in both symphonies.

The ninth symphony had points of great merit and important defect in this performance. The first movement came with almost the force of a revelation. In previous performances in Boston our conductors have refined too much in this portion of the work and have polished the rugged grandeur of the composition away altogether. This time all the virility was intact, and the massive character of the movement never had better inter retation. No symphony in the world shows more clearly what a great composer can do with rhythm, and, as if to accentuate this fact, Beethoven uses the simplest possible figures in the first two movements; in the first movement the figure is an empty fifth (and it may be here mentioned that Wagner has used precisely the same figure, inverted, as the motif of "The Flying Dutchman"), and in the scherzo the simplest figure possible, an octave, is used as the chief thematic material. The peculiar beginning of the first movement, where the auditor wanders in a fog, not recognizing any definite key, and only hearing a rhythmic figure, was excellently performed, and the powerful entrance of the chief theme, finally establishing the key of D minor, was like a sunburst. The contrast of the second theme, with its more delicate wood wind work, was equally successful, and the force of the closing theme was quite in place. But the greatest effect of this allegro was made in the coda, where that wonderful crescendo, chiefly of strings and bassoons, a chromatic surging like an ocean storm, was performed in a noble style. The horn did excellent work in the coda, and in fact each and every player seemed inspired by the beauty and loftiness of the work. The scherzo deserved praise for its spirited manner, and it is safe to say that it has never had a more dashing performance here. But the balance of parts was not perfect, and the marked three-noted figure (the octave aforesaid) was by no means always audible where it should have been, only the kettle-drum giving it forth with a startling emphasis, that at least restored the average. As this figure is frequently the key to the coherency of the work, particularly where it punctuates the three and four-barred rhythms, and where it forms a drone-bass to the theme, its obliteration, even occasionally, was a serious fault. But the performance of the wind instruments in the Trio was magnificent in spite of the almost impossible tempo which was taken, and the sudden and impetuous ending of the Coda was given with commendable unity.

The brilliancy of the performance here atoned for the shortcomings noticed above. Not so, however, in the adagio, where the first theme was sentimentalized in a manner that spoiled the finest part of the work. The tempo was taken too slow, and a tropical languor hung over everything in a manner that was anything but the style of Beethoven.

The finale had some serious faults. The fierce and dissonant cry with which it begins was finely presented. It seems a few decades too late to give a commentary on Beethoven, yet one may venture to question whether Berlioz understood what the master intended in this introduction to the choral part of the work. Schiller's words, which he used, may give us the clue to the secret. Beethoven is here picturing, or is about to picture, the era of universal love and brotherhood; before he begins this tone-poem of joy however, he heightens the effect by contrast; the fierce dissonance which begins the work, and which Berlioz characterizes as a "cry of wrath," is but the cry of agony of a tortured world; the crime, suffering, and misery of mankind are in it. The contrabasses rebuke the tumult as if the voice of a higher power were promising relief;—the most wonderful instrumental dialogue in the whole realm of instrumental music. Of course the contrabass passages also serve to prepare for the entrance of the choral and solo parts, and the very phrase which appears on the contrabasses afterwards is given to the solo bass-singer. But the Berlioz suggestion that when this bass [illegible] succeeds the final dissonances of the [illegible] with "Let us sing pleasanter [illegible] by a queer [illegible] music."

as one of the finest commentaries in the history of musical criticism. He meant to bid adieu to strife and contention and wretchedness, and herald a newer and brighter epoch. Before the epoch of joy he pictures the era of sorrow,—that is all.

One may earnestly remonstrate with the spirit which led to a sweetening and retarding of the passages for the contrabasses (the noblest passages ever written for the instrument) for these phrases, scarcely less than the voice of a redeemer, became rather the gentle sentences of a lover. The chief theme, on which the subsequent variations are founded, was well given by the contrabasses and cellos. It bears a distinct resemblance to an American melody, and one can coincide with the remark of an eminent Bostonian, made on the occasion of the first performance of the work in this city: "That the ninth symphony! Why its only glorified 'Yankee Doodle'"! The point was well taken, for the melody is not unlike our own, but it has one characteristic which is not present so clearly in "Yankee Doodle." It is almost wholly in conjunct movement, moving by single steps, and not by skips—a characteristic of "God Save the Queen" and almost every other truly national theme. It could readily be sung by thousands of untutored singers, as was Luther and Franc's hymn, "Ein Feste Burg," and, in fact, in its sacred metamorphosis into "Rise my soul and stretch thy wings" in modern hymnals, it is found one of the most singable of themes. But in the subsequent variations it is anything but singable, and truth demands the statement that it was very raggedly sung. The quartette, consisting of Misses Priscilla White and Louisa Leimer and Messrs. William J. Winch and Heinrich Meyn, were generally adequate, although at times the soprano was spasmodic in execution, but the chorus was a continual blur. Two points may here be pleaded in extenuation; the work is emphatically unvocal, and the pitch of today is higher than when Beethoven wrote his merciless high passages. Two lined C in 1823-4 had about 512 vibrations, whereas now, even in our international (lowered) pitch, it has 517 3-10 vibrations. In summing up, then, one can state that the two last movements have been better given, but the scherzo may be classed as successful, while the first movement was overwhelmingly great.

It is always an event for Boston to hear the ninth symphony, and it should be an especially welcome work in America, for liberty and human equality were glowing ideals in Beethoven's soul, and the result of his yearnings toward these were the finale of the Egmont overture, the Heroic symphony, and finally this lofty song of universal happiness.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Choral), Opus 125.

Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn were the singers.

A wonderful programme! Here was a chance to drink one's fill of great music unmixed with baser stuff. There are still some people left, to be sure, who do not like the finale of the Ninth Symphony; and it must be admitted that many of the arguments advanced against it are both pertinent and true. The voices are treated with all Beethoven's recklessness; much of the contrapuntal writing is singularly unvocal in character; it may be even doubted whether any chorus ever has been or ever will be brought together really able to sing the choral parts thoroughly well. The work is not essentially impossible, but a thoroughly fine performance of it is virtually impracticable. One can even say that, looked at from the highest artistic point of view, it is in a sense an æsthetically immoral work: to treat singers and their voices with this cruelty has undeniably a tinge of artistic immorality. But, with and in spite of all this, it is a great and glorious work. As far as we are concerned, all the arguments against it appeal to our reason only; they have never had the slightest convincing force over our feelings. We understand them, we are bound to admit their theoretical validity, but they do not lessen our delight in the work one whit! To us it is still the most enjoyable, thrilling and emotionally inspiring composition in existence—the one which carries us away more than any other. Say as much as you please about the monstrosity of Beethoven's high writing for the voices, of the impossibility of his voice-parts being well sung; to our ear the effect of these high passages, even when only approximately well sung, is so superb, so incomparably thrilling, that we would not have one of them changed or struck out. No other work reduces us so completely to the mental attitude of the mere irresponsible amateur, whose only reply tprofessional objections is: "It may be all wrong, but it gets there all the same!" We have already said that this finale is an immoral work. But when objections take the shape of asserting the want of distinction or the "vulgarity" of the theme to the "Hymn to Joy," then we deny their validity in toto. We say right out that, both to our instinctive and to our reflective musical sense, this melody is one of the most superb Beethoven ever wrote; there is genius in every measure of it. It is simple without poverty, exalted in character without turgidity, it exactly befits the state of feeling into which Schiller's poetry throws one. The development of this glorious theme, first in the orchestra, then in the voices, has all the splendor, the beauty, artistic symmetry and elevation, in a word all the "Heiterkeit" of a Greek frieze. And how absolutely individual in manner it all is! The working up of the theme in three and four parts for strings and a single bassoon shows a wholly new departure in counterpoint; both in respect to harmony and to the leading of the parts it is unprecedented as it is still unimitated. Another striking point in this finale is the composer's superb confidence in himself. Beethoven must have known perfectly well that he was here doing many things in a way that, in other hands, had heretofore shown itself to be trivial and undignified; but he had the great genius's complete assurance of his own dignity, the certainty that, do what he would, he could not be undignified. He thus wrote with aristocratic simplicity and directness as the Greek tragic poets did—and with immense dignity of result, in spite of the frequent homeliness of his expression, and the exuberance of animal spirits to which he allowed himself to give way.

The performance of the whole Ninth Symphony last Saturday evening was in most respects magnificently fine. The orchestra evidently laid itself out to do its best. The first movement and the scherzo were two of the finest pieces of conducting we have yet had from Mr. Nikisch. In some passages of the first movement he, to be sure, did not quite succeed in obtaining the true Beethovenish even pianissimo (without the suggestion of a swell) from his violins; some of those alternating G-flats and G-naturals were a little too emotionally swelled before the real crescendo set it. But in other parts of the work, notably in the adagio and portions of the finale, the violins did better piano playing of expressive cantilena than we have heard them do for some time. It even seemed to us, in the contrapuntal working-up of the "Joy" theme, that the damping effect of the surrounding chorus singers had not been made quite enough allowance for, and that the strings played a trifle too softly to hold their own against the bassoon. The great adagio was beautifully played, no slight credit being due to the fourth horn—his low C and G (real E-flat and B-flat) were beautifully smooth and rich, and he played the famous solo passage exquisitely. We felt at moments that Mr. Nikisch was taking the tempo slower than any music whatsoever ought to go; but this sort of thing is quite consonant with the modern taste. The chorus sang admirably well—always considering the music. The weak part of the performance was the solo quartet. Here one had a fine example of how much depends on Mr. Nikisch himself in the fine performances he gives; the four solo singers were the only ones on the stage who were placed with their backs to the conductor, and could not see his beat. He placed too great confidence in them, for the result was that the quartet dragged, or tended to drag, behind his beat all through. No doubt, Mr. Nikisch took things at a pretty brisk pace, and singers do not feel very comfortable while singing so fast; but it can be done. The only really satisfactory part of the solo singing was Mr. Meyn's recitative: that was splendid! But, with the exception of the solo quartet, the performance of the whole symphony was unusually fine, with but very few flaws, and often truly magnificent. The ever-delightful Eighth Symphony was admirably played. We still cannot like Mr. Nikisch's two tempi in the third movement. There are two ways of taking this much debated "Tempo di Menuetto;" each one has much to say for itself, and we do not care very much whether the movement be [illegible] according to Mendelssohn or according [illegible]. Only, to take it in both ways, to [illegible] with Mendelssohnian vivacity, [illegible] Wagnerish deliberation, is [illegible]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90. I. Allegro con brio. (F major) II. Andante. (C major) III. Poco Allegretto. (C minor) IV. Allegro. (F minor)
SCHUBERT-LISZT.	"WANDERER FANTASIE" for PIANO and ORCHESTRA.
BERLIOZ.	TWO MOVEMENTS from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24. I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato. (D major) II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse. (D major)
WEBER-LISZT.	POLACCA BRILLANTE for PIANO and ORCHESTRA, op. 72.
SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Genoveva."

SOLOIST:

MR. W. H. SHERWOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st VIOLIN. MAX ZACH, VIOLA.
A. MOLDAUER, 2d VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

FIFTH SEASON--1892-93.

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

CHICKERING HALL,

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, AT 3 O'CLOCK.

Mr. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD Assisting.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor, (Choral), Opus 125.

Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn were the singers.

A wonderful programme! Here was a chance to drink one's fill of great music unmixed with baser stuff. There are still some people left, to be sure, who do not like the finale of the Ninth Symphony; and it must be admitted that many of the arguments advanced against it are both pertinent and true. The voices are treated with all Beethoven's recklessness; much of the contrapuntal writing is singularly unvocal in character; it may be even doubted whether any chorus ever has been or ever will be brought together really able to sing the choral parts thoroughly well. The work is not essentially impossible, but a thoroughly fine performance of it is virtually impracticable. One can even say that, looked at from the highest artistic point of view, it is in a sense an æsthetically immoral work: to treat singers and their voices with this cruelty has undeniably a tinge of artistic immorality. But, with and in spite of all this, it is a great and glorious work. As far as we are concerned, all the arguments against it appeal to our reason only; they have never had the slightest convincing force over our feelings. We understand them, we are bound to admit their theoretical validity, but they do not lessen our delight in the work one whit! To us it is still the most enjoyable, thrilling and emotionally inspiring composition in existence—the one which carries us away more than any other. Say as much as you please about the monstrosity of Beethoven's high writing for the voices, of the impossibility of his voice-parts being well sung; to our ear the effect of these high passages, even when only approximately well sung, is so superb, so incomparably thrilling, that we would not have one of them changed or struck out. No other work reduces us so completely to the mental attitude of the mere irresponsible amateur, whose only reply tprofessional objections is: "It may be all wrong, but it gets there all the same!" We have already said that this finale is an immoral work. But when objections take the shape of asserting the want of distinction or the "vulgarity" of the theme to the "Hymn to Joy," then we deny their validity in toto. We say right out that, both to our instinctive and to our reflective musical sense, this melody is one of the most superb Beethoven ever wrote; there is genius in every measure of it. It is simple without poverty, exalted in character without turgidity, it exactly befits the state of feeling into which Schiller's poetry throws one. The development of this glorious theme, first in the orchestra, then in the voices, has all the splendor, the beauty, artistic symmetry and elevation, in a word all the "Heiterkeit" of a Greek frieze. And how absolutely individual in manner it all is! The working up of the theme in three and four parts for strings and a single bassoon shows a wholly new departure in counterpoint; both in respect to harmony and to the leading of the parts it is unprecedented as it is still unimitated. Another striking point in this finale is the composer's superb confidence in himself. Beethoven must have known perfectly well that he was here doing many things in a way that, in other hands, had heretofore shown itself to be trivial and undignified; but he had the great genius's complete assurance of his own dignity, the certainty that, do what he would, he could not be undignified. He thus wrote with aristocratic simplicity and directness as the Greek tragic poets did—and with immense dignity of result, in spite of the frequent homeliness of his expression, and the exuberance of animal spirits to which he allowed himself to give way.

The performance of the whole Ninth Symphony last Saturday evening was in most respects magnificently fine. The orchestra evidently laid itself out to do its best. The first movement and the scherzo were two of the finest pieces of conducting we have yet had from Mr. Nikisch. In some passages of the first movement he, to be sure, did not quite succeed in obtaining the true Beethovenish even pianissimo (without the suggestion of a swell) from his violins; some of those alternating G-flats and G-naturals were a little too emotionally swelled before the real crescendo set it. But in other parts of the work, notably in the adagio and portions of the finale, the violins did better piano playing of expressive cantilena than we have heard them do for some time. It even seemed to us, in the contrapuntal working-up of the "Joy" theme, that the damping effect of the surrounding chorus singers had not been made quite enough allowance for, and that the strings played a trifle too softly to hold their own against the bassoon. The great adagio was beautifully played, no slight credit being due to the fourth horn—his low C and G (real E-flat and B-flat) were beautifully smooth and rich, and he played the famous solo passage exquisitely. We felt at moments that Mr. Nikisch was taking the tempo slower than any music whatsoever ought to go; but this sort of thing is quite consonant with the modern taste. The chorus sang admirably well—always considering the music. The weak part of the performance was the solo quartet. Here one had a fine example of how much depends on Mr. Nikisch himself in the fine performances he gives; the four solo singers were the only ones on the stage who were placed with their backs to the conductor, and could not see his beat. He placed too great confidence in them, for the result was that the quartet dragged, or tended to drag, behind his beat all through. No doubt, Mr. Nikisch took things at a pretty brisk pace, and singers do not feel very comfortable while singing so fast; but it can be done. The only really satisfactory part of the solo singing was Mr. Meyn's recitative: that was splendid! But, with the exception of the solo quartet, the performance of the whole symphony was unusually fine, with but very few flaws, and often truly magnificent. The ever-delightful Eighth Symphony was admirably played. We still cannot like Mr. Nikisch's two tempi in the third movement. There are two ways of taking this much debated "Tempo di Menuetto;" each one has much to say for itself, and we do not care very much whether the movement be taken according to Mendelssohn or according to Wagner. Only, to take it in both ways, to play the minuet with Mendelssohnian vivacity, and the trio with Wagnerish deliberation, is singularly disturbing. No matter how much idealized it may be, a dance-form is and remains a dance-form, and unity of tempo is one of its prime factors. But this is the only stricture we have to make; all the rest was admirable.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 4, in A major, opus 90 ("Italian"); Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major; Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANNES BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op 90.
I. Allegro con brio. (F major)
II. Andante. (C major)
III. Poco Allegretto. (C minor)
IV. Allegro. (F minor)

SCHUBERT-LISZT. "WANDERER FANTASIE" for PIANO and ORCHESTRA.

BERLIOZ. TWO MOVEMENTS from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.
I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato. (D major)
II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse. (D major)

WEBER-LISZT. POLACCA BRILLANTE for PIANO and ORCHESTRA, op. 72.

SCHUMANN. OVERTURE. "Genoveva."

SOLOIST:

MR. W. H. SHERWOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st VIOLIN. MAX ZACH, VIOLA.
A. MOLDAUER, 2d VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

FIFTH SEASON--1892-93.

SECOND SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

IN

CHICKERING HALL,

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, AT 3 O'CLOCK.

Mr. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD Assisting.

[66]

DECEMBER 19, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Choral), Opus 125.

Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn were the singers.

A wonderful programme! Here was a chance to drink one's fill of great music unmixed with baser stuff. There are still some people left, to be sure, who do not like the finale of the Ninth Symphony; and it must be admitted that many of the arguments advanced against it are both pertinent and true. The voices are treated with all Beethoven's recklessness; much of the contrapuntal writing is singularly unvocal in character; it may be even doubted whether any chorus ever has been or ever will be brought together really able to sing the choral parts thoroughly well. The work is not essentially impossible, but a thoroughly fine performance of it is virtually impracticable. One can even say that, looked at from the highest artistic point of view, it is in a sense an æsthetically immoral work: to treat singers and their voices with this cruelty has undeniably a tinge of artistic immorality. But, with and in spite of all this, it is a great and glorious work. As far as we are concerned, all the arguments against it appeal to our reason only; they have never had the slightest convincing force over our feelings. We understand them, we are bound to admit their theoretical validity, but they do not lessen our delight in the work one whit! To us it is still the most enjoyable, thrilling and emotionally inspiring composition in existence—the one which carries us away more than any other. Say as much as you please about the monstrosity of Beethoven's high writing for the voices, of the impossibility of his voice-parts being well sung; to our ear the effect of these high passages, even when only approximately well sung, is so superb, so incomparably thrilling, that we would not have one of them changed or struck out. No other work reduces us so completely to the mental attitude of the mere irresponsible amateur, whose only reply tprofessional objections is: "It may be all wrong, but it gets there all the same!" We have already said that this finale is an immoral work. But when objections take the shape of asserting the want of distinction or the "vulgarity" of the theme to the "Hymn to Joy," then we deny their validity in toto. We say right out that, both to our instinctive and to our reflective musical sense, this melody is one of the most superb Beethoven ever wrote; there is genius in every measure of it. It is simple without poverty, exalted in character without turgidity, it exactly befits the state of feeling into which Schiller's poetry throws one. The development of this glorious theme, first in the orchestra, then in the voices, has all the splendor, the beauty, artistic symmetry and elevation, in a word all the "Heiterkeit" of a Greek frieze. And how absolutely individual in manner it all is! The working

---

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90. I. Allegro con brio. (F major) II. Andante. (C major) III. Poco Allegretto. (C minor) IV. Allegro. (F minor)
SCHUBERT–LISZT.	"WANDERER FANTASIE" for PIANO and ORCHESTRA.
BERLIOZ.	TWO MOVEMENTS from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24. I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato. (D major) II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse. (D major)
WEBER–LISZT.	POLACCA BRILLANTE for PIANO and ORCHESTRA, op. 72.
SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE. "Genoveva."

SOLOIST:

MR. W. H. SHERWOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

CHICKERING HALL.

SECOND CONCERT.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20th, AT 3 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

1) QUARTET IN F MAJOR, OP. 59, NO. 1. BEETHOVEN
ALLEGRO.—ALLEGRETTO VIVACE E SEMPRE SCHERZANDO.
ADAGIO MOLTO E MESTO.—ALLEGRO. (THEME RUSSE).

2) PIANO AND 'CELLO SONATA, A MINOR, OP. 36. GRIEG
ALLEGRO AGITATO.—ANDANTE MOLTO TRANQUILLO.—ALLEGRO.—
MR. JOSEPH ADAMOWSKI AND MR. SHERWOOD.

3) TRIO, D MINOR, OP. 49. MENDELSSOHN
MOLTO ALLEGRO AGITATO.—ANDANTE CON MOTO TRANQUILLO.—SCHERZO.—FINALE.
MESSRS. T. AND J. ADAMOWSKI AND MR. SHERWOOD.

MASON & HAMLIN GRAND PIANO IS USED

THIRD CONCERT,

Tuesday Afternoon, January 24th, at 3.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH ASSISTING.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1892.

The eighth symphony concert was given last evening. The program was out of the common run. In honor of the anniversary of the baptism of Beethoven it was as follows:

Symphony No. 8. ..... } .....Beethoven
Symphony No. 9..... }

The solo parts in the choral symphony were taken by Miss Priscella White, soprano; Miss Louisa Leimer, alto; Mr. Wm. J. Winch, tenor, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, bass. The chorus is known as the Boston Symphony chorus. It includes certain singers from other vocal societies, such as the Cecilia, &c.

The eighth symphony seems to be a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. Last evening its performance did not call for special remark. But of course the colossal ninth is seldom given, and so there was a crowd of listeners. So far as the orchestra was concerned, there was much to praise in the performance. The famous sustained pianissimo in the first movement, the passage mentioned by Wagner in his book, "Ueber das Dirigiren," was not sufficiently steady in subdued tone. The drummer in the scherzo might have displayed a more sensitive ear in the tuning of his drums, and in the adagio there was a tendency to fret the cantabile whenever it fell to the first violins.

On the other hand the reading was eminently virile, and in the first three movements there was a well-defined rythmic pulse. The strings in the scherzo were excellent; the wood-wind in the adagio was not always tuneful and its performance was occasionally ragged. But in the main the first three movements were well given, the reading was intelligent and magnetic, and the players as a rule met the demands of the conductor.

Neither the solo singers nor the chorus were effective in the finale. I grant cheerfully that in connection with this choral part of the symphony "effective" must be used in a comparative sense. I have never had the good fortune to hear the finale sung with great effect in German or American cities. The most successful attempt that I remember was in Berlin about ten years ago, when Franz Wüllner directed the Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by the famous Riedelschenverein, of Leipsic. The worst performance that I remember was in the same city in 1883, under the direction of Joachim.

Mr. Foote was patient and intelligent in rehearsing the Boston Symphony chorus, but there was not enough heroic stuff or iron endurance in the singers themselves. The sopranos appeared to best advantage, but it is not surprising that the task was too much for them. The very qualities that at times war against enjoyment of the singing of Mr. Meyn in a small room served him well in the finale of the symphony. He was heard, and he kept up with the orchestral procession. As for the other solo singers of the evening—the rest is silence.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 24 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Just why the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven should have constituted the programme for the eighth Symphon y concert, the exhausted musicians and hearers at that two-hours stretch of nerve and ear, will probably never know. If the ninth seemed to grow out of the eighth in any way or to have any other relation than that of numerical and temporal sequence, one could understand such a choice; but there is no such derivation or connection. If the idea were to make a contrast, some briefer work might just as well have occupied the early part of the evening. The playing of the eighth had its excellences, but on the other hand it had a good many faults, which were chiefly due to the rough and independent playing which the graceful indefiniteness of the conductor's beat often invites. The favorite allegretto scherzando was especially disappointing in its almost lumbering heaviness; Boston has heard it better played scores of times. But the orchestra made ample amends in the first two movements of the ninth symphony, the second being as fine a bit of work as has been done this season. The third movement was smooth and serene in the strings, but there was comparatively little depth of feeling in it—as if the players were already getting tired and had all that they could do in giving the notes and the mere dynamic coloring. The last movement gave, as it almost necessarily must, but very little pleasure. One cannot help feeling about it as about the Indian idol of the story—"He is very ugly, but then he is so great!" Is it really worth while to persuade or hire singers to defy fortune and do violence to nature in attempting to sing the unsingable? We are getting a bit case-hardened to this in Wagner, where the unvocal prevails in the vocal parts, but in Beethoven it is not easy to become reconciled to it, and we are almost heretical enough to suggest that this symphony should be given without its last movement or with the vocal parts arranged in some fashion for instruments. Ideally this music is sublime and splendid—practically, it is quite the reverse and its central theme is a thin and trivial little tune. The continuity of the performance was broken and the effect deteriorated by the long delay incident upon rearranging the orchestra and getting the singers into place. Of the result, the least said the soonest mended. The amateur chorus, split in halves by the mass of the orchestra and not guided and sustained by any positive and helpfully systematic beat, got along as best they could and fought to keep their throats above the orchestral sea, with not much more insuccess than usually befalls the singers of those pages. The solo artists did their best; but the frightfully high and exacting range of the parts was against them all. Mr. Meyn was most successful in keeping himself audible, and Miss Priscilla White's light, clear soprano tones rose distinct occasionally; Mr. W. J. Winch gave earnest and honest effort and Miss Leimer appeared to keep steadily at the contralto music.

Tonight will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" [illegible] Sinfonia [illegible] new name—putting the second Tschaikowsky piano concerto between them.

The serial publication of Berlioz's writings continued in the programme-bulletin, something like eight pages being derived from him. Really this kind of thing has gone far enough especially as the compiler in one place speaks of Berlioz as "inaccurate, as usual,") and the tediousness and pedantry of the other notes, added to the monotony of the main selections, have passed beyond a joke and come to weigh heavily on the public. The long scientific foot-note, for instance, in regard to the dissonances in the ninth symphony, is utterly out of place in a programme pamphlet, and the ten pages of dogmatic essay from some laborious German about "The Two Beethovens," a pompous and long-winded dissertation, is not worth the space it occupies. An editor should learn to edit even a programme book, not according to his idiosyncracies and hobbies, but according to the tastes, wishes and aptitudes of the readers for whom it is chiefly intended.

The Evening Journal.

Lewiston, Friday, Dec. 16, 1892.

NORDICA'S NIGHT.

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at City Hall.

Some of the Scenes and the Side Lights of the Evening and How the Singer and Other Artists Were Received.

ME. Nordica has no reason to doubt her welcome. It was as big as the warm heart of a Maine audience could make it, and even if, in the earlier moments of the concert at the City Hall, Lewiston, Thursday evening, her energetic sub-manager did stand on tip-toe in the back of the hall and inveigh upon the lukewarmness of this section of the world, yet when it came to the grand entrance of our Farmington-born Lillian, the pearl (or is it the queen?) of song he had no longer anything to ask for.

What a bienvenu as did surge up to her, from palms that beat acclaim to art and genius combined!

Why it was an old fashioned "ovation" that we used to read about and the "hochs" and the "bravos" would have joined it if there had been anyone with the courage of his convictions.

Well! it was a good audience that welcomed Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower, of the professional title of Nordica, at the City Hall in Lewiston, Thursday evening. From all over this part of Maine they came. There were Nortons there from Farmington who wanted to hear Lillian sing. There were school friends there who knew her when she was a Boston girl.

There were Lewiston and Auburn people present who are on terms of eminently good acquaintance with the famous diva, and thus it was more than her audience of mere numbers for it was an audience of enthusiastic song-worshippers, willing to pay full tribute to one of the three of Maine's offerings to the list of the world's greatest singers. In numbers it was also most satisfactory—an audience of almost 1500 people and that is an unusual number to gather into a concert hall in these cities.

Of the fifteen hundred or less all of them agree that it was a most excellent concert in which Signor Del Puente shared the vocal honors with the prima donna, and where Miss Powell and Mr. Schulz gave the evening the full and sufficient element of artistic instrumentation, the violin performance being one of the most notable ever given in this city while Mr. Schulz is the artist without superior upon the full toned 'cello.

The Program

was opened by Mr. Luckstone's solo, the Liszt arrangement of the overture of William Tell. Rossini never wrote the overture for the piano and the number has all the structural faults of this type of piano composition. Mr. Luckstone is a good performer, a remarkably fine accompanist, playing many of the numbers con amore and with a genuine delicacy and sentiment. Add to this the fact that he was general utility man, making the announcements, bowing for the stars and rising equal to the demand of any encore and you may appreciate what a wonderfully clever and versatile performer he is, while his solo, in technique and expression, was entirely equal to the demands or the possibilities of the selection.

Miss Rollwagon is a Cincinnati lady and a contralto of distinction. She has sung in the best musical circles of this country, is ever equal to demand, has a fine appreciation of music and a voice that, although not the most musical we have ever heard, is rich, full-toned, capable of much genuine sympathy of expression and always well handled. She sang a "Ritournelle" by Chaminade, the first of that distinguished lady's compositions that we have heard in this cities and for the companion piece Schumann's "My Heart's in the Highlands." The latter was her finest number for the evening. She sang it very nearly beyond any sort of criticism. Upon her second appearance she sang another group of songs, "Still is the Night," and "Ask Nothing More." The latter, by Cowen, is familiar but most sweetly rendered. It is a feature of Miss Rollwagon's repertoire that it ever is new. Her encore was unfamiliar to most of us. Her reception by the audience was very cordial.

A Simple Fabric

of pale pink was the modest envelopment of Miss Maud Powell, the violinist of this company—the young Illinois girl who has just made the triumphal European tour with the New York Arion Singing Society and is confidently expected to fill a larger place in the world among lady violinists than any since the youth and prime of Camilla Urso. Miss Powell's presence speaks for her. It is modest and maidenly. "A finely chiseled head, as an eminent European critic declares, "rests upon a slender, graceful figure which sways only to the more strongly marked rhythms." This may be and is, and besides this, while we are speaking of personality, it is but proper to add that Miss Powell gives no part of her personality to stage effect. There is nothing cheap [illegible] work. She simply drops [illegible] dreams through the melodies, clean, cancy-free tone listening to the touch of the string, and when the more forceful element is called for or when her work is done, the eyes open wonderingly, a smile of pleasure answers the applause that bursts from the audience, and she is transformed into the girl again. She has a force that seems little like the Joachim school and a tone that is clear and sweet and perfect. Her nuances were fine, and in the purity and repose of the tone pictures she held most of us spell-bound. Her first number was "Airs de Russe," by Wieniawski, and she replied to the encore with Sarasate's "Spanish Dances." The second selection later on the program was Sarasate's Zigeunerweisen, and she replied to the recall with a slumber song. She is an artist without question, a violinist of unusual talent, with a fluent and reliable technic, a full and sympathetic tone, and solid and musicianly interpretation. She is young, only twenty-six, it is said, and has been gaining ground in the musical world for two years at a pace that seems unusually but not unaccountably rapid. They say that the soul is in a woman's face not often, but it is in Miss Powell's when she plays the violin.

The Fourth Number

was Mme. Nordica's and the program announced the familiar Waltz Song from Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette." Mr. Luckstone, however, announced a change which indicated the substitution of "Una Voce" for the Valse Song and the substitution of the latter for the "Group of Old Favorites" which was down for her second appearance. Mme. Nordica, as has been indicated, had a tremendous reception. She was gowned like a queen, ablaze with diamonds, robed in pink satin and brocade in two harmonious shades, a Worth gown that was a work of art. She smiled a welcome at the audience and waited for the applause to subside. She was not in her best voice. In conversation she could hardly speak, and it was surprising how she was able to sing so purely and sweetly, and with such strength as she did. Many noticed the huskiness in the speaking register, which faded on the brilliant higher tones that sparkled as of old. Her climax brought the house figuratively to its feet, and she came back and sang again—one of the "group of old favorites," that melancholy birdling "When the Swallows Homeward Fly." This was followed by that other ditty "Comin' through the Rye," and both as Nordica sings them. The Waltz Song was her background for the introduction of that familiar ballad, "When Love is Kind," and for the "song that touched our heart," viz: "Home, Sweet Home," for which, evidently, the audience had been waiting. Nordica's voice improved as the evening wore on, and the Waltz Song was sung in her own way, as only the great singers of the world are able to sing it, with her own cadenzas and the individual stamp of the great artiste. The audience applauded when the first bars of "Home, Sweet Home" were heard and the singer had to return again and again and bow her thanks with many smiles.

Del Puente

was not the Del Puente of two weeks ago. Then he was tired of the turmoil and life, evidently in an organization that was "playing to small business" not en rapport with the audience, which was too small to be en rapport with anything but vacancy and conspired against by an echo that made singing quite impossible. Last night Del Puente was fire, fervor, brilliancy. "I never heard a baritone until to-night," said many. Again and again they recalled him and the Spanish grandee was all smiles and he bowed and kissed his gloved hands to the audience evidently not dissatisfied with his reception. Del Puente is at home in the florid Italian music. He likes the Barber of Seville and he repeated as an encore the buffo aria that he gave at his appearance here two weeks ago. His aria, "Il Balen" from Trovatore was splendidly sung. His second number was also from the Barber of Seville. He sang us again "The Toreador" and he was generous in his effort, so grandly in good voice and humor that we all liked him better than ever.

The 'Cello

was handled by Mr. Leo Schulz of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His selections were a group of three, including a Chopin nocturne and a gavotte by David Popper. Mr. Schulz has fully established a name for himself already as a finished soloist, although only recently come to this country. His tone does not not seem wonderful in strength, bnt the quality is beautiful and the intonation very pure and true. He responded with a Haydn serenade, "With Muted String," written originally for string orchestra and a delightful bit of melody.

The program closed with Nordica and Del Puente in a duet from Mascagni's Cavalleria. It suffered for want of orchestral back ground, wasn't very successful or satisfying. Del Puente evidently was better versed in it than Nordica and in the recitative she faltered as if unfamiliar with the score, but the finale was brilliant enough for recompense and the concert was at an end with this bit of the intensity of the young Italian composer and the first we think that has ever penetrated into this distant land of Androscoggin.

Notes.

Miss Powell plays an Amati violin belonging to Mr. Delebanty, the New York collector of musical instruments.

Miss Little, who was to have sung in this concert is now in the West.

Madame Nordica will be one of the Stars of the First Magnitude at the Chicago World's Fair. She told a Journal reporter Thursday evening that she had been invited by Dr. McKenzie, the famous composer, to create the soprano part in a grand cantata that he is writing for the World's Fair.

Crowds on the Trains from Lewiston—All Maine Sent Delegates.

The evening trains came in loaded from all points Thursday evening. The trains all day had been bringing people to the concert. When the train came in from Lisbon Falls and Brunswick it was loaded with people who filled the sidewalks till they got to the hall.

The following people came down from Kent's Hill to attend the concert: Miss Stone, Miss Adams, Miss Bucknam, Miss Miles, Miss M. York, Miss F. York, Mr. McGoff, Mr. Norton, Mr. Conant, Mr. Stark, Mr. Morse, Mrs. Morse, Mr. Taylor, Mr. George W. Ranger and ladies from Farmington were down.

Mr. F. A. Welsh and Mr. F. C. Cox of Bath were up.

Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Mitchell and Mr. George W. Nottage of Turner were here.

Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Clover of Hebron, Mr. W. H. Miles of Lisbon, Mr. James Molie and wife of Portland were in Lewiston Thursday evening.

Mr. G.D.Staples and wife of Canton, Mr. C. E. Dyer and wife, Mr. and Mrs. A.D. Horn, Miss May Daine of Farmington, Mr. A. L. Childs of Canton; Mr. C. C. Corbett, Mrs. A. Sylvester, Miss Mabel Sylvester, Mr. L. G. Preston, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. S. Hunter, Mrs. J. W. Nichols, Mrs. J. H. Tarbox, Farmington; Mr. T. G. Heald, superintendent of other agents of the Kennebec Mutual Life Insurance Co., Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Lane of Waterville; Mr. E. H. Buzzell of Jay, Miss Jennie Farrar and Miss Alice Farrar, No. Turner; John C. Swasey of Canton, Mrs. Charles Smith and Mrs. Elmer Jennings of Farmington.

Mr. L. Matthews and wife of Farmington; Mr. J. W. Wallace, Belfast; Mr. and Mrs. C. Davis, Buckfield; F. L. Patch, Gardiner; Mr. F. H. Mitchell and wife, Turner; Mr. Daniel M. Bonney and wife, Farmington; Charles A. Brown, jr., and Mr. W. P. Thompson, Brunswick; Mr. H. Hamilton, Portland; Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Milliken, Mechanic Falls; Mr. S. W. Manter, Readfield; Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Golder, Belgrade; Mr. Schuyler Austin, Mrs. A.W. Austin, Farmington; Mr. Fred R. Allen, Farmington; Mr. E. A. Crawford, Brunswick; Mr. F. H. Claftin, Boston.

Among those who attended the Nordica concert Thursday evening were the following Elm House guests: Mrs. George D. Bisbee and daughter, May L. Bisbee of Buckfield; Gleason Young and lady, South Paris: Miss M. A. Gerry, Farmington, Mrs. M. A. Webster, Bath; Mrs. R. C. Call, Wiscassett; Mrs. E. Gerry, Farmington; Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Willard, Turner; Frank L. Dyer, Strong; William B. Bucknam and wife and daughter, Miss Ella H. Bucknam, Mechanic Falls; L. W. Smith and wife, Canton; A. G. Winter and wife, Kingfield; Lula Boothby, Miss E. E. Burnham, Alice Mason, Bethel: Alvin Records and wife, J. A. Records and wife, Mrs. R. H. Whittemore, W. A. Stuart, Livermore Falls; Maud L. Cobb, Mabel Thayer, C. Blanche Walker, Mechanic Falls.

[67]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1892.

The eighth symphony concert was given last evening. The program was out of the common run. In honor of the anniversary of the baptism of Beethoven it was as follows:

Symphony No. 8. ..... } .....Beethoven
Symphony No. 9..... }

The solo parts in the choral symphony were taken by Miss Priscella White, soprano; Miss Louisa Leimer, alto; Mr. Wm. J. Winch, tenor, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, bass. The chorus is known as the Boston Symphony chorus. It includes certain singers from other vocal societies, such as the Cecilia, &c.

The eighth symphony seems to be a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. Last evening its performance did not call for special remark. But of course the colossal ninth is seldom given, and so there was a crowd of listeners. So far as the orchestra was concerned, there was much to praise in the performance. The famous sustained pianissimo in the first movement, the passage mentioned by Wagner in his book, "Ueber das Dirigiren," was not sufficiently steady in subdued tone. The drummer in the scherzo might have displayed a more sensitive ear in the tuning of his drums, and in the adagio there was a tendency to fret the cantabile whenever it fell to the first violins.

On the other hand the reading was eminently virile, and in the first three movements there was a well-defined rythmic pulse. The strings in the scherzo were excellent; the wood-wind in the adagio was not always tuneful and its performance was occasionally ragged. But in the main the first three movements were well given, the reading was intelligent and magnetic, and the players as a rule met the demands of the conductor.

Neither the solo singers nor the chorus were effective in the finale. I grant cheerfully that in connection with this choral part of the symphony "effective" must be used in a comparative sense. I have never had the good fortune to hear the finale sung with great effect in German or American cities. The most successful attempt that I remember was in Berlin about ten years ago, when Franz Wüllner directed the Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by the famous Riedelschenverein, of Leipsic. The worst performance that I remember was in the same city in 1883, under the direction of Joachim.

Mr. Foote was patient and intelligent in rehearsing the Boston Symphony chorus, but there was not enough heroic stuff or iron endurance in the singers themselves. The sopranos appeared to best advantage, but it is not surprising that the task was too much for them. The very qualities that at times war against enjoyment of the singing of Mr. Meyn in a small room served him well in the finale of the symphony. He was heard, and he kept up with the orchestral procession. As for the other solo singers of the evening—the rest is silence.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 24 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Just why the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven should have constituted the programme for the eighth Symphony concert, the exhausted musicians and hearers at that two-hours stretch of nerve and ear, will probably never know. If the ninth seemed to grow out of the eighth in any way or to have any other relation than that of numerical and temporal sequence, one could understand such a choice; but there is no such derivation or connection. If the idea were to make a contrast, some briefer work might just as well have occupied the early part of the evening. The playing of the eighth had its excellences, but on the other hand it had a good many faults, which were chiefly due to the rough and independent playing which the graceful indefiniteness of the conductor's beat often invites. The favorite allegretto scherzando was especially disappointing in its almost lumbering heaviness; Boston has heard it better played scores of times. But the orchestra made ample amends in the first two movements of the ninth symphony, the second being as fine a bit of work as has been done this season. The third movement was smooth and serene in the strings, but there was comparatively little depth of feeling in it—as if the players were already getting tired and had all that they could do in giving the notes and the mere dynamic coloring. The last movement gave, as it almost necessarily must, but very little pleasure. One cannot help feeling about it as about the Indian idol of the story—"He is very ugly, but then he is so great!" Is it really worth while to persuade or hire singers to defy fortune and do violence to nature in attempting to sing the unsingable? We are getting a bit case-hardened to this in Wagner, where the unvocal prevails in the vocal parts, but in Beethoven it is not easy to become reconciled to it, and we are almost heretical enough to suggest that this symphony should be given without its last movement or with the vocal parts arranged in some fashion for instruments. Ideally this music is sublime and splendid—practically, it is quite the reverse and its central theme is a thin and trivial little tune. The continuity of the performance was broken and the effect deteriorated by the long delay incident upon rearranging the orchestra and getting the singers into place. Of the result, the least said the soonest mended. The amateur chorus, split in halves by the mass of the orchestra and not guided and sustained by any positive and helpfully systematic beat, got along as best they could and fought to keep their throats above the orchestral sea, with not much more insuccess than usually befalls the singers of those pages. The solo artists did their best; but the frightfully high and exacting range of the parts was against them all. Mr. Meyn was most successful in keeping himself audible, and Miss Priscilla White's light, clear soprano tones rose distinct occasionally; Mr. W. J. Winch gave earnest and honest effort and Miss Leimer appeared to keep steadily at the contralto music.

Tonight will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys". Signorina Eugenia Castellano [illegible] new name—putting the second Tschaikowsky piano concerto between them.

The serial publication of Berlioz's writings continued in the programme-bulletin, something like eight pages being derived from him. Really this kind of thing has gone far enough (especially as the compiler in one place speaks of Berlioz as "inaccurate, as usual,") and the tediousness and pedantry of the other notes, added to the monotony of the main selections, have passed beyond a joke and come to weigh heavily on the public. The long scientific foot-note, for instance, in regard to the dissonances in the ninth symphony, is utterly out of place in a programme pamphlet, and the ten pages of dogmatic essay from some laborious German about "The Two Beethovens," a pompous and long-winded dissertation, is not worth the space it occupies. An editor should learn to edit even a programme book, not according to his idiosyncracies and hobbies, but according to the tastes, wishes and aptitudes of the readers for whom it is chiefly intended.

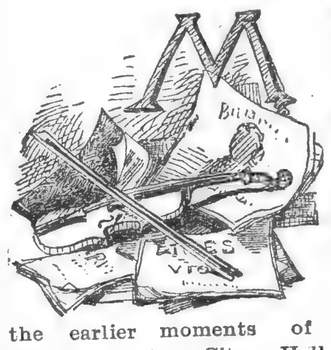
The Evening Journal.

Lewiston, Friday, Dec. 16, 1892.

NORDICA'S NIGHT.

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at City Hall.

Some of the Scenes and the Side Lights of the Eveuing and How the Singer and Other Artists Were Received.



ME. Nordica has no reason to doubt her welcome. It was as big as the warm heart of a Maine audience could make it, and even if, in the earlier moments of the concert at the City Hall, Lewiston, Thursday evening, her energetic submanager did stand on tip-toe in the back of the hall and inveigh upon the lukewarmness of this section of the world, yet when it came to the grand entrance of our Farmington-born Lillian, the pearl (or is it the queen?) of song he had no longer anything to ask for.

What a bienvenu as did surge up to her, from palms that beat acclaim to art and genius combined!

Why it was an old fashioned "ovation" that we used to read about and the "hochs" and the "bravos" would have joined it if there had been anyone with the courage of his convictions.

Well! it was a good audience that welcomed Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower, of the professional title of Nordica, at the City Hall in Lewiston, Thursday evening. From all over this part of Maine they came. There were Nortons there from Farmington who wanted to hear Lillian sing. There were school friends there who knew her when she was a Boston girl.

There were Lewiston and Auburn people present who are on terms of eminently good acquaintance with the famous diva, and thus it was more than her audience of mere numbers for it was an audience of enthusiastic song-worshippers, willing to pay full tribute to one of the three of Maine's offerings to the list of the world's greatest singers. In numbers it was also most satisfactory—an audience of almost 1500 people and that is an unusual number to gather into a concert hall in these cities.

Of the fifteen hundred or less all of them agree that it was a most excellent concert in which Signor Del Puente shared the vocal honors with the prima donna, and where Miss Powell and Mr. Schulz gave the evening the full and sufficient element of artistic instrumentation, the violin performance being one of the most notable ever given in this city while Mr. Schulz is the artist without superior upon the full toned 'cello.

The Program

was opened by Mr. Luckstone's solo, the Liszt arrangement of the overture of William Tell. Rossini never wrote the overture for the piano and the number has all the structural faults of this type of piano composition. Mr. Luckstone is a good performer, a remarkably fine accompanist, playing many of the numbers con amore and with a genuine delicacy and sentiment. Add to this the fact that he was general utility man, making the announcements, bowing for the stars and rising equal to the demands of any encore and you may appreciate what a wonderfully clever and versatile performer he is, while his solo, in technique and expression, was entirely equal to the demands or the possibilities of the selection.

Mise Rollwagon is a Cincinnati lady and a contralto of distinction. She has sung in the best musical circles of this country, is ever equal to demand, has a fine appreciation of music and a voice that, although not the most musical we have ever heard, is rich, full-toned, capable of much genuine sympathy of expression and always well handled. She sang a "Ritournelle" by Chaminade, the first of that distinguished lady's compositions that we have heard in this cities and for the companion piece Schumann's "My Heart's in the Highlands." The latter was her finest number for the evening. She sang it very nearly beyond any sort of criticism. Upon her second appearance she sang another group of songs, "Still is the Night," and "Ask Nothing More." The latter, by Cowen, is familiar but most sweetly rendered. It is a feature of Miss Rollwagon's repertoire that it ever is new. Her encore was unfamiliar to most of us. Her reception by the audience was very cordial.

A Simple Fabric

of pale pink was the modest envelopment of Miss Maud Powell, the violinist of this company—the young Illinois girl who has just made the triumphal European tour with the New York Arion Singing Society and is confidently expected to fill a larger place in the world among lady violinists than any since the youth and prime of Camilla Urso. Miss Powell's presence speaks for her. It is modest and maidenly. "A finely chiseled head, as an eminent European critic declares, "rests upon a slender, graceful figure which sways only to the more strongly marked rhythms." This may be and is, and besides this, while we are speaking of personality, it is but proper to add that Miss Powell gives no part of her personality to stage effect. There is nothing cheap or tricky in her work. She simply drops her lashes, dreams through the melodies, does rare things in harmonies with the clear, canary-like tone answering to her touch of the string, and when the more forceful element is called for or when her work is done, the eyelids open wonderingly, a smile of pleasure answers the applause that bursts from the audience, and she is transformed into the girl again. She has a force that seems little like the Joachim school and a tone that is clear and sweet and perfect. Her nuances were fine, and in the purity and repose of the tone pictures she held most of us spellbound. Her first number was "Airs de Russe," by Wieniawski, and she replied to the encore with Sarasate's "Spanish Dances." The second selection later on the program was Sarasate's Zigeunerweisen, and she replied to the recall with a slumber song. She is an artist without question, a violinist of unusual talent, with a fluent and reliable technic, a full and sympathetic tone, and solid and musicianly interpretation. She is young, only twenty-six, it is said, and has been gaining ground in the musical world for two years at a pace that seems unusually but not unaccountably rapid. They say that the soul is in a woman's face not often, but it is in Miss Powell's when she plays the violin.

The Fourth Number

was Mme. Nordica's and the program announced the familiar Waltz Song from Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette." Mr. Luckstone, however, announced a change which indicated the substitution of "Una Voce" for the Valse Song and the substitution of the latter for the "Group of Old Favorites" which was down for her second appearance. Mme. Nordica, as has been indicated, had a tremendous reception. She was gowned like a queen, ablaze with diamonds, robed in pink satin and brocade in two harmonious shades, a Worth gown that was a work of art. She smiled a welcome at the audience and waited for the applause to subside. She was not in her best voice. In conversation she could hardly speak, and if was surprising how she was able to sing so purely and sweetly, and with such strength as she did. Many noticed the huskiness in the speaking register, which faded on the brilliant higher tones that sparkled as of old. Her climax brought the house figuratively to its feet, and she came back and sang again—one of the "group of old favorites," that melancholy birdling "When the Swallows Homeward Fly." This was followed by that other ditty "Comin' through the Rye," and both as Nordica sings them. The Waltz Song was her background for the introduction of that familiar ballad, "When Love is Kind," and for the "song that touched our heart," viz: "Home, Sweet Home," for which, evidently, the audience had been waiting. Nordica's voice improved as the evening wore on, and the Waltz Song was sung in her own way, as only the great singers of the world are able to sing it, with her own cadenzas and the individual stamp of the great artiste. The audience applauded when the first bars of "Home, Sweet Home" were heard and the singer had to return again and again and bow her thanks with many smiles.

Del Puente

was not the Del Puente of two weeks ago. Then he was tired of the turmoil and life, evidently in an organization that was "playing to small business" not en rapport with the audience, which was too small to be en rapport with anything but vacancy and conspired against by an echo that made singing quite impossible. Last night Del Puente was fire, fervor, brilliancy. "I never heard a baritone until to-night," said many. Again and again they recalled him and the Spanish grandee was all smiles and he bowed and kissed his gloved hands to the audience evidently not dissatisfied with his reception. Del Puente is at home in the florid Italian music. He likes the Barber of Seville and he repeated as an encore the buffo aria that he gave at his appearance here two weeks ago. His aria, "Il Balen" from Trovatore was splendidly sung. His second number was also from the Barber of Seville. He sang us again "The Toreador" and he was generous in his effort, so grandly in good voice and humor that we all liked him better than ever.

The 'Cello

was handled by Mr. Leo Schulz of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His selections were a group of three, including a Chopin nocturne and a gavotte by David Popper. Mr. Schulz has fully established a name for himself already as a finished soloist, although only recently come to this country. His tone does not not seem wonderful in strength, bnt the quality is beautiful and the intonation very pure and true. He responded with a Haydn serenade, "With Muted String," written originally for string orchestra and a delightful bit of melody.

The program closed with Nordica and Del Puente in a duet from Mascagni's Cavalleria. It suffered for want of orchestral back ground, wasn't very successful or satisfying. Del Puente evidently was better versed in it than Nordica and in the recitative she faltered as if unfamiliar with the score, but the finale was brilliant enough for recompense and the concert was at an end with this bit of the intensity of the young Italian composer and the first we think that has ever penetrated into this distant land of Androscoggin.

Notes.

Miss Powell plays an Amati violin belonging to Mr. Delebanty, the New York collector of musical instruments.

Miss Little, who was to have sung in this concert is now in the West.

Madame Nordica will be one of the Stars of the First Magnitude at the Chicago World's Fair. She told a Journal reporter Thursday evening that she had been invited by Dr. McKenzie, the famous composer, to create the soprano part in a grand cantata that he is writing for the World's Fair.

CAME TO HEAR NORDICA.

Crowds on the Evening Trains into Lewiston—All Maine Sent Delegates.

The evening trains came in loaded from all points Thursday evening. The trains all day had been bringing people to the concert. When the train came in from Lisbon Falls and Brunswick it was loaded with people who filled the sidewalks till they got to the hall.

The following people came down from Kent's Hill to attend the concert: Miss Stone, Miss Adams, Miss Bucknam, Miss Miles, Miss M. York, Miss F. York, Mr. McGoff, Mr. Norton, Mr. Conant, Mr. Stark, Mr. Morse, Mrs. Morse, Mr. Taylor, Mr. George W. Ranger and ladies from Farmington were down.

Mr. F. A. Welsh and Mr. F. C. Cox of Bath were up.

Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Mitchell and Mr. George W. Nottage of Turner were here.

Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Clover of Hebron, Mr. W. H. Miles of Lisbon, Mr. James Molie and wife of Portland were in Lewiston Thursday evening.

Mr. G.D.Staples and wife of Canton, Mr. C. E. Dyer and wife, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Horn, Miss May Daine of Farmington, Mr. A. L. Childs of Canton; Mr. C. C. Corbett, Mrs. A. Sylvester, Miss Mabel Sylvester, Mr. L. G. Preston, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. S. Hunter, Mrs. J. W. Nichols, Mrs. J. H. Tarbox, Farmington; Mr. T. G. Heald, superintendent of other agents of the Kennebec Mutual Life Insurance Co., Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Lane of Waterville; Mr. E. H. Buzzell of Jay, Miss Jennie Farrar and Miss Alice Farrar, No. Turner; John C. Swasey of Canton, Mrs. Charles Smith and Mrs. Elmer Jennings of Farmington.

Mr. L. Matthews and wife of Farmington; Mr. J. W. Wallace, Belfast; Mr. and Mrs. C. Davis, Buckfield; F. L. Patch, Gardiner; Mr. F. H. Mitchell and wife, Turner; Mr. Daniel M. Bonney and wife, Farmington; Charles A. Brown, jr., and Mr. W. P. Thompson, Brunswick; Mr. H. Hamilton, Portland; Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Milliken, Mechanic Falls; Mr. S. W. Manter, Readfield; Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Golder, Belgrade; Mr. Schuyler Austin, Mrs. A.W. Austin, Farmington; Mr. Fred R. Allen, Farmington; Mr. E. A. Crawford, Brunswick; Mr. F. H. Claftin, Boston.

Among those who attended the Nordica concert Thursday evening were the following Elm House guests: Mrs. George D. Bisbee and daughter, May L. Bisbee of Buckfield; Gleason Young and lady, South Paris: Miss M. A. Gerry, Farmington, Mrs. M. A. Webster, Bath; Mrs. R. C. Call, Wiscassett; Mrs. E. Gerry, Farmington; Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Willard, Turner; Frank L. Dyer, Strong; William B. Bucknam and wife and daughter, Miss Ella H. Bucknam, Mechanic Falls; L. W. Smith and wife, Canton; A. G. Winter and wife, Kingfield; Lula Boothby, Miss E. E. Burnham, Alice Mason, Bethel: Alvin Records and wife, J. A. Records and wife, Mrs. R. H. Whittemore, W. A. Stuart, Livermore Falls; Maud L. Cobb, Mabel Thayer, C. Blanche Walker, Mechanic Falls.

[67]

...Gazette

...BURN, MAINE,

Friday, December 16, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

They tell us that local audiences are cold and undemonstrative but the statement is hardly consistent with the rousing reception the great artiste, Nordica, Miss Maud Powell and Signor Del Puente received in City Hall last evening.

* * * *

The time has arrived when the best talent that the country affords in none too good for the music lovers of Auburn and Lewiston and surrounding towns.

It has at length been demonstrated that our people will give their support to genuine merit.

* * * *

Mr. Isadore Luckstone.—A stout every-day sort of looking man, with an air of confidence which is reassuring to the audience, but who is a brilliant performer on the piano and a skilful and sympathetic accompanist.

* * * *

Miss Louise Rollwagen.—A light complexioned young lady with a face which is indicative of her German parentage, in a becoming decollete toilet of black, with a rich pleasing contralto voice.

* * * *

Mr. Leo Schultz—A rather stout gentleman with a face which reminded one forcibly of pictures of some of the old tone-masters, the resemblance to which is heightened by a peculiar hasty arrangement of hair around the rather passive features, who plays the violincello with the almost magical touch of Paganini.

Signor Guiseppe Del Puente—A gentleman with a foreign cast of features lighted up with a good-humored smile which captivates the audience at once even before his magnificent and powerful baritone is heard.

Miss Maud Powell—A rather slender, dark complexioned young lady with expressive black eyes, in a simple light pink gown but with a power in that small arm and those tiny fingers which is manifest as soon as they touch the king of instruments.

Mme. Lillian Nordica—The beautiful sweet singer whom Maine is so proud to have reared among her rugged hills. With what a rare smile are those faultless features lighted up as she comes forward to greet her audience amidst thunders of applause. The very personification, of womanly dignity, beauty and grace is Nordica and when she opens her mouth there issue tones as pure and sweet as ever bird warbled.

* * * *

Such was the personnel of artists which so enraptured the vast audience last evening. An audience composed of all classes of society and kinds of people. Side by side the society belle with her fine clothes, who goes to hear Nordica because it is fashionable, and possibly to admire and criticize the costumes of the artists, sat the simply but neatly dressed working girl, who worships Nordica because she opens to her the fairy land of melody.

The banker or merchant who seeks in an evening of music to soothe his tired brain is side by side with the young galant who comes to pay homage to the singer's beauty. All find food for their respective needs.

* * * *

It is an exceedingly difficult thing to arrange a programme for an entertainment consisting entirely of music which is not fatiguing to the average audience. The skill of the performers alone can remove this objection.

Although still suffering somewhat from the effects of her recent cold, Mme Nordica, while not at he best best last evening, was still divine.

The announcement of Mr. Lackstone of the substitution of Rossini's "Una Poco Fa" by Mme Nordica, for his first number "Valse song from Romeo and Juliet" and of the latter for her second number "A Group of Old Favorila" at first caused a pang of regret which however, soon departed when she was recalled and gave "When the Swallows Home Fly" and Coming Through the Rye." In order to enter fully into the spirit of the latter one should hear Mme Nordica sing it in her inimtable coquettish way.

* * * *

It is clearly manifest that Del Puente is a great favorite with a local audience, as he was twice called after both of his selections. A ripple of applause passed over the audience as the familiar strains of the Toreador Song were struck up.

An informal reception was held after Nordica's appearance for the benefit of her Franklin county friends. Nordica remarked after the concert to her friend, Miss Julia Tarbox, sister of the editor of the Farmington Chronicle, that she had a birthday a few days ago—"But" she said shaking her finger at her friend, "don't you tell, Julia." A consultation with Butler's history of Farmington proves that the great singer was 30 years of age on December 12 last.

NORDICA SANG HOME SWEET HOME.

...Concert in City Hall Last

...Eight accompanied by Her Pianist, Mr. Luckstone.

He took his seat by the instrument, and waited just an instant.

Nordica walked over to him and smiling that smile which is almost as entrancing as her voice, spoke a few words in an undertone. The audience did not catch the words but as soon as the musician's fingers ran across the keys they knew what had been said.

It was the familiar, the immortal notes of "Home Sweet Home," they heard.

In an instant there was such an applause as no music in City Hall has ever evoked.

Then the great singer turned, faced the magnificent audience which had assembled to pay her tribute, and smiled at the enthusiasm which the simple notes had awakened.

Luckstone finished his prelude, the prima donna threw back her shoulders and in those silvery tones which have set the musical critics of the world into raptures, voiced the words which have made the name of John Howard Payne imperishable.

"Mid pleasures and palaces though I may roam" she sang, and as she did so the minds of her audience and her own, no doubt, went back for an instant over the marvellous career of the Maine girl.

Then, and her voice softened perceptibly, came the words, "There is no place like home."

If ever a singer felt a song, and if ever an audience shared the feeling it was then.

Fresh from triumphs, such as few in this world are permitted to enjoy, she was back to her home, before her own people singing to them of "Home sweet home."

"Give me my lowly thatched cottage again.
The birds singing sweetly that come at my call,
Give me them, and that peace of mind, dearer than all,"

she sang and her soul seemed to go forth in the words, for Lillian Norton has had sorrows as well as triumphs.

The audience listened, breathless lest one glorious note escape them, too spellbound to think of applause.

At last it was over; the tones of voice and piano died away, and then came a very thunder of applause.

As Nordica walked away she brushed something from the corner of her eye with her handkerchief and many in the audience had to do the same thing.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1892

ELABORATE PRIVATE CONCERTS.

Boston no doubt will be pleased to know that its famous Symphony Orchestra, headed by Conductor Nikisch, is as much admired in New York as at home, and at each performance given here at Chickering Hall a very fashionable audience assembles. But these public entertainments did not quite satisfy a certain coterie of ultra-fashionable people who happen to make music their special fad, and therefore a series of six concerts given by Nikisch and orchestra have been arranged to take place in private houses, all of which happen to have ball rooms. In fact the fin de siécle residence of the rich must contain a ball room transformable into a private theater. These concerts have been organized by Mr. Harry Le Grand Cannon, who two winters ago married a very rich girl of Buffalo, Miss Elizabeth Thompson. Her fortune came from the Brush electric light, Mr. Brush being her grandfather. Mr. Cannon is a many sided young man. He dabbles in all the arts. He is a fair sculptor, paints quite well, sings, and is an enthusiastic devotee to music, as he is also to society. So it was naturally on the cards that he should do something especially entertaining and novel during the season. As something unusual these concerts stand alone in the winter's amusements.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY IN DEMAND.

The first was given at the magnificent residence of Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer on Madison Avenue. Every New Yorker is familiar with the house. It stands on a corner lot, is very large, and has a large court yard into which carriages may drive. There is no house in town better adapted to this special purpose than the Havemeyer residence. It takes a deal of room where the performers alone are numerous enough to fill any ordinary sized drawing room. At the Havemeyers, ball-room, dining-room, drawing-room, library and conservatory all open into each other. Add to this the fact that each room is superbly decorated and furnished in different style, and that the audience consisted of the wealthiest and most fashionable in the city, all in elaborate evening dress, and one can form some idea of these concerts, and can readily account for the smiling faces of both audience and musicians. The program was listened to intently; there was no intermission, but at the close, a buffet supper was served, until 1 A. M. when the guests dispersed. The next of these Symphony Concerts will take place at Mr. Cannon's house, corner of Fifth Avenue and Twelth Street. It is known as the old Minturn house, although it now belongs to the estate of the late Mrs. Mark Hopkins Searle. Of course it is rather a snobbish idea, these private symphony concerts, but then our fashionable society is made up of snobs to a degree, and besides, it can be pardoned in the general idea of the ultra-rich to do something out of the common. Mr. Cannon intends eventually to build a private palace that shall contain a studio, theater, and covered garden.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C sharp minor, op. 131.

Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo e molto contabile.—Presto.—
Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET in A major, op. 26.

Allegro non troppo.—Poco adagio.—
Poco allegro.—Allegro.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Piano.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

The date of the Fifth Concert is January 16.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .
Season of 1892-93

OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD,

Monday, Evening, Jan. 2.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

[68]

Daily Gazette

AUBURN, MAINE,

Friday, December 16, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

They tell us that local audiences are cold and undemonstrative but the statement is hardly consistent with the rousing reception the great artiste, Nordica, Miss Maud Powell, and Signor Del Puente received in City Hall last evening.

* * * *

The time has arrived when the best talent that the country affords in none too good for the music lovers of Auburn and Lewiston and surrounding towns.

It has at length been demonstrated that our people will give their support to genuine merit.

* * * *

Mr. Isadore Luckstone.—A stout every-day sort of looking man, with an air of confidence which is reassuring to the audience, but who is a brilliant performer on the piano and a skilful and sympathetic accompanist.

* * * *

Miss Louise Rollwagen.—A light complexioned young lady with a face which is indicative of her German parentage, in a becoming decollete toilet of black, with a rich pleasing contralto voice.

* * * *

Mr. Leo Schultz—A rather stout gentleman with a face which reminded one forcibly of pictures of some of the old tone-masters, the resemblance to which is heightened by a peculiar hasty arrangement of hair around the rather passive features, who plays the violin—cello with the almost magical touch of Paganini.

Signor Guiseppe Del Puente—A gentleman with a foreign cast of features lighted up with a good-humored smile which captivates the audience at once even before his magnificent and powerful baritone is heard.

Miss Maud Powell—A rather slender, dark complexioned young lady with expressive black eyes, in a simple light pink gown but with a power in that small arm and those tiny fingers which is manifest as soon as they touch the king of instruments.

Mme. Lillian Nordica—The beautiful sweet singer whom Maine is so proud to have reared among her rugged hills. With what a rare smile are those faultless features lighted up as she comes forward to greet her audience amidst thunders of applause. The very personification, of womanly dignity, beauty and grace is Nordica and when she opens her mouth there issue tones as pure and sweet as ever bird warbled.

* * * *

Such was the personnel of artists which so enraptured the vast audience last evening. An audience composed of all classes of society and kinds of people. Side by side the society belle with her fine clothes, who goes to hear Nordica because it is fashionable, and possibly to admire and criticize the costumes of the artists, sat the simply but neatly dressed working girl, who worships Nordica because she opens to her the fairy land of melody.

The banker or merchant who seeks in an evening of music to soothe his tired brain is side by side with the young galant who comes to pay homage to the singer's beauty. All find food for their respective needs.

* * * *

It is an exceedingly difficult thing to arrange a programme for an entertainment consisting entirely of music which is not fatiguing to the average audience. The skill of the performers alone can remove this objection.

Although still suffering somewhat from the effects of her recent cold, Mme Nordica, while not at he best best last evening, was still divine.

The announcement of Mr. Lackstone of the substitution of Rossini's "Una Poco Fa" by Mme Nordica for his first number "Valse song from Romeo and Juliet" and of the latter for her second number "A Group of Old Favorila" at first caused a pang of regret which however, soon departed when she was recalled and gave "When the Swallows Home Fly" and Coming Through the Rye." In order to enter fully into the spirit of the latter one should hear Mme Nordica sing it in her inimtable coquettish way.

* * * *

It is clearly manifest that Del Puente is a great favorite with a local audience, as he was twice called after both of his selections. A ripple of applause passed over the audience as the familiar strains of the Toreador Song were struck up.

An informal reception was held after Nordica's appearance for the benefit of her Franklin county friends. Nordica remarked after the concert to her friend, Miss Julia Tarbox, sister of the editor of the Farmington Chronicle, that she had a birthday a few days ago—"But" she said shaking her finger at her friend, "don't you tell, Julia." A consultation with Butler's history of Farmington proves that the great singer was 35 years of age on December 12 last.

HOW NORDICA SANG HOME SWEET HOME.

An Incident of the Concert in City Hall Last Evening.

In response to a second recall after her last number Nordica appeared before her audience last night accompanied by her pianist, Mr. Luckstone.

He took his seat by the instrument, and waited just an instant.

Nordica walked over to him and smiling that smile which is almost as entrancing as her voice, spoke a few words in an undertone. The audience did not catch the words but as soon as the musician's fingers ran across the keys they knew what had been said.

It was the familiar, the immortal notes of "Home Sweet Home," they heard.

In an instant there was such an applause as no music in City Hall has ever evoked.

Then the great singer turned, faced the magnificent audience which had assembled to pay her tribute, and smiled at the enthusiasm which the simple notes had awakened.

Luckstone finished his prelude, the prima donna threw back her shoulders and in those silvery tones which have set the musical critics of the world into raptures, voiced the words which have made the name of John Howard Payne imperishable.

"Mid pleasures and palaces through I may roam" she sang, and as she did so the minds of her audience and her own, no doubt, went back for an instant over the marvellous career of the Maine girl.

Then, and her voice softened perceptibly, came the words, "There is no place like home."

If ever a singer felt a song, and if ever an audience shared the feeling it was then.

Fresh from triumphs, such as few in this world are permitted to enjoy, she was back to her home, before her own people singing to them of "Home sweet home."

"Give me my lowly thatched cottage again.
The birds singing sweetly that come at my call,
Give me them, and that peace of mind, dearer than all,"

she sang and her soul seemed to go forth in the words, for Lillian Norton has had sorrows as well as triumphs.

The audience listened, breathless lest one glorious note escape them, too spellbound to think of applause.

At last it was over; the tones of voice and piano died away, and then came a very thunder of applause.

As Nordica walked away she brushed something from the corner of her eye with her handkerchief and many in the audience had to do the same thing.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1892

ELABORATE PRIVATE CONCERTS.

Boston no doubt will be pleased to know that its famous Symphony Orchestra, headed by Conductor Nikisch, is as much admired in New York as at home, and at each performance given here at Chickering Hall a very fashionable audience assembles. But these public entertainments did not quite satisfy a certain coterie of ultra-fashionable people who happen to make music their special fad, and therefore a series of six concerts given by Nikisch and orchestra have been arranged to take place in private houses, all of which happen to have ball rooms. In fact the fin de siécle residence of the rich must contain a ball room transformable into a private theater. These concerts have been organized by Mr. Harry Le Grand Cannon, who two winters ago married a very rich girl of Buffalo, Miss Elizabeth Thompson. Her fortune came from the Brush electric light, Mr. Brush being her grandfather. Mr. Cannon is a many sided young man. He dabbles in all the arts. He is a fair sculptor, paints quite well, sings, and is an enthusiastic devotee to music, as he is also to society. So it was naturally on the cards that he should do something especially entertaining and novel during the season. As something unusual these concerts stand alone in the winter's amusements.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY IN DEMAND.

The first was given at the magnificent residence of Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer on Madison Avenue. Every New Yorker is familiar with the house. It stands on a corner lot, is very large, and has a large court yard into which carriages may drive. There is no house in town better adapted to this special purpose than the Havemeyer residence. It takes a deal of room where the performers alone are numerous enough to fill any ordinary sized drawing room. At the Havemeyers, ball-room, dining-room, drawing-room, library and conservatory all open into each other. Add to this the fact that each room is superbly decorated and furnished in different style, and that the audience consisted of the wealthiest and most fashionable in the city, all in elaborate evening dress, and one can form some idea of these concerts, and can readily account for the smiling faces of both audience and musicians The program was listened to intently; there was no intermission, but at the close, a buffet supper was served, until 1 A. M. when the guests dispersed. The next of these Symphony Concerts will take place at Mr. Cannon's house, corner of Fifth Avenue and Twelth Street. It is known as the old Minturn house, although it now belongs to the estate of the late Mrs. Mark Hopkins Searle. Of course it is rather a snobbish idea, these private symphony concerts, but then our fashionable society is made up of snobs to a degree, and besides, it can be pardoned in the general idea of the ultra-rich to do something out of the common. Mr. Cannon intends eventually to build a private palace that shall contain a studio, theater, and covered garden.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C sharp minor, op. 131.

Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo e molto contabile.—Presto.—
Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET in A major, op. 26.

Allegro non troppo.—Poco adagio.—
Poco allegro.—Allegro.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Piano.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

The date of the Fifth Concert is January 16.

Madame Nordica's

American Tour · · ·

Season of 1892-93

OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD,

Monday, Evening, Jan. 2.

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS.

[68]

...LIGURN, MAINE,

Friday, December 16, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

They tell us that local audiences are cold and undemonstrative but the statement is hardly consistent with the rousing reception the great artiste, Nordica, Miss Maud Powell and Signor Del Puente received in City Hall last evening.

* * * *

The time has arrived when the best talent that the country affords in none too good for the music lovers of Auburn and Lewiston and surrounding towns.

It has at length been demonstrated that our people will give their support to genuine merit.

* * * *

Mr. Isadore Luckstone.—A stout every-day sort of looking man, with an air of confidence which is reassuring to the audience, but who is a brilliant performer on the piano and a skilful and sympathetic accompanist.

* * * *

Miss Louise Rollwagen.—A light complexioned young lady with a face which is indicative of her German parentage, in a becoming decollete toilet of black, with a rich pleasing contralto voice.

* * * *

Mr. Leo Schultz—A rather stout gentleman with a face which reminded one forcibly of pictures of some of the old tone-masters, the resemblance to which is heightened by a peculiar hasty arrangement of hair around the rather passive features, who plays the violincello with the almost magical touch of Paganini.

Signor Guiseppe Del Puente—A gentleman with a foreign cast of features lighted up with a good-humored smile which captivates the audience at once even before his magnificent and powerful baritone is heard.

Miss Maud Powell—A rather slender, dark complexioned young lady with expressive black eyes, in a simple light pink gown but with a power in that small arm and those tiny fingers which is manifest as soon as they touch the king of instruments.

Mme. Lillian Nordica—The beautiful sweet singer whom Maine is so proud to have reared among her rugged hills. With what a rare smile are those faultless features lighted up as she comes forward to greet her audience amidst thunders of applause. The very personification, of womanly dignity, beauty and grace is Nordica and when she opens her mouth there issue tones as pure and sweet as

...last night accompanied by her pianist, Mr. Luckstone.

He took his seat by the instrument, and waited just an instant.

Nordica walked over to him and smiling that smile which is almost as entrancing as her voice, spoke a few words in an undertone. The audience did not catch the words but as soon as the musician's fingers ran across the keys they knew what had been said.

It was the familiar, the immortal notes of "Home Sweet Home," they heard.

In an instant there was such an applause as no music in City Hall has ever evoked.

Then the great singer turned, faced the magnificent audience which had assembled to pay her tribute, and smiled at the enthusiasm which the simple notes had awakened.

Luckstone finished his prelude, the prima donna threw back her shoulders and in those silvery tones which have set the musical critics of the world into raptures, voiced the words which have made the name of John Howard Payne imperishable.

"Mid pleasures and palaces though I may roam" she sang, and as she did so the minds of her audience and her own, no doubt, went back for an instant over the marvellous career of the Maine girl.

Then, and her voice softened perceptibly, came the words, "There is no place like home."

If ever a singer felt a song, and if ever an audience shared the feeling it was then.

Fresh from triumphs, such as few in this world are permitted to enjoy, she was back to her home, before her own people singing to them of "Home sweet home."

"Give me my lowly thatched cottage again.
The birds singing sweetly that come at my call,
Give me them, and that peace of mind, dearer than all,"

she sang and her soul seemed to go forth in the words, for Lillian Norton has had sorrows as well as triumphs.

The audience listened, breathless lest one glorious note escape them, too spellbound to think of applause.

At last it was over; the tones of voice and piano died away, and then came a very thunder of applause.

As Nordica walked away she brushed something from the corner of her eye with her handkerchief and many in the audience had to do the same thing.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1892

ELABORATE PRIVATE CONCERTS.

...will be pleased to know

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C sharp minor, op. 131.

Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo e molto contabile.—Presto.—
Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET in A major, op. 26.

Allegro non troppo.—Poco adagio.—
Poco allegro.—Allegro.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Piano.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

The date of the Fifth Concert is January 16.

NEW BEDFORD OPERA HOUSE,

MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 2, AT 8.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna Soprano

Mme. Lillian Nordica

ACCOMPANIED BY

MISS HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL,
The noted New York Contralto.

MR. PAYNE CLARK,
The Favorite Tenor.

SIG. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE,
The Eminent Baritone.

MR. ISIDORE LUCKSTONE,
Pianist and Accompanist.

MR. J. FRANK DONAHOE,
Organist,

AND THE

RHEINBERGER CLUB,
F. L. DIMAN, Director.

Part First — MISCELLANEOUS CONCERT.

Part Second — MASCAGNI'S BEAUTIFUL OPERA,
Given entire (in Concert form),

"CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA."

Prices, 75c., $1.00, and $1.50. Ticket sale opens at the Box Office Thursday, December 29.

WHILE the concert given last season by Mme. Nordica was as interesting as any ever heard here, the one now announced will certainly excel it in merit and attractiveness. With the valuable assistance of the Rheinberger Club and Mr. Diman, it is proposed to give as a second part to the programme Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," for the first time in this city. The opera will be given entire, but in concert form. No opera produced of late years has created such a furore throughout the civilized world as this magnificent, stirring, and fiery work. Last season almost every opera company, in both continents, was producing it; and the excitement over it was intense. To further add to the interest of the occasion, not only will the soprano role be sung by such a great artist as Madame Nordica, but two singers who took part in the grand first production in America at the Philadelphia Academy of Music will be heard, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, the noted New York oratorio and operatic contralto, and Sig. Del. Puente, the eminent baritone, who has sung with every great prima donna and opera company in this country and abroad for the past ten years. Mr. Payne Clark, the tenor, who has sung the part in New York and with the American Opera in Philadelphia, has also been secured; and a splendid performance is assured.

Daily Gazette

AUBURN, MAINE,

Friday, December 16, 1892.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

They tell us that local audiences are cold and undemonstrative but the statement is hardly consistent with the rousing reception the great artiste, Nordica, Miss Maud Powell and Signor Del Puente received in City Hall last evening.

* * * *

The time has arrived when the best talent that the country affords in none too good for the music lovers of Auburn and Lewiston and surrounding towns.

It has at length been demonstrated that our people will give their support to genuine merit.

* * * *

Mr. Isadore Luckstone.—A stout every-day sort of looking man, with an air of confidence which is reassuring to the audience, but who is a brilliant performer on the piano and a skilful and sympathetic accompanist.

* * * *

Miss Louise Rollwagen.—A light complexioned young lady with a face which is indicative of her German parentage, in a becoming decollete toilet of black, with a rich pleasing contralto voice.

* * * *

Mr. Leo Schultz—A rather stout gentleman with a face which reminded one forcibly of pictures of some of the old tone-masters, the resemblance to which is heightened by a peculiar hasty arrangement of hair around the rather passive features, who plays the violincello with the almost magical touch of Paganini.

Signor Guiseppe Del Puente—A gentleman with a foreign cast of features lighted up with a good-humored smile which captivates the audience at once even before his magnificent and powerful baritone is heard.

Miss Maud Powell—A rather slender, dark complexioned young lady with expressive black eyes, in a simple light pink gown but with a power in that small arm and those tiny fingers which is manifest as soon as they touch the king of instruments.

Mme. Lillian Nordica—The beautiful sweet singer whom Maine is so proud to have reared among her rugged hills. With what a rare smile are those faultless features lighted up as she comes forward to greet her audience amidst thunders of applause. The very personification, of womanly dignity, beauty and grace is Nordica and when she opens her mouth there issue tones as pure and sweet as [illegible] warbled.

[illegible] to a second recall after her last number Nordica appeared before her audience last night accompanied by her pianist, Mr. Luckstone.

He took his seat by the instrument, and waited just an instant.

Nordica walked over to him and smiling that smile which is almost as entrancing as her voice, spoke a few words in an undertone. The audience did not catch the words but as soon as the musician's fingers ran across the keys they knew what had been said.

It was the familiar, the immortal notes of "Home Sweet Home," they heard.

In an instant there was such an applause as no music in City Hall has ever evoked.

Then the great singer turned, faced the magnificent audience which had assembled to pay her tribute, and smiled at the enthusiasm which the simple notes had awakened.

Luckstone finished his prelude, the prima donna threw back her shoulders and in those silvery tones which have set the musical critics of the world into raptures, voiced the words which have made the name of John Howard Payne imperishable.

"Mid pleasures and palaces though I may roam" she sang, and as she did so the minds of her audience and her own, no doubt, went back for an instant over the marvellous career of the Maine girl.

Then, and her voice softened perceptibly, came the words, "There is no place like home."

If ever a singer felt a song, and if ever an audience shared the feeling it was then.

Fresh from triumphs, such as few in this world are permitted to enjoy, she was back to her home, before her own people singing to them of "Home sweet home."

"Give me my lowly thatched cottage again.
The birds singing sweetly that come at my call,
Give me them, and that peace of mind, dearer than all,"

she sang and her soul seemed to go forth in the words, for Lillian Norton has had sorrows as well as triumphs.

The audience listened, breathless lest one glorious note escape them, too spellbound to think of applause.

At last it was over; the tones of voice and piano died away, and then came a very thunder of applause.

As Nordica walked away she brushed something from the corner of her eye with her handkerchief and many in the audience had to do the same thing.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1892

ELABORATE PRIVATE CONCERTS.

[illegible]

Madame Nordica.

* * *

Mme. Lillian Nordica is so well and favorably known in this vicinity that little need be said in offering the accompanying announcement.

At the close of her highly successful American tour on February 1 last Madame Nordica returned to London to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, under the management of Sir Augustus Harris.

During the spring season her services were in constant demand for high-class concerts. Among others she sang at the Richter Concerts and at the London Symphony Concerts (Mr. Henschel's).

In September she was honored with engagements as principal soprano for the Festivals at Gloucester, Norwich, and Cardiff. Her contract with Mess. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau for the opera season in New York having been cancelled by the burning of the Metropolitan Opera House, Madame Nordica will again devote herself to the concert stage. This unexpected announcement has been eagerly welcomed by the leading musical societies throughout the country, and many important engagements have already been closed, among them those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and the Apollo Club of Chicago.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C sharp minor, op. 131.

Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo e molto contabile.—Presto.—
Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET in A major, op. 26.

Allegro non troppo.—Poco adagio.—
Poco allegro.—Allegro.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Piano.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

The date of the Fifth Concert is January 16.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Nocturne, E-minor (posthumous), Chopin; Scherzo, B-minor, Chopin; Etude de Concert," Martucci; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 4 (Italian), Mendelssohn. It was a curious jumbling of composers; a thing of shreds and patches; almost touchingly naïve as an example of programme-making, and, on the whole, chillingly uninteresting The soloist was Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a new comer here, with a profusion of black hair, not Paderewskially, or Helmanically suggestive of a garden of luxuriant weeds growing wildly at random, but arranged in glossy curls. She was to have played Tschaikowsky's second concerto; but, according to the programme, that composition was withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided, and the pieces named were substituted. They were scarcely up to the dignity of a Symphony concert. The little woman has a brilliant and facile technique, a beautiful touch, and she plays with precision, ease and fluency. The piano has evidently no difficulties of which the is not the master, and her performances were wholly admirable in their finger play. Beyond this they were not especially interesting, except, perhaps, for the graceful refinement of method she brought to bear on them. We have, however, ravened and glutted on technique, and difficult technique has become so much easier than is easy technique, that we have ceased to wonder at it, and refuse to be comforted by it in the absence of other more intellectual essentials. The Chopin pieces were clearly and cleverly played, but they were not interpreted with any marked skill or special individuality of style, and frequently there was a confusing absence of rhythm. The artist was heard to best advantage in the Martucci selection, a severe technical exercise, bristling with exacting passages, and not unmelodious. Musically, it is not worth much; but it enabled the player to display her finger ability in its fullest development. It excited the audience to a pitch of great enthusiasm, and after two recalls, the artist responded with another brilliant finger exercise, of the same order, which again excited the audience to recall the player twice more, and to insist on another encore. This was granted, and the concert assumed the aspect of a piano recital. On this last occasion a pretty little piece of modern-antique was given with much delicacy, and the audience once more gave way to a rapture of admiration. Two encores at a symphony concert initiated an innovation which, it is to be hoped, may not serve as a precedent to be followed. This claptrap music seemed strangely out of place at these concerts; but the hearers seemed to enjoy it hugely, and the orchestra applauded it heartily, and therefore it is quite possible that we were unable to appreciate how highly proper it was. We may be, in all likelihood, fully as wide of the mark when we confess that we cannot see the necessity of going to New York for a pianist of this order, while an artist of Mr. Baermann's rank and classical tastes has not been heard at these concerts for three seasons, and while at least one other excellent home artist has not been accorded any hearing whatever, under the regime of the present conductor. The "Waldweben" was finely played by the orchestra. Not so the symphony, of which the first movement and the finale were hurried through as if there was a desire to show how fast the players could perform them without meeting with disaster. The programme for the next concert is the following odd aberration: Overture, "Benvenato Cellini," Berlioz; Concerto for violin in D-minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; Symphony, B-flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Mr. I Schultzer. The programme books, by the way, continue to be industriously unedifying in point of information and ingeniously ponderous in point of style.

— The eighth Symphony concert was the gala night of the current season. The artistic eye was gratified to see that the white fur rug had given place an Eastern rug of warm tone. During the choral portion of the Ninth Symphony, the little conductor was "built up" so high that he almost rivalled Beethoven in height, if not in genius. If the attention of the audience wandered, it had a chance to study Mrs. Apthorp, who, in a stunning ball gown of blue tulle, listened to the music, on her way to Mrs. Amory's dance, or to a beautiful girl among the contraltos, whose perfect features might put to shame the Boston belles. Mrs. Robert C. Winthrop, Mr. and Mrs Joseph Bradlee, Dr. and Mrs. Inches, Miss Stackpole, Mr. William Blake, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. W. C. Lovering, Miss Lovering, Mr. and Mrs H. M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mrs. Robert Grant, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mr. Thorndike, Prof. Royce, Mr. S. H. Dixey, Mr. W. Dorr, Miss Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Lamson, Mr. J. E Priest, Miss Hunt and Miss Andrew were a few of those noticed in the great crush.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was characterized by the appearance of Eugenia Castellano, a young lady who possesses a broad and comprehensive method rarely found in an artist of maturer years. The rehearsal on Friday afternoon was her first American performance, and the result proves that she will always be a welcomed and, it is to be hoped, a frequent visitor to this city. She is a remarkable performer, the more so when her youth is considered, and in the difficult numbers she played she showed surprising skill and expression. Chopin's Nocturne in E minor (op. posthumous), Chopin's Scherzo in B minor and Martucci's Etude de Concert were the selections presented, and each was executed with brilliancy and artistic phrasing. The orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major, and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys." All have been given here before, and the repetition was fully in accord with Mr. Nikisch's high standards. Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the soloist at the tenth symphony rehearsal and concert, and the programme will be as follows: Overture, Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz; concerto for violin in D minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; symphony in B flat, Volkmann.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 25, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

At least one classically fine work made the symphony concert last evening seem as though not wholly given in vain. Happily, too, a hearing was spared of the Tschaikowsky pianoforte concerto, No. 2, in G major, and the soloist, Miss Eugenia Castellano, was thereby enabled to appear doubtless at a far worthier advantage with a judiciously chosen group of soli as follows: a Chopin, Nocturne in E minor (Op. posthumous); b Chopin, Scherzo in B minor; c Martucci, Etude de Concert. How Mendelssohn himself appreciated his own pet symphony is made evident in his letters from Italy in 1831. For example, he writes to his sisters from Rome on the 22d February, 1831: "Italian symphony is making great progress. It will be the gayest thing I have ever done, especially the last movement."

Yet at this time Mendelssohn had not found anything just right for the "adagio" that he first contemplated, and felt as he tersely expressed it that he must put it off for Naples. This adagio of Mendelssohn's fancy afterwards became an andante, which can only be described as a psychical tone poem in which is related so far as possible the æsthetic impressions the composer's visit to Naples made upon him. In fact the symphony as a whole is full of the open air, the blue sky and the Italian "Season of Blossoms" that he ever loved so much; while the finale is plainly inspired by the Carnival at Rome. The finale is described as a Saltarello, a weird yet lively Italian dance that is not so well known here as the Tarantella, from which it notably differs in quality of step: but there are three distinct themes in the finale of the Italian symphony, and the third theme is unmistakably a Tarantella.

The overture by Lalo, "Le Roy d'Ys," was, unless we greatly err, first heard here last season. It offers a capital illustration of its composers's sensuous individualism and perhaps is one of the most successful overtures of the unique class to which it belongs, having many felicitous touches in the instrumentation and all due propriety of contour.

Of the young artiste who appeared at this concert it is a pleasure to testify that her precocity is of the rarest kind. Her command of the keyboard, her phenomenal abandon, her naive unconsciousness of all technical difficulty were simply entrancing in their effect. In brief Miss Castellano is as bright and intelligent, as talented a pianist as has made a Boston debut for many a day. How temperamentally well balanced she may be as a musician can not easily be determined as the result of a single hearing, but that she is a tone-artist by intuition, that she has been masterly well taught, and that her prospects as a concert pianist are extraordinary, will not be called in question even by the most fastidious pedagogue. The orchestra played the Wagner music exquisitely, and the overture and symphony left little to be desired. The attendance at the concert included but a very meagre number of the regular patrons.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet, assisted by Mr. William H. Sherwood, gave the second concert of its fifth season Tuesday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The programme included Beethoven's quartet for strings in F major op. 59; Grieg's sonata in A minor for pianoforte and alto, and Mendelssohn's trio for pianoforte and strings in D minor, op. 49. Mr. Adamowski and his associates gave the famous op. 59, a delicious charm in their performance which made it all seem extra dear. It was an admirable performance. The sonata by Grieg for cello and piano is not so well known here as the violin and pianoforte sonata in the same key. It is a delightful work, its various themes being one and all worked out in a masterly manner and with just such delicate, piquant and exquisite figures as thoroughly characteristic of Grieg. Messrs. Sherwood and Adamowski were heart and hand as one in the performance, which was throughout admirable.

The concert closed with a thoroughly excellent performance of Mendelssohn's trio in D minor.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1892.

The First Appearance of Eugenia Castellano.

A Symphony Concert Becomes a Pianoforte Recital.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth Symphony Concert was in reality a pianoforte recital given by Miss Eugenia Castellano in Music Hall Saturday evening, with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Puff had already beaten the drum of her announcement. He had proclaimed to the listening crowd that the signorina was hardly over "five feet tall and that her father is a Major in the Italian army." It seems that she owes her musical education to her mother—Teresa Castellano Bordoni, Sgambati, Martucci and Van Westerhaut. She made a triumphal tour through Italy when she was twelve years of age. Filippo Filippi was in the habit of seizing her hands after she had played to him, and he was then accustomed to exclaim, "Divine, divine! Nothing like it except Rubinstein." Van Westerhaut, the Hollander, refuses to play his own compositions in her presence. The Signorina was born in Naples. She is the youngest of five children. She is almost 16 years old. "Her small hands are incapable of the management of pins, buttons, needles, etc." "Her temperament is intense, warm, affectionate, but without eccentricity, noble and well balanced." There is nothing left to the imagination by Mr. Puff. "She has strong white teeth, and in her short red petticoat her 15 years shrink to 12." Truly has the young girl brought with her "a golconda of press notices," to borrow an ingenious phrase from the Wolff-Hollman circular.

We are also told that the Signorina was "discovered" in New York by the conductor and several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They heard her play and were at once persuaded. It was announced last week that Miss Castellano would appear in Boston with the orchestra, and that the battle ground would be Tschaikowsky's second concerto. It appears that the orchestral parts of the concerto were incorrect, and therefore the pianist was heard in pieces that were chiefly of the salon order.

When Miss Castellano walked across the stage of Music Hall she seemed an apparition from the fantastic world created by E. T. A. Hoffmann. She might have just come from playing to the student Ansemus. She is of near kin to Rath Krespel, and is a pupil of the melancholy Johannes Kreisler.

Her personality fascinates. Her locks are arranged carefully, yet are they stiish. She is apparently unconscious of all except her music; yet she absorbs the attention of the hearer. In certain respects her performance showed full-blown maturity. And there was ever present a sense of volcanic passion that would become imperious in the course of the revolutions of the earth, and suddenly finding a vent would sweep all before it. The music box is dangerously near the closed door of the furnace.

She did not do much with the Chopin numbers. She played the nocturne in E minor (op. posth). She played it as though it were an exercise. So too her delivery of the B minor scherzo was chiefly welcome on account of mechanical dexterity. Yet in this very scherzo she showed the inconsistency of a passionate woman; for there would be moments of unexpected warmth and hysteria, and when an outburst was expected the woman would be shy and cold, prosaic, intent only on her task. Now the concert study by Martucci, a brilliant show piece, was in a sense ennobled by the temperament of the player.

Miss Castellano was recalled, and, defying the traditions of the Symphony Concert, she followed the example of Messrs. Pachmann and Reichmann and acknowledged the applause by a second performance. She played the "Momento Capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am correctly informed. Again there was a storm of applause, and again Miss Castellano played. Her selection was a delightfully quaint and musical gavotte by the same Van Westerhaut. The audience and the orchestra were pleased exceedingly, and during the course of this entertainment flowers were presented to the pianist.

Miss Castellano is in many ways a remarkably interesting pianist. There is no denying that she is well worth the hearing. But whether she is merely a clever machine that at times seems inspired by human thought and human passion, or whether she is a musician of temperament who chooses the pianoforte as the instrument of the expression of her thought, can best be determined after she has been heard in a programme that makes more exacting demands, that does not merely call for digital dexterity. I am strongly inclined to believe that Miss Castellano is a musician by birth, and that she will prove easily to an audience her right to frequent and respectful hearings. With her strange and yet winning personality, with her undoubted proficiency, she can afford to dispense with Mr. Puff and his associates and the society of patrons and patronesses.

The orchestra played Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Mendelssohn's 4th Symphony.

The programme of the next concert, Dec. 31, will be: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Volkmann's Symphony, in B flat, and Vieuxtemps's violin concerto, D minor, No. 4. Mr. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give their fourth concert in Chickering Hall this evening. The programme is: Quartette, C sharp minor, op. 132, Beethoven; piano quartette, A major, Brahms.

The friends of Wilhelm Heinrich, wishing to show their appreciation of the valuable service [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

A PIANO RECITAL IN AN ORCHESTRAL FRAME.

The concert of Saturday was in a large degree a piano recital, set in an orchestral frame. One can best understand how the dignity of these concerts has departed when the circumstances attending this concert are taken into consideration. The concerto originally announced (by Tschaikowsky) was shelved "on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided,"—according to a footnote on the programme. In its stead were given three solo works of the usual recital order. Two of these were Chopin numbers, for which it was scarcely worth importing a pianist into this city of pianists. The third was a showy display of technique that was totally out of place at a symphony concert, and was about as well fitted to precede Wagner's "Waldesweben" as a Tupper poem to precede Shakespeare. But, after all, it did not precede Wagner, for an unexpected interpolation took place that must have surprised the regular symphony auditors. Recalled with considerable enthusiasm, which, judged from the technical side, was deserved, the young pianist—Miss Castellano by name,—tripped gaily back to the instrument and added another piece of virtuosity. Again applauded, she returned and gave a quaint, Gavotte-like work in the antique vein. There was some danger of her adding yet another number, but with the double encore the interpolations ceased. There may be a few who imagine that it is hypercritical to censure a young artist for readily yielding to what she conceived to be the demand of the public; to such it must be stated that there is an art (now almost a lost one) which is called "programme-making," and five piano solos, mostly of the personal display type, violated the unities terribly, and did not serve to usher in Wagner and Mendelssohn in a satisfactory manner. Public applause is not the chief factor in this matter, although the notions of the symphonic authorities might lead one to think differently, for the public applaud Patti's "Home Sweet Home" with as much fervor as "Walther's Prize Song," and were our conductor to give Gouned's "Marche Funebre d'une Marionette" he would win more hand-clapping response than ever has been given to a Beethoven symphony. Miss Castellano deserves much praise for a brilliant technical display, but not for the aptness of her selections, or for any especial depth of feeling displayed in them, but the last quality may come with riper years, for the pianist is probably the youngest that has recently appeared at these concerts.

The overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" was most brilliantly performed. It is just the music that gives our conductor a chance to display his best points. Bold martial rhythms, tender, Goldmarkian, sensuous love-themes, and fiery trumpet fanfares, here unite to give a picture that is none too deep, but is graphic, and decidedly popular in the best sense of the word. One can pay tribute, too, to the unforced style of the writing: though there is little of novelty, there is nothing of straining. It was a spicy work, spicily performed.

Wagner's "Waldesweben" was both good and bad in its presentation. The first part was ragged, but the passages for the strings divisi were very well done and the oboe work was commendable. The passages for the Glockenspiel were not in strict time, and blurred the ensemble occasionally.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony began with a furious tempo, but the strings were able to sustain it, although the wind instruments showed occasionally that the pace was too severe for them. The introductory measures of the andante were very tattered and irregular but the viola work in the beautiful chief theme was admirable. What a theme it is to portray the true viola tone-color! It has more of the dreamy melancholy of the instrument than even the theme of Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, which is considered the most typical of viola themes. In the trio of the scherzo the horns did their work without a break, but the passages could have been more delicately shaded. The Saltarello was very brilliant, and the rapid triplet figures were given, at least by the strings, with a degree of clearness that was astonishing: the dainty lightness of it all proved that the conductor appreciated the distinction between the skipping grace of the Soltarello and the vehemence of the Tarantella a distinction that is not always made. I had nearly forgotten to chronicle the cello theme in the opening overture. It was entirely excellent. But in the matter of solo work our orchestra is almost beyond cis-Atlantic competition, and every obbligato is nearly perfect. May we some day be able to say the same of every ensemble effect.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[69]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Nocturne, E-minor (posthumous), Chopin; Scherzo, B-minor, Chopin; Etude de Concert," Martucci; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 4 (Italian), Mendelssohn. It was a curious jumbling of composers; a thing of shreds and patches; almost touchingly naïve as an example of programme-making, and, on the whole, chillingly uninteresting The soloist was Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a new comer here, with a profusion of black hair, not Paderewskially, or Hollmanically suggestive of a garden of luxuriant weeds growing wildly at random, but arranged in glossy curls. She was to have played Tschaikowsky's second concerto; but, according to the programme, that composition was withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided, and the pieces named were substituted. They were scarcely up to the dignity of a Symphony concert. The little woman has a brilliant and facile technique, a beautiful touch, and she plays with precision, ease and fluency. The piano has evidently no difficulties of which the is not the master, and her performances were wholly admirable in their finger play. Beyond this they were not especially interesting, except, perhaps, for the graceful refinement of method she brought to bear on them. We have, however, ravened and glutted on technique, and difficult technique has become so much easier than is easy technique, that we have ceased to wonder at it, and refuse to be comforted by it in the absence of other more intellectual essentials. The Chopin pieces were clearly and cleverly played, but they were not interpreted with any marked skill or special individuality of style, and frequently there was a confusing absence of rhythm. The artist was heard to best advantage in the Martucci selection, a severe technical exercise, bristling with exacting passages, and not unmelodious. Musically, it is not worth much; but it enabled the player to display her finger ability in its fullest development. It excited the audience to a pitch of great enthusiasm, and after two recalls, the artist responded with another brilliant finger exercise, of the same order, which again excited the audience to recall the player twice more, and to insist on another encore. This was granted, and the concert assumed the aspect of a piano recital. On this last occasion a pretty little piece of modern-antique was given with much delicacy, and the audience once more gave way to a rapture of admiration. Two encores at a symphony concert initiated an innovation which, it is to be hoped, may not serve as a precedent to be followed. This claptrap music seemed strangely out of place at these concerts; but the hearers seemed to enjoy it hugely, and the orchestra applauded it heartily, and therefore it is quite possible that we were unable to appreciate how highly proper it was. We may be, in all likelihood, fully as wide of the mark when we confess that we cannot see the necessity of going to New York for a pianist of this order, while an artist of Mr. Baermann's rank and classical tastes has not been heard at these concerts for three seasons, and while at least one other excellent home artist has not been accorded any hearing whatever, under the regime of the present conductor. The "Waldweben" was finely played by the orchestra. Not so the symphony, of which the first movement and the finale were hurried through as if there was a desire to show how fast the players could perform them without meeting with disaster. The programme for the next concert is the following odd aberration: Overture, "Benvenato Cellini," Berlioz; Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; Symphony, B-flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Mr. I Schnitzer. The programme books, by the way, continue to be industriously unedifying in point of information and ingeniously ponderous in point of style.

— The eighth Symphony concert was the gala night of the current season. The artistic eye was gratified to see that the white fur rug had given place an Eastern rug of warm tone. During the choral portion of the Ninth Symphony, the little conductor was "built up" so high that he almost rivalled Beethoven in height, if not in genius. If the attention of the audience wandered, it had a chance to study Mrs. Apthorp, who, in a stunning ball gown of blue tulle, listened to the music, on her way to Mrs. Amory's dance, or to a beautiful girl among the contraltos, whose perfect features might put to shame the Boston belles. Mrs. Robert C. Winthrop, Mr and Mrs Joseph Bradlee, Dr. and Mrs. Inches, Miss Stackpole, Mr. William Blake, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. W. C. Lovering, Miss Lovering, Mr. and Mrs H M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mrs. Robert Grant, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mr. Thormike, Prof. Royce, Mr R. H. Dixey, Mr [illegible]m. Dorr, Miss Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Lemson, Mr. J. E Priest, Miss Hunt and Miss Andrew were a few of those noticed in the great crush.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was characterized by the appearance of Eugenia Castellano, a young lady who possesses a broad and comprehensive method rarely found in an artist of maturer years. The rehearsal on Friday afternoon was her first American performance, and the result proves that she will always be a welcomed and, it is to be hoped, a frequent visitor to this city. She is a remarkable performer, the more so when her youth is considered, and in the difficult numbers she played she showed surprising skill and expression. Chopin's Nocturne in E minor (op. posthumous), Chopin's Scherzo in B minor and Martucci's Etude de Concert were the selections presented, and each was executed with brilliancy and artistic phrasing. The orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major, and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys." All have been given here before, and the repetition was fully in accord with Mr. Nikisch's high standards. Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the soloist at the tenth symphony rehearsal and concert, and the programme will be as follows: Overture, Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz; concerto for violin in D minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; symphony in B flat, Volkmann.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 25, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

At least one classically fine work made the symphony concert last evening seem as though not wholly given in vain. Happily, too, a hearing was spared of the Tschaikowsky pianoforte concerto, No. 2, in G major, and the soloist, Miss Eugenia Castellano, was thereby enabled to appear doubtless at a far worthier advantage with a judiciously chosen group of soli as follows: a Chopin, Nocturne in E minor (Op. posthumous); b Chopin, Scherzo in B minor; c Martucci, Etude de Concert. How Mendelssohn himself appreciated his own pet symphony is made evident in his letters from Italy in 1831. For example, he writes to his sisters from Rome on the 22d February, 1831: "Italian symphony is making great progress. It will be the gayest thing I have ever done, especially the last movement."

Yet at this time Mendelssohn had not found anything just right for the "adagio" that he first contemplated, and felt as he tersely expressed it that he must put it off for Naples. This adagio of Mendelssohn's fancy afterwards became an andante, which can only be described as a psychical tone poem in which is related so far as possible the æsthetic impressions the composer's visit to Naples made upon him. In fact the symphony as a whole is full of the open air, the blue sky and the Italian "Season of Blossoms" that he ever loved so much; while the finale is plainly inspired by the Carnival at Rome. The finale is described as a Saltarello, a weird yet lively Italian dance that is not so well known here as the Tarantella, from which it notably differs in quality of step: but there are three distinct themes in the finale of the Italian symphony, and the third theme is unmistakably a Tarantella.

The overture by Lalo, "Le Roy d'Ys," was, unless we greatly err, first heard here last season. It offers a capital illustration of its composers's sensuous individualism and perhaps is one of the most successful overtures of the unique class to which it belongs, having many felicitous touches in the instrumentation and all due propriety of contour.

Of the young artiste who appeared at this concert it is a pleasure to testify that her precocity is of the rarest kind. Her command of the keyboard, her phenomenal abandon, her naive unconsciousness of all technical difficulty were simply entrancing in their effect. In brief Miss Castellano is as bright and intelligent, as talented a pianist as has made a Boston debut for many a day. How temperamentally well balanced she may be as a musician can not easily be determined as the result of a single hearing, but that she is a tone-artist by intuition, that she has been masterly well taught, and that her prospects as a concert pianist are extraordinary, will not be called in question even by the most fastidious pedagogue. The orchestra played the Wagner music exquisitely, and the overture and symphony left little to be desired. The attendance at the concert included but a very meagre number of the regular patrons.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet, assisted by Mr. William H. Sherwood, gave the second concert of its fifth season Tuesday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The programme included Beethoven's quartet for strings in F major op. 59; Grieg's sonata in A minor for pianoforte and alto, and Mendelssohn's trio for pianoforte and strings in D minor, op. 49. Mr. Adamowski and his associates gave the famous op. 59, a delicious charm in their performance which made it all seem extra dear. It was an admirable performance. The sonata by Grieg for cello and piano is not so well known here as the violin and pianoforte sonata in the same key. It is a delightful work, its various themes being one and all worked out in a masterly manner and with just such delicate, piquant and exquisite figures as thoroughly characteristic of Grieg. Messrs. Sherwood and Adamowski were heart and hand as one in the performance, which was throughout admirable.

The concert closed with a thoroughly excellent performance of Mendelssohn's trio in D minor.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1892.

The First Appearance of Eugenia Castellano.

A Symphony Concert Becomes a Pianoforte Recital.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth Sympony Concert was in reality a pianoforte recital given by Miss Eugenia Castellano in Music Hall Saturday evening, with the assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Puff had already beaten the drum of her announcement. He had proclaimed to the listening crowd that the signorina was hardly over "five feet tall and that her father is a Major in the Italian army." It seems that she owes her musical education to her mother—Teresa Castellano Bordoni, Sgambati, Martucci and Van Westerhaut. She made a triumphal tour through Italy when she was twelve years of age. Filippo Filippi was in the habit of seizing her hands after she had played to him, and he was then accustomed to exclaim, "Divine, divine! Nothing like it except Rubinstein." Van Westerhaut, the Hollander, refuses to play his own compositions in her presence. The Signorina was born in Naples. She is the youngest of five children. She is almost 16 years old. "Her small hands are incapable of the management of pins, buttons, needles, etc." "Her temperament is intense, warm, affectionate, but without eccentricity, noble and well balanced." There is nothing left to the imagination by Mr. Puff. "She has strong white teeth, and in her short red petticoat her 15 years shrink to 12." Truly has the young girl brought with her "a goiconda of press notices," to borrow an ingenious phrase from the Wolff-Hollman circular.

We are also told that the Signorina was "discovered" in New York by the conductor and several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They heard her play and were at once persuaded. It was announced last week that Miss Castellano would appear in Boston with the orchestra, and that the battle ground would be Tschaikowsy's second concerto. It appears that the orchestral parts of the concerto were incorrect, and therefore the pianist was heard in pieces that were chiefly of the Salon order.

When Miss Castellano walked across the stage of Music Hall she seemed an apparition from the fantastic world created by E. T. A. Hoffmann. She might have just come from playing to the student Anselmus. She is of near kin to Ruth Kresper, and is a pupil of the melancholy Johannes Kreisler.

Her personality fascinates. Her locks are arranged carefully, yet are they elfish. She is apparently unconscious of all except her music; yet she absorbs the attention of the hearer. In certain respects her performance showed full-blown maturity. And there was ever present a sense of volcanic passion that would become imperious in the course of the revolutions of the earth, and suddenly finding a vent would sweep all before it. The music box is dangerously near the closed door of the furnace.

She did not do much with the Chopin numbers. She played the nocturne in E minor (op. posth). She played it as though it were an exercise. So too her delivery of the B minor scherzo was chiefly welcome on account of mechanical dexterity. Yet in this very scherzo she showed the inconsistency of a passionate woman; for there would be moments of unexpected warmth and hysteria, and when an outburst was expected the woman would be shy and cold, prosaic, intent only on her task. Now the concert study by Martucci, a brilliant show piece, was in a sense ennobled by the temperament of the player.

Miss Castellano was recalled, and, defying the traditions of the Symphony Concert, she followed the example of Messrs. Pachmann and Reichmann and acknowledged the applause by a second performance. She played the "Momento Capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am correctly informed. Again there was a storm of applause, and again Miss Castellano played. Her selection was a delightfully quaint and musical gavotte by the same Van Westerhaut. The audience and the orchestra were pleased exceedingly, and during the course of this entertainment flowers were presented to the pianist.

Miss Castellano is in many ways a remarkably interesting pianist. There is no denying that she is well worth the hearing. But whether she is merely a clever machine that at times seems inspired by human thought and human passion, or whether she is a musician of temperament who chooses the pianoforte as the instrument of the expression of her thought, can best be determined after she has been heard in a programme that makes more exacting demands, that does not merely call for digital dexterity. I am strongly inclined to believe that Miss Castellano is a musician by birth, and that she will prove easily to an audience her right to frequent and respectful hearings. With her strange and yet winning personality, with her undoubted proficiency, she can afford to dispense with Mr. Puff and his associates and the society of patrons and patronesses.

The orchestra played Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Mendelssohn's 4th Symphony.

The programme of the next concert, Dec. 31, will be: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Volkmann's Symphony, in B flat, and Vieuxtemps's violin concerto, D minor, No. 4. Mr. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will give their fourth concert in Chickering Hall this evening. The programme is: Quartette, C sharp minor, op. 132, Beethoven; piano quartette, A major, Brahms.

The friends of Wilhelm Heinrich, wishing to show their appreciation of the valuable service [illegible] of song through the

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY.

A PIANO RECITAL IN AN ORCHESTRAL FRAME.

The concert of Saturday was in a large degree a piano recital, set in an orchestral frame. One can best understand how the dignity of these concerts has departed when the circumstances attending this concert are taken into consideration. The concerto originally announced (by Tschaikowsky) was shelved "on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided,"—according to a footnote on the programme. In its stead were given three solo works of the usual recital order. Two of these were Chopin numbers, for which it was scarcely worth importing a pianist into this city of pianists. The third was a showy display of technique that was totally out of place at a symphony concert, and was about as well fitted to precede Wagner's "Waldesweben" as a Tupper poem to precede Shakespeare. But, after all, it did not precede Wagner, for an unexpected interpolation took place that must have surprised the regular symphony auditors. Recalled with considerable enthusiasm, which, judged from the technical side, was deserved, the young pianist—Miss Castellano by name,—tripped gaily back to the instrument and added another piece of virtuosity. Again applauded, she returned and gave a quaint, Gavotte-like work in the antique vein. There was some danger of her adding yet another number, but with the double encore the interpolations ceased. There may be a few who imagine that it is hypercritical to censure a young artist for readily yielding to what she conceived to be the demand of the public; to such it must be stated that there is an art (now almost a lost one) which is called "programme-making," and five piano solos, mostly of the personal display type, violated the unities terribly, and did not serve to usher in Wagner and Mendelssohn in a satisfactory manner. Public applause is not the chief factor in this matter, although the actions of the symphonic authorities might lead one to think differently, for the public applaud Patti's "Home Sweet Home" with as much fervor as "Walther's Prize Song," and were our conductor to give Gounod's "Marche Funebre d'une Marionette" he would win more hand-clapping response than ever has been given to a Beethoven symphony. Miss Castellano deserves much praise for a brilliant technical display, but not for the aptness of her selections, or for any especial depth of feeling displayed in them, but the last quality may come with riper years, for the pianist is probably the youngest that has recently appeared at these concerts.

The overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" was most brilliantly performed. It is just the music that gives our conductor a chance to display his best points. Bold martial rhythms, tender, Goldmarkian, sensuous love-themes, and fiery trumpet fanfares, here unite to give a picture that is none too deep, but is graphic, and decidedly popular in the best sense of the word. One can pay tribute, too, to the unforced style of the writing: though there is little of novelty, there is nothing of straining. It was a spicy work, spicily performed.

Wagner's "Waldesweben" was both good and bad in its presentation. The first part was ragged, but the passages for the strings divisi were very well done and the oboe work was commendable. The passages for the Glockenspiel were not in strict time, and blurred the ensemble occasionally.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony began with a furious tempo, but the strings were able to sustain it, although the wind instruments showed occasionally that the pace was too severe for them. The introductory measures of the andante were very tattered and irregular but the viola work in the beautiful chief theme was admirable. What a theme it is to portray the true viola tone-color! It has more of the dreamy melancholy of the instrument than even the theme of Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, which is considered the most typical of viola themes. In the trio of the scherzo the horns did their work without a break, but the passages could have been more delicately shaded. The Saltarello was very brilliant, and the rapid triplet figures were given, at least by the strings, with a degree of clearness that was astonishing: the dainty lightness of it all proved that the conductor appreciated the distinction between the skipping grace of the Soltarello and the vehemence of the Tarantella a distinction that is not always made. I had nearly forgotten to chronicle the cello theme in the opening overture. It was entirely excellent. But in the matter of solo work our orchestra is almost beyond cis-Atlantic competition, and every obbligato is nearly perfect. May we some day be able to say the same of every ensemble effect.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 178.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist Eugenia Castellano.

The patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were given a very pleasant surprise last evening in the appearance of Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a pianist who made her American debut on this occasion.

The young artist may well take pride in the success attending her introduction to this country, and it is entirely safe to predict for her a brilliant career, if the triumphs of last evening's appearance may be taken as a measure of her abilities.

She comes to this country as the representative of a school little known here in recent years, for she is a player of the pianoforte, and not a mere mechanical manipulator of the key board, with a prodigious memory and a firm belief in the standard repertory of the day.

Her appearance was to have been made in the second Tschaikowsky concerto, but the incompleteness of the parts supplied the orchestra made it necessary to substitute solo numbers including Chopin's Nocturne in E minor (op.), and Scherzo in B minor and Martucci's Etude de Concert.

The signorina came before her public an utter stranger, but the entire confidence and self possession which characterized her entrance predisposed the audience in her favor, and before she had concluded the Nocturne she was an accepted Boston favorite.

She is a master of the technique of the pianoforte, but her command of the keyboard has been made a means and not an end, and the drill incidental to the acquirement of her skill in the manipulation of the keyboard has not, as is too often the case, lessened in the least degree the development of her artistic nature.

She is a born musician, and the refinement, sentiment, and the warmth of her temperament all contribute to the effect of her playing. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic; she shows a reserve power in the broadest passages that is surprising in a woman, and one so young especially; her tone is never forced beyond a pure musical quality, and the greatest rapidity of movement attainable is accompanied by such a clearness and accuracy that every note is given its full value.

Such playing, while showing the intelligence which appeals to the mental faculties, touches the inner nature of the music-lover and gives a sense of satisfaction which no words can describe.

Her most artistic interpretation of the Chopin numbers created a great impression upon the audience, but at the finish of the marvellously brilliant etude by her old teacher, Martucci, both her public and the orchestra found vent for their enthusiasm in the most extravagant expressions of approval, and after four recalls she added as an encore number "Il Momento Cappricioso," by Van Westerhout. Even this failed to satisfy the audience, now in a state of delight over the new sensation, and, following a further double recall, the signorina completed her triumphs by playing in a superb fashion a gavotte in the 16th century style by Van Westerhout. It was a great success for the signorina, and the quick recognition of the rare abilities of the new comer reflected credit upon the intelligence of the audience. Without doubt the followers of the German school will be shocked at having critical Boston indorse a player who is not bound by the laws of the classical school, but the public will gladly accept the newcomer and enjoy her playing with a sense of relief.

Mr. Nikisch gave the patrons of these concerts on this occasion a programme of great merit, and his reading of the "Italian" symphony by Mendelssohn was in keeping with his best work this season. An excellent performance of the "Roi d'Ys" overture by Lalo begun the programme, and a charming interpretation of the wonderful tone picture "Waloweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," completed the evening's pleasures.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist of the orchestra, is to be the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin, in D minor, No. 4, and Volkmann's symphony in B flat.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 180.

TUESDAY, DEC. 27, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fourth concert of the season by the Kneisel quartet, at Chickering Hall, last evening, proved a very attractive event for chamber music patrons, and the large attendance gave evidence of the continued appreciation of the highly artistic work done by Mr. Kneisel and his associates in these events.

The Beethoven quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131, made the first number, and the reading given it under Mr. Kneisel's direction was most satisfactory, the players showing the same finish, precision and richness of tone which always characterizes the performances of this admirable group of players.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave his valuable assistance for this concert, and took the piano part in the quartet for piano and strings by Brahms in A major. His fine skill and excellent ability in ensemble playing was shown with great success on this occasion, and the quartet was given with charming effect throughout.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 25, 1892.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

The soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was a very young and a very brilliant pianist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano. She is only 16 years of age, and in appearance is a child, but her playing is that of a mature artist, so broad and comprehensive is her method, so forceful, brilliant and finished in her technique, and so intelligent and sympathetic is her interpretation of master compositions.

She is an Italian, and received her early education from her mother, who was herself a musician of high repute. How naturally music comes to her may be inferred from the fact that she graduated in three years with high honors from a conservatory course of study which is supposed to require eight years of constant application.

She made her first public appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, and completely captivated that usually reserved assemblage. She was recalled four times with uncommon demonstrations of enthusiasm. Her reception was even more cordial at the concert last evening.

It was intended that she should play Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 2, but the number was necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided.

As a substitute she played three solos, Chopin's nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor, and a concert study by Martucci, the master under whom Signorina Castellano has studied for the past few years.

The familiar Chopin numbers were played with marvellous expression and artistic finish. The Martucci study is a most exacting composition, bristling with difficulties which would try the skill of the most nimble of fingers. She played the most difficult passages with astonishing rapidity and in a faultless manner. She is truly a remarkable pianist, and her promised appearance here in a recital will be awaited with eager interest by Boston music lovers.

The orchestral offerings were very welcome and each was given a splendid performance under Mr. Nikisch's skilled direction. They consisted of Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Italian symphony No. 4.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the soloist at the 10th symphony rehearsal and concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto Cellini.....Berlioz
Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 4..Vieuxtemps
Symphony in B flat.....Volkmann

The Kneisel quartet will give the fourth concert of the series in Chickering Hall on Monday night. Beethoven's quartet, op. 132, and Brahms' pianoforte quartet in A major, with Mr. Nikisch at the pianoforte, make the programme.

——Mr. Adamowski's second concert at Chickering Hall, Tuesday afternoon, was unusually well attended, considering the nearness to Christmas with its crush of preparations. In the hall were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Benjamin Curtis, Miss Francesca Lunt, Mrs. E. A. Taft and Miss Taft, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. W. H. Sweet, Miss Riddle, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. W. P. Blake and Mr. Elliott Pratt, a few of the many subscribers present.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1892.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Arthur Nikisch assisting, was presented at Chickering Hall last evening to an audience highly delighted, congratulating themselves on having been repaid for facing the extreme cold. The programme given was a quartet from Beethoven in C sharp minor, op. 131, seven movements, beautifully rendered; the expressivo and vivace being, perhaps, the most pleasing; piano quartet in A major, op. 26, from Brahms, four movements, allegro non troppo; poco adagio; poco allegro, and allegro. The air in the poco adagio was admirable, and the execution was well nigh perfect. Mr. Nikisch was given a most hearty reception, and Mr. Kneisel is to be congratulated on his valuable assistance. The date of the fifth concert is Jan. 16.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC. 27, 1892.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel quartet, given last night in Chickering Hall, was notable for two things, the splendid performance of the Beethoven quartet in C sharp minor, and the appearance of Mr. Nikisch as the piano soloist in Brahm's A minor, piano quartet. These two numbers made up the programme, which was longer than usual, and lasted for nearly two hours.

The great Beethoven quartet, one of the most impressive compositions ever written, was magnificently played, in fact the performance was almost flawless. The perfect time, splendid expression and artistic phrasing deserved the applause which the audience bestowed upon Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder. The rendition of the vivace movement, if any discrimination can be made, was particularly notable.

The piano quartet, with Mr. Nikisch at the piano, although generally satisfactory, does not deserve such unstinted praise. The Symphony conductor played artistically. He did not make the piano part too prominent and showed a good deal of repose and reserve power.

As usal the audience was composed of many of the leading musical people of the city. The next concert will be given Jan. 16.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The crisp atmosphere did not have an appreciable effect upon the audience that greeted the Kneisel Quartette at Chickering Hall last evening. The programme comprised but two numbers, the Beethoven quartette in C sharp minor, and the Brahms piano quartette in A major.

This was a programme which would test both the interpretive abilities of the players and the receptive and appreciative capacities of the audience. To say that the latter equalled the former, while being a strong statement, would not overshoot the mark. The last of the 16 quartettes of Beethoven are more rarely given a public hearing for the same reasons that allow his later piano sonatas fewer hearings than those composed during his first and second periods. In these last three or four quartettes, Beethoven has given to four instruments what it might well take a whole orchestra to express. They seem, by their extended compass and general outline, to be rather pen and ink sketches of a design to which the orchestral coloring has not been added. The one presented last night was composed in 1825, but not published till the year of his death. Beethoven himself spoke of it as "a quartette, and a grand one, too." It certainly presents Beethoven in one of his most Beethovenish moods, so to speak, and it is needless to say that at the hands of the artists of the Kneisel Quartette it received a performance which approached the flawless.

When we come to the Brahms Quartette we step on debatable ground. On the one side, Brahms is declared to write only Kapellemeister music, to have little invention and no spontaneity, mere labor and no invention. On the other, his followers, headed by Hanslick, hold him up as the true legitimate successor of Beethoven, with all that implies. While the former view has an atom of truth in it, the latter is coming to be recognized as nearer his real status. Suppose Brahms' works do show the labor he has expressed in them, how about the Beethoven notebooks?

The beauty of Brahms is not alone the beauty of musical logic, his genius, not alone the genius for taking infinite pains. While it is true that mere sensuous beauty must give way to the thorough expression of his ideal thought, still his themes are at times as tender as Chopin, while at the same time he may be as deep as Beethoven and as formal as Bach. In his veins there flows the blood of Bach, Beethoven and Schumann, but with a tinge that makes you exclaim, "That is Brahms."

In the quartette the composer must live by his melodic invention and his resources of development, or die by the lack of them. The brilliant orchestral color is not there to cover formal deficiencies. It must stand or fall by its own intrinsic worth. Though this worth in Brahms has been slow of appreciation by the musical public the day is near at hand when he will be given his pedestal with Beethoven and Schumann.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch assisted the quartette by taking the piano part in the Brahms number. In any piano quartette the piano is given a good half of the work to do, and in this case it could have fallen into no more adequate hands. The perfect ensemble was a matter of rare enjoyment. The con sordino passages of the second movement—poco adagio, were given with a delicacy and refinement unapproachable. The third movement, allegro, makes one think somewhat of the anti-Brahms statement that his compositions show mere work and not inspiration, but the final allegro give both the inspiration and the work.

The next concert of the series will be given Jan. 16.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1892.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The word "faultless" smacks of extravagant hyperbole, and yet that word might be applied justly to the performance of the Beethoven C sharp minor quartette, op. 131, by the Kneisel Club last evening in Chickering Hall. The performance was indeed a remarkable exhibition of ensemble playing, and the perfection of the reading and the execution lent a foreign charm to the work itself. For though musicians and judges of music may go into raptures over the quartettes of Beethoven's third period, the op. 131, which was dedicated to Baron Stutterheim, who put the composer's scapegrace nephew into the army, is not a work that commands the affection or even the honest admiration of the common hearer.

The Kneisel Quartet was assisted by Mr. Nikisch, who played the pianoforte part of the Brahms Quartette in A major, op. 26. The composition is dry. The themes are ordinary and serve only for contrapuntal treatment. There is much straining, much groaning; there are continual promises of things that never arrive. The work was played with infinite care and with apparent sympathy. Mr. Nikisch gave a fluent performance of his part, and with the exception of an occasional preponderance of pianoforte, the ensemble was excellent. If the pianoforte cover had been closed, as it should have been, this occasional lack of just proportion would not probably have been noticed.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Lalo: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."
Pianoforte solos:
Chopin: Nocturne in E minor, Opus 72 (posthumous).
Scherzo No. 1, in B minor, Opus 20.
Martucci: Etude de Concert.
Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian"), Opus 90.
Miss Eugenia Castellano was the pianist.

Lalo's overture belongs distinctly to the new French school—in soul, as it does in body—and has almost all the virtues and faults of its school. It is a strong piece of coloring, with a powerfully dramatic moment now and then, the effects in it being of the physical sort mainly. At times you almost think you are listening to something very like a theme; at others that some formal thematic development is going on. But the general impression is rather formless, and, save for the evident dramatic intention, aimless. But the overture is beauty and coherence themselves compared to some other things of its school we have heard. It was grandly played.

It would not be wholly easy to say just where the musical superiority of Wagner's "Waldweben" over Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture lay. The "Waldweben" is, until quite near the end, wholly and frankly formless, and of thematic work there is exceedingly little in it. And yet there is a certain unassuming air about the Wagner selection that leads you to expect less than in Lalo's overture—and you seem really to get more. Then there is Wagner's genius, his strong and compelling individuality; whereas in Lalo you find little else than the style, or manner, of a school—and a pretty bad school, at that.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony was exceedingly brilliantly played. The more one hears this work (especially the first and third movements), the more is one impressed with the consummate mastery the composer shows in it. It is a marvel of beauty of form. It seems a little strange that Mendelssohn should have left this symphony, written in 1833, among his posthumous works, while he had the "Scotch" symphony published during his lifetime. One fails to see by what process of self-criticism Mendelssohn can have been led to imply such a preference for the "Scotch;" to us the "Italian" is decidedly the finer work.

Miss Castellano was announced to play the Tschaikowsky G major concerto; but, when it came to rehearsal, the orchestra parts were found to be in a condition that forbade all thoughts of giving the work. So, as time was short, it was decided that she should play three short pieces without orchestra. This young lady is said to be only sixteen; her technique, especially in respect to finger-work, is almost phenomenal, and she already plays with no little authority and style. If in the Chopin nocturne her feeling showed itself as rather immature, it was honest, straightforward and musical, and there was no aping of the doings of older folk. But in the lighter things she did positive wonders, and was so rapturously applauded by the audience that she had to play two encore pieces. Indeed the impression she made was conspicuously fine.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23; Vieuxtemps, violin concerto No. 4, in D minor; Volkmann, symphony in B-flat. Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the violinist.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fourth concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as folows:

Beethoven: Quartet in C-sharp minor, Opus 131.
Brahms: Quartet for pianoforte and strings, in A major, Opus 26.

The C-sharp minor quartet is not often given here; it is very long (comprising six long movements according to the composer's count), and makes severer demands upon the technique and ensemble drill of the players than almost any of Beethoven's other chamber works. But it is one of the greatest of all quartets, and to hear it not only played, but well played, is a rare privilege. The Kneisels did positive wonders with it; we do not know when nor where we have heard finer quartet playing. It is only lack of space that prevents us saying much more about it.

Brahms's A major pianoforte quartet is one of his strongest works in this form; it is good, healthy, stoutly built music such as it does one good to hear. In it Mr. Nikisch made his first appearance before a Boston audience as a pianist, and with admirable success, too. He played with fire, excellent judgment, and that self-reliant sureness that one finds only in a musician who is something more than a pianist. Technically he showed himself fully up to his task, and the fine musical feeling in his playing was all the more surely felt that he found himself unhampered by any external considerations. If one were to make a criticism, it would be that, in so far as the ensemble effect was concerned, he made two errors in judgment: he made the pianoforte a little too prominent in passages where it leads, or stands on an equality with the other instruments, and kept it too much in the background where it plays a mere accompaniment. That is, he showed a slight tendency to excess in both directions. But this flaw was, upon the whole, slight; he played like an artist throughout. Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski and Schroeder seconded him superbly, and the audience enjoyed the quartet to the top of their bent, to judge from their applause when it was over.

[70]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, December 29, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

...DECEMBER 27, 1892.

...Quartet.

...Quartet gave its fourth ...Hemenway Hall, last evening, ...assistance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, pianist. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131; and Brahms's piano quartet in A major, op. 26. Without attempting to discuss the value of this work of Beethoven's, upon which so many disagree as regards its rationality, it is sufficient to say at this time that the performance of it by this quartet of players was, without exception, the most perfect specimen of artistic excellence in chamber music that I have ever observed. The playing was without a flaw. It made clear all the difficulties of the composition, and held the attention of the audience to the end, something that was never before accomplished in our concert-halls in the performance of this mysterious work.

The playing of the Brahms Quartet also calls for praise. Mr. Nikisch proved to be an able and sympathetic associate in its performance. His touch in the forte passages was perhaps not always elastic, but otherwise it was adequate in a high degree. The date of the fifth concert is Jan. 16. To the critical musician these concerts of the Kneisal Quartet are the most gratifying occasions in the whole category of musical entertainments occurring in Boston.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

WORCESTER, MASS.

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 30, 1892.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Nordica and Schroeder.

The audience in Mechanics Hall, last evening, on the occasion of the second symphony concert, was gratifying in point of numbers. It showed an increasing interest in the best music and gave warrant that the Boston Orchestra is on a sure footing here and will presently become an established institution. The nearness of Worcester to Boston ensures to the public here as many concerts to the season as they care to hear.

The programme, last evening, was interesting, though mixed. It opened with Karl Reinecke's overture to the opera, "King Manfred." This was probably given as a matter of instruction, or curiosity, since even the programme did not assume it to be anything more than second-rate music. Its performance was very well for once. The music is light and somewhat spirited and the time was not wasted.

Far more interesting was Dvorák's Suite for Orchestra in D Major, Op. 39. The music was of the same general character as the Reinecke overture, that is, light and spirited, but with the marked difference that it was original and striking. This Bohemian musician, who is now presiding over the fortunes of the National Conservatory of Music, Mrs. Thurber's pet institution in New York, is not only a genius but a Czech genius. His music is fresh and invigorating, and he is not greatly bound by forms; his mind is stored not so much with the rules of the masters as with the wild, virile music traditional with his race. Thus, he represents for the time a new school, and the Suite from the first awoke interest and commanded attention. It was simple enough, but it was a grateful change.

The Schumann Symphony (D Minor, No. 4) came at the end of the progamme and suffered for that reason. We have heard the Orchestra play better than they did last night, although there was no specific ground for complaint.

Madame Lillian Nordica was resplendent last evening in a black frock, its corsage sparkling with jewels, or twinkling gems of some sort, and enormous cherry colored puffed short sleeves, crowned on each shoulder, with a tremendous black crape butterfly quivering in the gas-light. This description, we may mention, is not the work of our Fashion-Editor, who was detained in his rooms by a severe cold. It is merely the impression of an ordinary mortal, sitting at some distance from the stage. Probably the F. E., had he been there, would have admitted her costume to be strikingly effective, and her sleeves among the largest ever constructed in Paris, or exhibited in North America. Her singing also was charming. Her voice is not phenomenal, but her method is of the very best, and she possesses feeling and sentiment. The Queen of Sheba air was loudly applauded and the old time "Una voce poca fa" was still more violently received. She only bowed graciously. It is a great pleasure to attend a concert where no encores are permitted.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the eminent 'cellist, performed a Chopin nocturne and a Klengel caprice, with the accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch on the piano forte, and modestly acknowledging the applause which commended his admirably artistic work, went back quietly to his seat in the Orchestra. It is only by accident that we mention him last of all.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert was distinguished by the first appearance in Boston of Miss Eugenia Castellano, the pianist. It was announced that she would be heard in the second concert of Tschaikowsky; but for some reason or other Miss Castellano did not play with the orchestra. She played three solo numbers: Chopin's E minor nocturne (op. posth); Chopin's B minor Scherzo, and Martucci's Étude de Concert. When she came before the public it was difficult to tell at first whether she was child or woman; it was also difficult after the first two numbers to pronounce any safe judgment concerning her merits as a pianist.

She did not make much out of the nocturne. She played it as though a teacher stood by her side, and yet at the same time she suggested, even when she did not reveal, a strong temperament. In the scherzo she proved herself a woman; for she showed feeling, yes, passion, in unexpected, almost incongruous passages, and when she might have palpitated with emotion, she preferred to be prosaic. That she owned well trained fingers and supple wrists was at once apparent. After her brilliant performance of the study by Martucci, she was applauded as a mistress of bravura; yet not alone from admiration of her digital dexterity. The hearer was curious to study further her musical equipment. She was recalled enthusiastically, and in response she gave a brilliant performance of a brilliant piece of the music box order, "Momento capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am not mistaken.

Again there was a universal shout, and Miss Castellano, who had already defied the solemn traditions of the symphony concerts by playing after a recall, concluded her recital by a delightful delivery of a charming gavotte in the ancient style. It is to be hoped that this interesting pianist will soon be heard in a concert where a more elaborate or rather diversified program will afford a better opportunity for judging of her temperament; there can now be little or no dispute concerning her admirable mechanism.

The orchestra numbers were Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Mendelssohn's fourth symphony. The orchestral performance was in the main excellent. The tempi of the first two movements of the symphony were open to criticism. The allegro was taken at a break neck pace, and the andante con moto was sluggish.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler, a violinist of the Symphony orchestra, will make his début here the 30th and 31st in the D minor (No. 4) concerto of Vieuxtemps.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.

Published Daily and Sunday.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1892.

A Fair Audience and a Fine Entertainment.

The second of the series of symphony concerts was given in Mechanics hall last night, by the Boston symphony orchestra, and the 800 people who were present enjoyed an unusually fine musical treat. That may be gathered from a glimpse at the program, which was presented as follows:—

Karl Reinecke, Overture, "King Manfred"
Gounod, Aria, "Reine de Saba"
Antonin Dvorak,
Suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39
I. Præludium (Pastoral), Allegro moderato (D major) 4-4
II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D minor) 2-4
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro guisto (B-flat major) 3-4
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G major) 9-8
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D minor) 3-4
Soli for violoncello.
a. Chopin, Nocturne
b. Klengel Capriccio
Rossini,
Aria, "Una Voce," from "Barber of Seville"
Shumann, Symphony in D minor, No. 4
I. Rather slow (D minor) 3-4
Lively (D minor) 2-4
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode) 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor) 3-4
Trio: The same tempo (B-flat major) 3-4
IV. Slow (D minor) 4-4
Lively (D major) 4-4

Apart from the brilliant performance by the orchestra, the part taken by Mme. Lillian Nordica and Alwin Schroeder, who were the soloists, made the event an unusually memorable one.

Mme. Nordica sang her two arias splendidly, displaying all her old time brilliancy of tone, comprehensive range and exquisite quality. She was in excellent voice, too, last night, but was niggardly of her favors for, although she was encored three times, she would do nothing more than smile and bow.

Schroeder's contributions on the 'cello were also a prominent feature of the concert.

Of the performance by the orchestra itself, it need be only remarked that that splendid body of instruments abundantly sustained its high reputation. It added, too, to the musical knowledge of musical Worcester, for it presented in a very adequate and complete way, for the first time in Worcester, Dvorak's Suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39.

[71]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet.

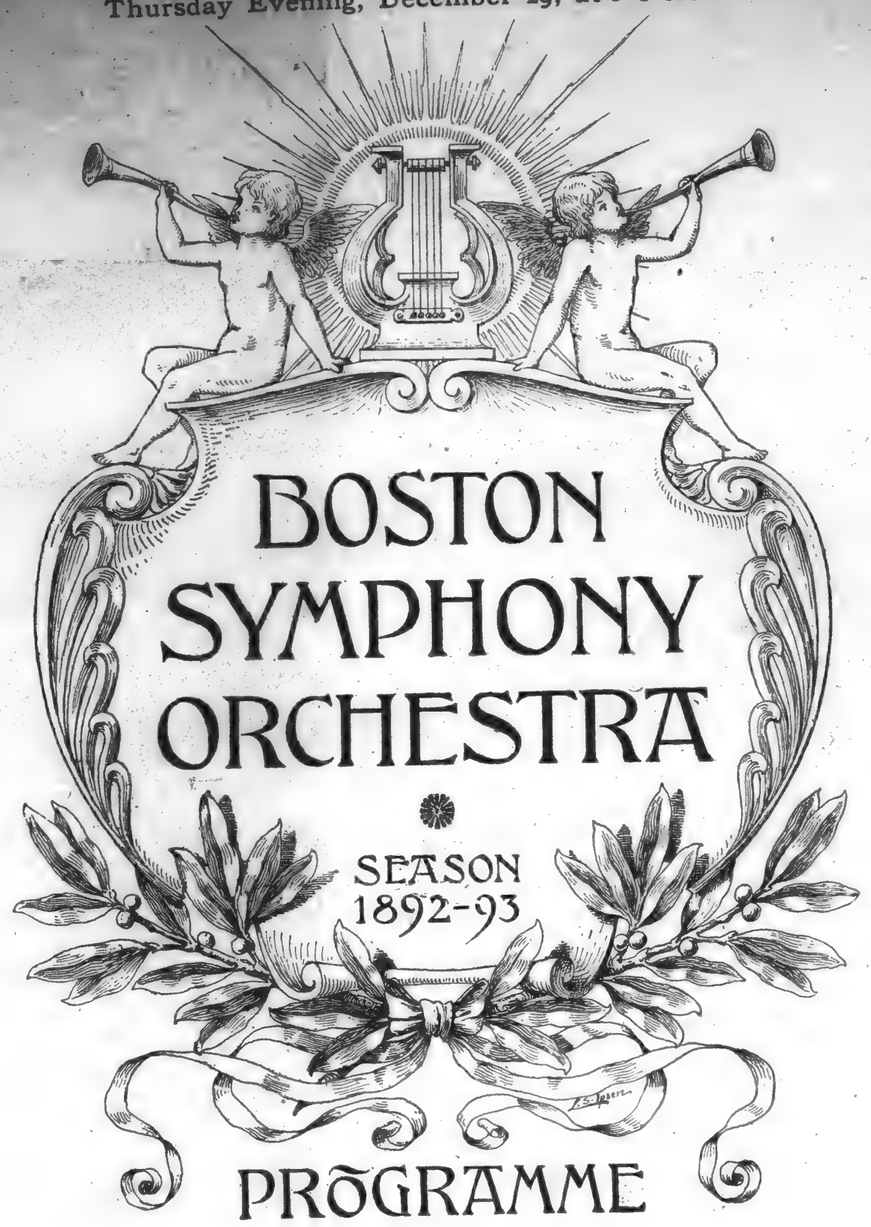
The Kneisel Quartet gave its fourth concert at Chickering Hall, last evening, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, pianist. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131; and Brahms's piano quartet in A major, op. 26. Without attempting to discuss the value of this work of Beethoven's, upon which so many disagree as regards its rationality, it is sufficient to say at this time that the performance of it by this quartet of players was, without exception, the most perfect specimen of artistic excellence in chamber music that I have ever observed. The playing was without a flaw. It made clear all the difficulties of the composition, and held the attention of the audience to the end, something that was never before accomplished in our concert-halls in the performance of this mysterious work.

The playing of the Brahms Quartet also calls for praise. Mr. Nikisch proved to be an able and sympathetic associate in its performance. His touch in the forte passages was perhaps not always elastic, but otherwise it was adequate in a high degree. The date of the fifth concert is Jan. 16. To the critical musician these concerts of the Kneisal Quartet are the most gratifying occasions in the whole category of musical entertainments occurring in Boston.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, December 29, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 30, 1892.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Nordica and Schroeder.

The audience in Mechanics Hall, last evening, on the occasion of the second symphony concert, was gratifying in point of numbers. It showed an increasing interest in the best music and gave warrant that the Boston Orchestra is on a sure footing here and will presently become an established institution. The nearness of Worcester to Boston ensures to the public here as many concerts to the season as they care to hear.

The programme, last evening, was interesting, though mixed. It opened with Karl Reinecke's overture to the opera, "King Manfred." This was probably given as a matter of instruction, or curiosity, since even the programme did not assume it to be anything more than second-rate music. Its performance was very well for once. The music is light and somewhat spirited and the time was not wasted.

Far more interesting was Dvorák's Suite for Orchestra in D Major, Op. 39. The music was of the same general character as the Reinecke overture, that is, light and spirited, but with the marked difference that it was original and striking. This Bohemian musician, who is now presiding over the fortunes of the National Conservatory of Music, Mrs. Thurber's pet institution in New York, is not only a genius but a Czech genius. His music is fresh and invigorating, and he is not greatly bound by forms; his mind is stored not so much with the rules of the masters as with the wild, virile music traditional with his race. Thus, he represents for the time a new school, and the Suite from the first awoke interest and commanded attention. It was simple enough, but it was a grateful change.

The Schumann Symphony (D Minor, No. 4) came at the end of the progamme and suffered for that reason. We have heard the Orchestra play better than they did last night, although there was no specific ground for complaint.

Madame Lillian Nordica was resplendent last evening in a black frock, its corsage sparkling with jewels, or twinkling gems of some sort, and enormous cherry colored puffed short sleeves, crowned on each shoulder with a tremendous black crape butterfly quivering in the gas-light. This description, we may mention, is not the work of our Fashion-Editor, who was detained in his rooms by a severe cold. It is merely the impression of an ordinary mortal, sitting at some distance from the stage. Probably the F. E., had he been there, would have admitted her costume to be strikingly effective, and her sleeves among the largest ever constructed in Paris, or exhibited in North America. Her singing also was charming. Her voice is not phenomenal, but her method is of the very best, and she possesses feeling and sentiment. The Queen of Sheba air was loudly applauded and the old time "Una voce poca fa" was still more violently received. She only bowed graciously. It is a great pleasure to attend a concert where no encores are permitted.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the eminent 'cellist, performed a Chopin nocturne and a Klengel caprice, with the accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch on the piano forte, and modestly acknowledging the applause which commended his admirably artistic work, went back quietly to his seat in the Orchestra. It is only by accident that we mention him last of all.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert was distinguished by the first appearance in Boston of Miss Eugenia Castellano, the pianist. It was announced that she would be heard in the second concert of Tschaikowsky; but for some reason or other Miss Castellano did not play with the orchestra. She played three solo numbers: Chopin's E minor nocturne (op. posth); Chopin's B minor Scherzo, and Martucci's Étude de Concert. When she came before the public it was difficult to tell at first whether she was child or woman; it was also difficult after the first two numbers to pronounce any safe judgment concerning her merits as a pianist.

She did not make much out of the nocturne. She played it as though a teacher stood by her side, and yet at the same time she suggested, even when she did not reveal, a strong temperament. In the scherzo she proved herself a woman; for she showed feeling, yes, passion, in unexpected, almost incongruous passages, and when she might have palpitated with emotion, she preferred to be prosaic. That she owned well trained fingers and supple wrists was at once apparent. After her brilliant performance of the study by Martucci, she was applauded as a mistress of bravura; yet not alone from admiration of her digital dexterity. The hearer was curious to study further her musical equipment. She was recalled enthusiastically, and in response she gave a brilliant performance of a brilliant piece of the music box order, "Momento capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am not mistaken.

Again there was a universal shout, and Miss Castellano, who had already defied the solemn traditions of the symphony concerts by playing after a recall, concluded her recital by a delightful delivery of a charming gavotte in the ancient style. It is to be hoped that this interesting pianist will soon be heard in a concert where a more elaborate or rather diversified program will afford a better opportunity for judging of her temperament; there can now be little or no dispute concerning her admirable mechanism.

The orchestra numbers were Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Mendelssohn's fourth symphony. The orchestral performance was in the main excellent. The tempi of the first two movements of the symphony were open to criticism. The allegro was taken at a break neck pace, and the andante con moto was sluggish.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler, a violinist of the Symphony orchestra, will make his début here the 30th and 31st in the D minor (No. 4) concerto of Vieuxtemps.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.

Published Daily and Sunday.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1892.

A Fair Audience and a Fine Entertainment.

The second of the series of symphony concerts was given in Mechanics hall last night, by the Boston symphony orchestra, and the 800 people who were present enjoyed an unusually fine musical treat. That may be gathered from a glimpse at the program, which was presented as follows:—

Karl Reinecke, Overture, "King Manfred"
Gounod, Aria, "Reine de Saba"
Antonin Dvorak,
Suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39
I. Præludium (Pastoral), Allegro moderato (D major) 4-4
II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D minor) 2-4
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro guisto (B-flat major) 3-4
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G major) 9-8
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D minor) 3-4
Soli for violoncello.
a. Chopin, Nocturne
b. Klengel Capriccio
Rossini, Aria, "Una Voce," from "Barber of Seville"
Shumann, Symphony in D minor No. 4
I. Rather slow (D minor) 3-4
Lively (D minor) 2-4
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode) 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor) 3-4
Trio: The same tempo (B-flat major) 3-4
IV. Slow (D minor) 4-4
Lively (D major) 4-4

Apart from the brilliant performance by the orchestra, the part taken by Mme. Lillian Nordica and Alwin Schroeder, who were the soloists, made the event an unusually memorable one.

Mme. Nordica sang her two arias splendidly, displaying all her old time brilliancy of tone, comprehensive range and exquisite quality. She was in excellent voice, too, last night, but was niggardly of her favors for, although she was encored three times, she would do nothing more than smile and bow.

Schroeder's contributions on the 'cello were also a prominent feature of the concert.

Of the performance by the orchestra itself, it need be only remarked that that splendid body of instruments abundantly sustained its high reputation. It added, too, to the musical knowledge of musical Worcester, for it presented in a very adequate and complete way, for the first time in Worcester, Dvorak's Suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39.

[71]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall,
BOSTON, MASS.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford,
Monday Evening, Jan. 2.

BOSTON
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1892.

SYMPHONY GIRLS.

Amy Robsart at the Rehearsal.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON ROUT.

The Fun at Music Hall Began Early—Three Hours of Patience—Mr. Nikisch and his Soloist—Tunes and Technique—Fiddlers' Diamonds.

I went to the Symphony rehearsal yesterday.

So did a very big contingent of Boston and the suburbs.

I went early, to see the fun.

If you don't believe thoroughly in the musical enthusiasm of the Boston girl, go early some rehearsal afternoon to Music Hall and stand around the edges of the second balcony crowd waiting in the corridor.

At noon yesterday the Symphony girls began to gather.

The doors are not open until 1:30 p. m.

Mr. Nikisch does not lift his baton until 2:30.

Consider the patience of that crowd!

But if you value the wholeness of your garments and the safety of your bonnet, don't confide in it; don't insinuate yourself in its midst.

Spectacled young girls and middle-aged girls; girls chatting in couples and groups packed close; solitary girls; girls with bags and with music rolls; girls reading the Century and Harper's while they wait, wedged in; girls browsing in dog-eared volumes; girls very smart as to gowns and hats, and girls very shabby; girls rural and girls sophisticated; girls in the first stages of Richardson or Czerny and girls who have been teaching scales and five-finger exercises half a lifetime.

But all of them Symphony girls, each with a precious bit of pastebosrd entitling them to admission to the second balcony where there are no seats reserved, and it is a matter of first come first served.

Every one of those 466 girls yesterday meant to be first.

There was no doubt of it.

Patiently they waited.

They crowded close and closer, in a condensed mass of gowns and bonnets and breathless expectation.

At last the doors were opened.

Rushing, pushing, elbowing, prying forward by main strength, pell mell they made for the stairs; veils were torn off, skirts ripped, bonnets pulled askew, hair disordered, ribs poked, toes trodden, in the merciless onslaught; the strongest took precedence, the weakest struggled bravely after and the ticket-takers worked with both hands.

A rout of the gallery gods was not to be compared to it.

Filling Music Hall.

Into the big bare balcony they dodged by a dozen doors.

In five minutes the balcony was filled; in ten it was crowded.

It took fifty minutes to fill the first balcony, the floor and the aisles on either side, while the orchestra men filed in a desultory way into their places under the white curtained drop lights and began a melancholy prelude of squeakings and moanings in thirds and sixths, keying up fiddles and flutes.

All this time the second balconyites were rustling the yellow-backed programmes and reading Mr. Apthorp's contributions to recent musical literature.

A Picture of Nikisch.

Then a little man in black broadcloth paced in a slow, soliloquistic way across the stage.

A little man, very sleek and shiny, compact and well-tailored, his Prince Albert coat buttoned close, a rim of snowy linen dividing the black of his long locks and the black of his coat at the neck, big, big cuffs, and his face almost as white as his linen against the dark background of hair, brows and beard.

Conductor Nikisch, of course.

Beethoven in bronze looked down benignly on the flutter of bows and the flash of brasses.

Nikisch in broadcloth, on his little pedestal opposite, ran his eyes in a quick, comprehensive glance across his orchestra.

He lifted the baton.

It was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Over across the hall Apollo, the Greek, stood posed in marble, listening.

The Symphony girls in the second balcony were only ears and eyes.

The Symphony girls on the floor leaned forward in various attitudes of melody-drinking and rapturous expression.

Fine and clear and brilliant the music, with now a clash of cymbals and now a thread of sweet sounds that the magician wound with subtle passes about his white wand in invisible gossamers; winding, winding, with deft, dainty jugglery, until at the climax of some brilliant crescendo he flirted the whole cobweb bubble of melody off into space from the tip of his baton with a single flourish of his white, supple, dexterous hands.

[illegible] Friday afternoon," commented the [illegible] glasses.

"I see you are here often?" asked the spectacles.

Confidences in the Aisle.

"I haven't missed a single rehearsal in three years. I used to stand over in the other aisle, but I think you can see better over here. I'd about as soon be in the upper balcony, only one has to come so early to get any kind of a seat, and here when it is a rainy day sometimes one gets a chance to sit down, and if one is early almost always for the first number so many people come late, and get shut out till the second."

Ingenious little Symphony girl, blessed be the tardy!

Then came Mr. Schnitzler with his violin.

"It's too bad his nose is so long," said the pretty girl next me, regretfully sniffing the violets on her muff.

"But he plays perfectly lovely," she added conciliatingly.

"— Nine — ten — eleven — there! I've counted a dozen diamond rings on a dozen little fingers up there, and yet they say men are not vain. Want to call attention to their white hands—it just makes me tired to see them," this spitefully from the pretty girl again.

While the orchestra began the introduction Mr. Schnitzler held his violin in front of him gingerly in one hand and bashfully proceeded to arrange his necktie with the other.

Every girl in the audience had a nervous desire to help him, he obviously was having such a hard time with it.

But just then he tucked his violin under his chin and began.

The Symphony girls couldn't have helped him here.

They leaned forward with rapt attention.

How he played!

Now it was a gentle minor andante with softly flowing numbers and flute-like flights of sound, and then a brilliant scherzo with crisp bright dancing notes.

How the Symphony girls applauded him and how the members of the orchestra applauded, too.

But he wouldn't be encored.

He got into his own seat in the ranks of the orchestra, and after a little handshaking all around—whole-souled bonhommie that made the Symphony girl want to hug herself out of sympathy—the Volkmann symphony began.

I don't know anything about music.

Only about the sensual pleasure of sweet sounds—something like the intoxication of hasheesh perhaps.

So I listened to the Symphony girls' splitting hair-breadths of technique and gushing adjectives all the way through the corridors and down the stairs, with a little smile at the musical Greek of it.

"And Paderewski will be here next week, just think!" I caught as I passed out.

Music Hall is a wonderful place.

AMY ROBSART.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 31 1892

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was an unusually small attendance at the ninth Symphony concert, but there was excitement and hullabaloo enough for a multitude, and the once respected standard of these evenings was again lowered and disregarded. For the place due in the usual sequence to a solo pianist there had been engaged an Italian young lady, just in the middle of her teens, by the name of Eugenia Castellano, who played a nocturne and scherzo of Chopin fairly well as to interpretation and exceedingly well as to technique, and then proceeded to deliver a concert study by one of her teachers, Martucci. This, being audaciously brilliant and astonishingly difficult, and being played with amazing alacrity and surety, won her an immediate and vigorous recall, to which she promptly responded with a still more showy, resplendent and intricate caprice, chiefly notable for its swift crossings of hands in ornamental notes and bars, while a smooth, fluent, rapid undercurrent streamed on unbroken. This was also received with much jubilation and applause—even the conductor consenting to smile dreamily, and pat his little hands languidly as he reposed in his chair—and she returned and added yet another solo, which was a quaint, delicate and rather fanciful gavotte,—both these last being ascribed to her last instructor, Van Westerhaut. The girl has an easy command of the keyboard which is astonishing, even when one recalls Paderewski, and she displays in her touch both solid strength and airy lightness. She seems to have the true Southern temperament, and there are moments when an ebullient Neapolitan passion surges through the music; but her musical mind appears to be still forming itself, and in the Chopin there was often apparent an intellectual and even emotional cautiousness, so to speak. Signorina Castellano gives remarkable promise and encourages great hopes; but such an introduction of her was unbecoming, for exhibitions of virtuosity and salon pieces are out of place in a Symphony concert, as a sound and serious director would know. Tschaikowsky's second concerto was the work promised for the girl's début, but it was withheld because, according to a foot-note on the programme, the orchestral parts were insufficient. This surely should have been found out long before, so that another proper composition could have been selected. The orchestral numbers were: Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture, which was superbly played, with an exquisite 'cello obbligato by Mr. Schroeder; the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," which had better sentiment than execution, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the performance of which was variable, ranging from a nice support of the beautifully played obbligati—those of the viola and horns particularly—to some pretty ragged and rough endeavors to keep together in the first movement.

The programme-book condescended to restrict itself to only four pages of Berlioz this time; still the readers would have been better pleased and more edified if even this forbearance had extended so far as to spare a page or so for telling them something about the soloist of the evening.

The programme for this evening begins with that "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz of which the conductor is fond, and ends with Volkmann's B-flat symphony. Between these Mr. I. Schnitzler of the orchestra will play Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto.

THE KNEISEL CONCERTS.

It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartette at their fourth concert was perfect. The Beethoven quartette which they chose—that in C-sharp minor, opus 131—would not be counted as among his greatest. Grandeur, majesty, deep pathos and broad thought do not characterize it; but a hundred swiftly varying minor emotions are there in shifting shades of sentiment, gravity, humor, dainty conceit and lively spirit. Within its single movements are many changes of tempo and of mood, and it demands a ready alertness both of hand and sympathy to follow, catch and exhibit these. Mr. Kneisel and his fellows were absolute masters of all and their reading was as of a single mind and impulse. Nothing finer in their way can ever have been heard here—one is tempted to say that nothing can surpass it. The rest of the evening was assigned to Brahms's piano quartette in A-major, opus 26. As usual, the doctors disagree—the one party declaring the composition worthy of its place beside Beethoven, while the other found it labored, pedantic and mechanical. As our readers know by this time, we like to occupy a middle ground, to admire in this composer all that is lucid, spontaneous and obvious and to hold back frankly from that which is formal, abstruse and studied. We found much to enjoy in this quartette—distinct melodic figures, free spirit and reasonable scientific development. The performance was at all points excellent, and no small share of the praise is due to Mr. Nikisch, who was the pianist. His technical equipment was entirely adequate, his reading clear and often brilliant, his touch distinct and refined and his attendance upon the string players careful and sensitive. Occasionally, following them with the delicacy he uses toward singers, he subdued his part more than was necessary, as, on the other hand, when he had to lead, his tone became too voluminous because of the raising of the piano lid, which should have been closed at least to the short support. But he is to be heartily congratulated and thanked, and we hope that he may be heard again soon in such, or even larger music.

The Register.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30

HYPERION THEATER---NIKISCH.

MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 9th, 8 o'clock.
ONLY GRAND CONCERT!
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH.....CONDUCTOR.

SOLOISTS:
Mr. F. BUSONI, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme—Symphony in C major No. 2, Schumann. Concerto for Piano Forte No. 2, Liszt. Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde, Wagner. Soli for Violoncello, (a) Nocturne, Chopin, (b) Capriolo, Klengel. Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Tickets with reserved seats $1.50, $1 and 75c. according to location. Sale opens at the Box office, Hyperion Theater, Monday, Jan. 2.
d30 9d2Su

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its only concert in this city this season at the Hyperion Theatre Monday evening, January 9. The merits of this splendid organization are fully appreciated in this city, and the performance will undoubtedly call out a representative musical audience. The Boston Orchestra has taken first place among similar organizations in this country, and the demand for its services in the larger cities has made its appearance in New Haven less frequent than formerly. Tickets for the concert of January 9 will go on sale at the Hyperion next Monday.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1892.

Mr. C. A. Ellis has engaged Mrs. [illegible] as the head of a large concert organization, in which the following named are the other members: Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Andreas Dippel, of high repute in the principal opera houses of Germany, Emil Fischer, Mr. Del Puente, and Miss Helen Dudley Campbell. Mr. Ellis, in his management of the company, will be assisted by Jefferson S. Leerburger, who has piloted many of Henry E. Abbey's attractions through the country, including Patti on two tours. The first appearance of the company in Boston is appointed for Jan. 16, at the Music Hall. An act of an opera will form one part of the concert.

[72]

Madame Nordica's

American Tour . . .

Season of 1892-93

Under the management of C. A. ELLIS, Music Hall.
BOSTON, MASS.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford,
Monday Evening, Jan. 2.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 31 1892

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was an unusually small attendance at the ninth Symphony concert, but there was excitement and hullabaloo enough for a multitude, and the once respected standard of these evenings was again lowered and disregarded. For the place due in the usual sequence to a solo pianist there had been engaged an Italian young lady, just in the middle of her teens, by the name of Eugenia Castellano, who played a nocturne and scherzo of Chopin fairly well as to interpretation and exceedingly well as to technique, and then proceeded to deliver a concert study by one of her teachers, Martucci. This, being audaciously brilliant and astonishingly difficult, and being played with amazing alacrity and surety, won her an immediate and vigorous recall, to which she promptly responded with a still more showy, resplendent and intricate caprice, chiefly notable for its swift crossings of hands in ornamental notes and bars, while a smooth, fluent, rapid undercurrent streamed on unbroken. This was also received with much jubilation and applause—even the conductor consenting to smile dreamily, and pat his little hands languidly as he reposed in his chair—and she returned and added yet another solo, which was a quaint, delicate and rather fanciful gavotte,—both these last being ascribed to her last instructor, Van Westerhaut. The girl has an easy command of the keyboard which is astonishing, even when one recalls Paderewski, and she displays in her touch both solid strength and airy lightness. She seems to have the true Southern temperament, and there are moments when an ebullient Neapolitan passion surges through the music; but her musical mind appears to be still forming itself, and in the Chopin there was often apparent an intellectual and even emotional cautiousness, so to speak. Signorina Castellano gives remarkable promise and encourages great hopes; but such an introduction of her was unbecoming, for exhibitions of virtuosity and salon pieces are out of place in a Symphony concert, as a sound and serious director would know. Tschaikowsky's second concerto was the work promised for the girl's début, but it was withheld because, according to a foot-note on the programme, the orchestral parts were insufficient. This surely should have been found out long before, so that another proper composition could have been selected. The orchestral numbers were: Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture, which was superbly played, with an exquisite 'cello obbligato by Mr. Schroeder; the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," which had better sentiment than execution, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the performance of which was variable, ranging from a nice support of the beautifully played obbligati—those of the viola and horns particularly—to some pretty ragged and rough endeavors to keep together in the first movement.

The programme-book condescended to restrict itself to only four pages of Berlioz this time; still the readers would have been better pleased and more edified if even this forbearance had extended so far as to spare a page or so for telling them something about the soloist of the evening.

The programme for this evening begins with that "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz of which the conductor is fond, and ends with Volkmann's B-flat symphony. Between these Mr. I. Schnitzler of the orchestra will play Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto.

THE KNEISEL CONCERTS.

It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartette at their fourth concert was perfect. The Beethoven quartette which they chose—that in C-sharp minor, opus 131—would not be counted as among his greatest. Grandeur, majesty, deep pathos and broad thought do not characterize it; but a hundred swiftly varying minor emotions are there in shifting shades of sentiment, gravity, humor, dainty conceit and lively spirit. Within its single movements are many changes of tempo and of mood, and it demands a ready alertness both of hand and sympathy to follow, catch and exhibit these. Mr. Kneisel and his fellows were absolute masters of all and their reading was as of a single mind and impulse. Nothing finer in their way can ever have been heard here—one is tempted to say that nothing can surpass it. The rest of the evening was assigned to Brahms's piano quartette in A-major, opus 26. As usual, the doctors disagree—the one party declaring the composition worthy of its place beside Beethoven, while the other found it labored, pedantic and mechanical. As our readers know by this time, we like to occupy a middle ground, to admire in this composer all that is lucid, spontaneous and obvious and to hold back frankly from that which is formal, abstruse and studied. We found much to enjoy in this quartette—distinct melodic figures, free spirit and reasonable scientific development. The performance was at all points excellent, and no small share of the praise is due to Mr. Nikisch, who was the pianist. His technical equipment was entirely adequate, his reading clear and often brilliant, his touch distinct and refined and his attendance upon the string players careful and sensitive. Occasionally, following them with the delicacy he uses toward singers, he subdued his part more than was necessary, as, on the other hand, when he had to lead, his tone became too voluminous because of the raising of the piano lid, which should have been closed at least to the short support. But he is to be heartily congratulated and thanked, and we hope that he may be heard again soon in such, or even larger music.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1892.

SYMPHONY GIRLS.

Amy Robsart at the Rehearsal.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON ROUT.

The Fun at Music Hall Began Early—Three Hours of Patience—Mr. Nikisch and his Soloist—Tunes and Technique—Fiddlers' Diamonds.

I went to the Symphony rehearsal yesterday.

So did a very big contingent of Boston and the suburbs.

I went early, to see the fun.

If you don't believe thoroughly in the musical enthusiasm of the Boston girl, go early some rehearsal afternoon to Music Hall and stand around the edges of the second balcony crowd waiting in the corridor.

At noon yesterday the Symphony girls began to gather.

The doors are not open until 1:30 p. m.

Mr. Nikisch does not lift his baton until 2:30.

Consider the patience of that crowd!

But if you value the wholeness of your garments and the safety of your bonnet, don't confide in it; don't insinuate yourself in its midst.

Spectacled young girls and middle-aged girls; girls chatting in couples and groups packed close; solitary girls; girls with bags and with music rolls; girls reading the Century and Harper's while they wait, wedged in; girls browsing in dog-eared volumes; girls very smart as to gowns and hats, and girls very shabby; girls rural and girls sophisticated; girls in the first stages of Richardson or Czerny and girls who have been teaching scales and five-finger exercises half a lifetime.

But all of them Symphony girls, each with a precious bit of pastebosrd entitling them to admission to the second balcony where there are no seats reserved, and it is a matter of first come first served.

Every one of those 466 girls yesterday meant to be first.

There was no doubt of it.

Patiently they waited.

They crowded close and closer, in a condensed mass of gowns and bonnets and breathless expectation.

At last the doors were opened.

Rushing, pushing, elbowing, prying forward by main strength, pell mell they made for the stairs; veils were torn off, skirts ripped, bonnets pulled askew, hair disordered, ribs poked, toes trodden, in the merciless onslaught; the strongest took precedence, the weakest struggled bravely after and the ticket-takers worked with both hands.

A rout of the gallery gods was not to be compared to it.

Filling Music Hall.

Into the big bare balcony they dodged by a dozen doors.

In five minutes the balcony was filled; in ten it was crowded.

It took fifty minutes to fill the first balcony, the floor and the aisles on either side, while the orchestra men filed in a desultory way into their places under the white curtained drop lights and began a melancholy prelude of squeakings and moanings in thirds and sixths, keying up fiddles and flutes.

All this time the second balconyites were rustling the yellow-backed programmes and reading Mr. Apthorp's contributions to recent musical literature.

A Picture of Nikisch.

Then a little man in black broadcloth paced in a slow, soliloquistic way across the stage.

A little man, very sleek and shiny, compact and well-tailored, his Prince Albert coat buttoned close, a rim of snowy linen dividing the black of his long locks and the black of his coat at the neck, big, big cuffs, and his face almost as white as his linen against the dark background of hair, brows and beard.

Conductor Nikisch, of course.

Beethoven in bronze looked down benignly on the flutter of bows and the flash of brasses.

Nikisch in broadcloth, on his little pedestal opposite, ran his eyes in a quick, comprehensive glance across his orchestra.

He lifted the baton.

It was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Over across the hall Apollo, the Greek, stood posed in marble, listening.

The Symphony girls in the second balcony were only ears and eyes.

The Symphony girls on the floor leaned forward in various attitudes of melody-drinking and rapturous expression.

Fine and clear and brilliant the music, with now a clash of cymbals and now a thread of sweet sounds that the magician wound with subtle passes about his white wand in invisible gossamers; winding, winding, with deft, dainty jugglery, until at the climax of some brilliant crescendo he flirted the whole cobweb bubble of melody off into space from the tip of his baton with a single flourish of his white, supple, dexterous hands.

violin [illegible] while the [illegible] of applause fell like the big hurried drops of an April shower, the Symphony girls broke into chatter, especially the Symphony girls standing in the floor aisles.

"I should feel awfully if I had to stay away a Friday afternoon," commented the eye-glasses.

"Then you are here often?" asked the spectacles.

Confidences in the Aisle.

"I haven't missed a single rehearsal in three years. I used to stand over in the other aisle, but I think you can see better over here. I'd about as soon be in the upper balcony, only one has to come so early to get any kind of a seat, and here when it is a rainy day sometimes one gets a chance to sit down, and if one is early almost always for the first number so many people come late, and get shut out till the second."

Ingenious little Symphony girl, blessed be the tardy!

Then came Mr. Schnitzler with his violin.

"It's too bad his nose is so long," said the pretty girl next me, regretfully sniffing the violets on her muff.

"But he plays perfectly lovely," she added conciliatingly.

"— Nine — ten — eleven — there! I've counted a dozen diamond rings on a dozen little fingers up there, and yet they say men are not vain. Want to call attention to their white hands—it just makes me tired to see them," this spitefully from the pretty girl again.

While the orchestra began the introduction Mr. Schnitzler held his violin in front of him gingerly in one hand and bashfully proceeded to arrange his necktie with the other.

Every girl in the audience had a nervous desire to help him, he obviously was having such a hard time with it.

But just then he tucked his violin under his chin and began.

The Symphony girls couldn't have helped him here.

They leaned forward with rapt attention.

How he played!

Now it was a gentle minor andante with softly flowing numbers and flute-like flights of sound, and then a brilliant scherzo with crisp bright dancing notes.

How the Symphony girls applauded him and how the members of the orchestra applauded, too.

But he wouldn't be encored.

He got into his own seat in the ranks of the orchestra, and after a little handshaking all around—whole-souled bonhommie that made the Symphony girl want to hug herself out of sympathy—the Volkmann symphony began.

I don't know anything about music.

Only about the sensual pleasure of sweet sounds—something like the intoxication of hasheesh perhaps.

So I listened to the Symphony girls' splitting hair-breadths of technique and gushing adjectives all the way through the corridors and down the stairs, with a little smile at the musical Greek of it.

"And Paderewski will be here next week, just think!" I caught as I passed out.

Music Hall is a wonderful place.

AMY ROBSART.

The Register.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30

HYPERION THEATER---NIKISCH.

MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 9th, 8 o'clock.
ONLY GRAND CONCERT!
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH.....CONDUCTOR.

SOLOISTS:
Mr. F. BUSONI, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme—Symphony in C major No. 2, Schumann. Concerto for Piano Forte No. 2, Liszt. Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde, Wagner. Soli for Violoncello, (a) Nocturne, Chopin, (b) Capricio, Klengel. Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Tickets with reserved seats $1.50, $1 and 75c. according to location. Sale opens at the Box office, Hyperion Theater, Monday, Jan. 2.
d30 9d28u

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its only concert in this city this season at the Hyperion Theatre Monday evening, January 9. The merits of this splendid organization are fully appreciated in this city, and the performance will undoubtedly call out a representative musical audience. The Boston Orchestra has taken first place among similar organizations in this country, and the demand for its services in the larger cities has made its appearance in New Haven less frequent than formerly. Tickets for the concert of January 9 will go on sale at the Hyperion next Monday.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1892.

Mr. C. A. Ellis has engaged Mrs. Lillian Nordica as the head of a large concert organization, of which the following named are the other members: Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Andreas Dippel, of high repute in the principal opera houses of Germany, Emil Fischer, Mr. Del Puente, and Miss Helen Dudley Campbell. Mr. Ellis, in his management of the company, will be assisted by Jefferson S. Leerburger, who has piloted many of Henry E. Abbey's attractions through the country, including Patti on two tours. The first appearance of the company in Boston is appointed for Jan. 16, at the Music Hall. An act of an opera will form one part of the concert.

[72]

GRAND OPERA HOUSE, NEW BEDFORD,
MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 2, AT 8.

GRAND OPERATIC CONCERT

By the distinguished Prima Donna Soprano

Mme. Lillian Nordica

ASSISTED BY

MISS HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL,
Contralto.

MR. PAYNE CLARKE,
Tenor.

SIG. GIUSEPPE DEL PUENTE, Baritone.

MR. ISIDORE LUCKSTONE,
Pianist.

MR. J. FRANK DONAHOE,
Organist.

AND THE

RHEINBERGER CLUB.

Mr. F. L. DIMAN, Conductor.

PROGRAMME, — Part I.

PIANO SOLO. Rhapsodie, No. 2. . . . . Liszt
Mr. LUCKSTONE.

SONGS FOR CONTRALTO. a Sunshine, ... Schumann
b Lullaby, ... Chadwick
Miss CAMPBELL.

TENOR SOLO. . . . . .
Mr. CLARKE.

POLACCA. (Mignon.) . . . . . Thomas
Mme. NORDICA.

ARIA FOR BARITONE. Toreador Song,—"Carmen." . . . Bizet
Sig. DEL PUENTE.

CHORUS. . . . . JOURNEY SONG. . . . Rheinberger
RHEINBERGER CLUB.

PART II.

MASCAGNI'S BEAUTIFUL OPERA,

"CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA."

CAST.

SANTUZRA,	MME. NORDICA
LOLA, }
LUCIA, }	MISS CAMPBELL
TURRIDU,	MR. CLARKE
ALFIO,	SIG. DEL PUENTE

CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA (Rustic Chivalry), a village story of Sicilian life, in one act, gives the composer, Mascagni, an opportunity to present a series of musical numbers that have been proclaimed altogether charming. The opera is simple enough in its story. Alfio, a jolly carrier, has, a short time before the opera opens, married Lola, the beauty and coquette of the village. The very first numbers of the opera, "Prelude and Sicilliene," introductory chorus and the arrival of Alfio, give character to the opera. Alfio, in a jolly song, enters upon the stage where he discovers Santuzza, who is in search of her recalcitrant lover, Turridu. Lola and Turridu were lovers, but the latter on returning from the war found that Lola had married Alfio. In a moment of pique Turriduturns to Santuzza who has always loved him. Lola, although married to Alfio, coquettishly ensnares her old lover, Turridu, who deserts Santuzza. It is at the moment when Santuzza is bemoaning her fate and imploring Lucia, Turridu's mother, to tell of her lover's whereabouts, that Alfio meets her. All are going to church. Santuzza in a passionate romanza and prayer implores that Turridu may return to her. In the midst of her complaint Turridu enters. She prays to him. He scorns her, and, as he is about to answer her unfavorably again, Lola in a peculiar ditty reminds Turridu that he loves her. He leaves Santuzza for Lola, who in turn scorns him, and laughs at both as she enters the church. Santuzza once more implores her old lover to renew their troth. He angrily spurns her and throws her down, whereupon he enters the church to join Lola. Santuzza in the height of anger curses him, and just at that moment Alfio enters from the church. Santuzza, in despair, tells Alfio of Turridu and Lola's love. Alfio swears that their blood shall flow, and he leaves the stage. Here follows the famous "Intermezzo." After Santuzza's "Ave Maria" all enter from the church. Turridu meets Lola, who hastens away to greet Alfio. Turridu invites his friends to drink, and sings the splendid drinking song. At the end of the song Alfio confronts him. Turridu invites Alfio to join them. He refuses. All the women leave the stage. Alfio challenges Turridu to fight. They embrace, and, as is the fashion in Sicily, Turridu bites Alfio's ear. They agree to fight. Turridu calls his mother, bids her farewell, praying that, if he should not return alive, she should shelter and care for Santuzza. He goes to meet Alfio as Santuzza enters. Turridu is slain. This ends the opera. The entire work is made up of the following numbers:—

PRELUDE AND SICILLIENNE.
INTRODUCTORY CHORUS.
SCENE AND ARRIVAL OF ALFIO.
SCENE AND PRAYER.
ROMANCE AND SCENE.
DUET. (Santuzza and Turridu.)
LOLA'S DITTY.
CONTINUATION OF DUET. (Santuzza and Turridu.)
DUET. (Santuzza and Alfio.)
INTERMEZZO.
SCENE, CHORUS AND DRINKING SONG.
FINALE.

The Piano used is a Steinway, from M. Steinert & Sons, Boston.
The celebrated Mason & Hamlin Organ used at this concert.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 31 1892

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There was an unusually small attendance at the ninth Symphony concert, but there was excitement and hullabaloo enough for a multitude, and the once respected standard of these evenings was again lowered and disregarded. For the place due in the usual sequence to a solo pianist there had been engaged an Italian young lady, just in the middle of her teens, by the name of Eugenia Castellano, who played a nocturne and scherzo of Chopin fairly well as to interpretation and exceedingly well as to technique, and then proceeded to deliver a concert study by one of her teachers, Martucci. This, being audaciously brilliant and astonishingly difficult, and being played with amazing alacrity and surety, won her an immediate and vigorous recall, to which she promptly responded with a still more showy, resplendent and intricate caprice, chiefly notable for its swift crossings of hands in ornamental notes and bars, while a smooth, fluent, rapid undercurrent streamed on unbroken. This was also received with much jubilation and applause—even the conductor consenting to smile dreamily, and pat his little hands languidly as he reposed in his chair—and she returned and added yet another solo, which was a quaint, delicate and rather fanciful gavotte,—both these last being ascribed to her last instructor, Van Westerhaut. The girl has an easy command of the keyboard which is astonishing, even when one recalls Paderewski, and she displays in her touch both solid strength and airy lightness. She seems to have the true Southern temperament, and there are moments when an ebullient Neapolitan passion surges through the music; but her musical mind appears to be still forming itself, and in the Chopin there was often apparent an intellectual and even emotional cautiousness, so to speak. Signorina Castellano gives remarkable promise and encourages great hopes; but such an introduction of her was unbecoming, for exhibitions of virtuosity and salon pieces are out of place in a Symphony concert, as a sound and serious director would know. Tschaikowsky's second concerto was the work promised for the girl's début, but it was withheld because, according to a foot-note on the programme, the orchestral parts were insufficient. This surely should have been found out long before, so that another proper composition could have been selected. The orchestral numbers were: Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture, which was superbly played, with an exquisite 'cello obbligato by Mr. Schroeder; the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," which had better sentiment than execution, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the performance of which was variable, ranging from a nice support of the beautifully played obbligati—those of the viola and horns particularly—to some pretty ragged and rough endeavors to keep together in the first movement.

The programme-book condescended to restrict itself to only four pages of Berlioz this time; still the readers would have been better pleased and more edified if even this forbearance had extended so far as to spare a page or so for telling them something about the soloist of the evening.

The programme for this evening begins with that "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz of which the conductor is fond, and ends with Volkmann's B-flat symphony. Between these Mr. I. Schnitzler of the orchestra will play Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto.

THE KNEISEL CONCERTS.

It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartette at their fourth concert was perfect. The Beethoven quartette which they chose—that in C-sharp minor, opus 131—would not be counted as among his greatest. Grandeur, majesty, deep pathos and broad thought do not characterize it; but a hundred swiftly varying minor emotions are there in shifting shades of sentiment, gravity, humor, dainty conceit and lively spirit. Within its single movements are many changes of tempo and of mood, and it demands a ready alertness both of hand and sympathy to follow, catch and exhibit these. Mr. Kneisel and his fellows were absolute masters of all and their reading was as of a single mind and impulse. Nothing finer in their way can ever have been heard here—one is tempted to say that nothing can surpass it. The rest of the evening was assigned to Brahms's piano quartette in A-major, opus 26. As usual, the doctors disagree—the one party declaring the composition worthy of its place beside Beethoven, while the other found it labored, pedantic and mechanical. As our readers know by this time, we like to occupy a middle ground, to admire in this composer all that is lucid, spontaneous and obvious and to hold back frankly from that which is formal, abstruse and studied. We found much to enjoy in this quartette—distinct melodic figures, free spirit and reasonable scientific development. The performance was at all points excellent, and no small share of the praise is due to Mr. Nikisch, who was the pianist. His technical equipment was entirely adequate, his reading clear and often brilliant, his touch distinct and refined and his attendance upon the string players careful and sensitive. Occasionally, following them with the delicacy he uses toward singers, he subdued his part more than was necessary, as, on the other hand, when he had to lead, his tone became too voluminous because of the raising of the piano lid, which should have been closed at least to the short support. But he is to be heartily congratulated and thanked, and we hope that he may be heard again soon in such, or even larger music.

SATURDAY MORNING

SYMPHONY

Amy Robsar

Rehear

FRIDAY AFTERN

The Fun at Music Hall

Three Hours of P

Nikisch and his Sol and Technique—

Diamond

I went to the Symph
terday.

So did a very big cont
and the suburbs.

I went early, to see the

If you don't believe musical enthusiasm of th early some rehearsal aft
Hall and stand around second balcony crowd wa ridor.

At noon yesterday the began to gather.

The doors are not open

Mr. Nikisch does not lift
2:30.

Consider the patience of

But if you value the wh garments and the safety don't confide in it; don't self in its midst.

Spectacled young girls girls; girls chatting in gou packed close; solitary gi bags and with music roll the Century and Harper's wedged in; girls browsi volumes; girls very smart hats, and girls very shabby girls sophisticated; girls i of Richardson or Czerny have been teaching scales exercises half a lifetime.

But all of them Symph with a precious bit of titling them to admission balcony where there are n and it is a matter of first c

Every one of those 466 meant to be first.

There was no doubt of it.

Patiently they waited.

They crowded close and densed mass of gowns an breathless expectation.

At last the doors were op

Rushing, pushing, elbow
ward by main strength, made for the stairs; veils skirts ripped, bonnets pull disordered, ribs poked, in the merciless onslaught took precedence, the wea bravely after and the ticket with both hands.

A rout of the gallery god compared to it.

Filling Music H

Into the big bare balcon
by a dozen doors.

In five minutes the balc
in ten it was crowded.

It took fifty minutes to f cony, the floor and the s side, while the orchestra desultory way into their p white curtained drop ligh melancholy prelude of s moanings in thirds and six fiddles and flutes.

All this time the secon were rustling the yello grammes and reading Mr.
tributions to recent musical

A Picture of Nik

Then a little man in bla paced in a slow, soliloquisti the stage.

A little man, very sleek an pact and well-tailored, his coat buttoned close, a rim of dividing the black of his lo the black of his coat at the cuffs, and his face almost as linen against the dark backg brown and beard.

Conductor Nikisch, of cour

Beethoven in bronze look nignly on the flutter of bows of brasses.

Nikisch in broadcloth, on h tal opposite, ran his eyes in prehensive glance across his

He lifted the baton.

It was Berlioz's overture to Cellini."

Over across the hall Apoll stood posed in marble, listen

The Symphony girls in the cony were only ears and eyes

The Symphony girls on the forward in various attitud drinking and rapturous expr

Fine and clear and brilli
with now a clash of cymb thread of sweet sounds that wound with subtle passes abo wand in invisible gossamer winding, with deft, dainty ju at the climax of some brilli flirted the whole concert hall off into space from the t with a single flourish of his dexterous hands.

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, DEC. 30, 1892.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, NORDICA AND SCHROEDER.

REINECKE'S "MANFRED" OVERTURE—DVORAK'S D MAJOR SUITE, SCHUMAN'S D MINOR SYMPHONY AND VARIOUS SOLOS.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall last evening was a series of brilliant performances. The somewhat anomalous program was:

Karl Reinecke, overture.....“King Manfred”
Gounod aria.....“Reine de Saba”
Antonin Dvorak suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39.

Solos for violoncello.

Chopin.....Nocturne
Klengel.....Capriccio
Rossini, aria, “Una Voce,” from “Barber of Seville.”

Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4.

The soloists were Mme. Lillian Nordica and Alwin Schroeder.

Mme. Nordica, who was received with enthusiasm, gave a first rate vocal display in both her numbers and was recalled, again and again, after each. She showed good taste not only in her singing but also in declining encores. There is no better cellist permanently in America than Alwin Schroeder. A larger work with orchestra would have been gratifying, but he played so exquisitely the relatively small things on the program that there can be only room for admiration.

As for the orchestra it has never played here with more “snap” and dramatic fire. It made even the “Manfred” overture sound almost like live music, to which it ordinarily bears about the same relation as a plaster cast to a marble statue. The form is exact but the material is not valuable, and the idea is borrowed. The work begins with some promise, and continues in a persistent and well meant endeavor to get somewhere, but never arrives anywhere in particular. The overture was evidently appreciated last night despite the controversy among musicians as to its value.

Once upon a time there was a certain Athenian named Aristides who was so truly good that his fellow-citizens couldn't stand him. Therefore they rose up one day and thrust him out of the city. In modern times there are evidently those who would be happy to assist at a similar service for Karl Reinecke. Such say Reinecke is like a polished society man, whose language is always sure to be “in good form,” and whose thoughts are conventionally correct and strictly moral, but never very interesting, forceful or original. He is a model of deportment and a good shape for his tailor. Doubtless it would afford relief if he would occasionally break through his well-bred reserve and over-refined conventionality, and do something that was frivolous or positively shocking. The overture was played with singularly good effect, save for a queer false intonation among the strings.

Dr. Dvorak's D minor suite for strings is an example of what can be done by a man of ideas, without any too much respect for form. The five movements are: Prelude (pastorale), allegro moderato; polka, allegretto grazioso; minuet (Sousedska), allegro giusto; romance, andante con moto; finale (furiant), presto. There is no lack of freshness of melody and harmony or of orchestral color, and the interest never flags. The suite is not enough in itself to establish the composer's reputation, but it is good music.

The beauty and vitality of Schumann's D minor symphony was never more conspicuous than in contrast with the preceding jumble of Reinecke, Gounod, Dvorak and Rossini, and the orchestra entered into it with a will that might indicate pleasure at finding something solidly noble at last. Schumann, the most important writer of symphonies since Beethoven, is still the professional test of popular musical appreciation and intelligence. Why this should be it is needless to discuss here. He was late in applying his genius to this sort of composition, but in that respect he was not unlike others. One trait that is doubtless an obstacle to the greater popularity of his orchestral works is his comparative lack (less obvious in the D minor symphony than in others) of picturesqueness in orchestration.

